

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO

SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION, FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO

Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 9.

{ D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, JANUARY 1, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY,
SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. }

$1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy one Year.....$1.75
Six Months.....1.00
each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

A SLEEPY deacon, who sometimes engaged in popular games, hearing the minister use the words, "Shuffle off this mortal coil," started up, rubbed his eyes and exclaimed, "Hold on, it is my deal!"

A TERRE HAUTE paper says: "The same wise providence which scourged Egypt with toads and Kansas with grasshoppers, kindly permits the Terre Haute Gas Company to furnish the meanest gas in the United States."

REV. J. H. TODD, of Sioux City, played a rather neat little joke on his wife the other day. While she was unsuspectingly engaged in half-soling his winter trousers, he quietly slipped out at the back gate and eloped with a milliner.

A METHODIST CLERICAL SCANDAL.—The Rev. John Beahart, a Methodist clergyman of Boston, has been arraigned at Malden, for bastardy. The complainant is a former domestic in the family of the accused. The defendant gave bonds for his appearance.

THE Province Journal gives another instance of alleged clerical delinquency, the transgressor in this instance being a Seventh-Day Baptist, who was formerly employed by the Young Men's Christian Association as a missionary. It is very strange that so many cases of this kind should occur just now.

THE Sun, in speaking of the "Brooklyn business," says: "In the Beecher case there is one thing that the public will neither fail to understand while it is going on, nor forget after it is over, Any compromise or arrangement or settlement, except through a trial in court, is a confession that HENRY WARD BEECHER is a guilty man."

MAYOR WICKHAM will soon be installed into office in this city, and will be the third Mayor the city has had in the space of about thirty days—the first time such an event ever occurred here. Mayor Havemeyer died within about a month of the expiration of his term. Mayor Vance was his legal successor, so soon to be supplanted by the Mayor elect.

STEPPING DOWN AND OUT.—It is reported in Toledo that the Rev. John A. Hudkins, who had been preaching to a United Brethren congregation in Mt. Ayre, is a bigamist. He married a young maiden from Pennsylvania last Summer, and it was said that she was wife No. 3. He has strengthened suspicion by running off to Canada.

THE sisters of a Baptist church at Raleigh, N. C., held a public meeting the other day, and raised a subscription to release their pastor, who was in jail on a charge of bastardy. When the fine had been paid, the sisters marched to the jail door and received the reverend gentleman with open arms. The scene is described as deeply affecting.

A MISSING BAPTIST CLERGYMAN.—The Rev. H. Shipe, pastor of the Herbertsville (N. J.) Baptist Church for over a year, has left the church and his whereabouts is unknown. For some time charges have been pending before the trustees and officers of the church in relation to certain irregularities, and it is believed he disappeared to avoid public scandal.

A LECTURER on the evolution theory recently held forth to the congregation of a truly orthodox church in an inland village of Pennsylvania. Great was the indignation of his auditors at hearing him denounce the atheistic teachings of Darwin and Spencer. He appreciated the point upon learning afterward that the people, who had never heard of the English writer on social science, thought he was referring to their beloved pastor, the Rev. Ichabod Spencer.

THE REV. JOHN S. GLENDENNING has resumed preaching pending the appeal of his case to the Synod, which will not meet for several months. His beloved flock manifests great affection for him, and hang with great fondness upon the sweet words he utters.

His theme, like his co-sufferer, Henry Ward Beecher, was "Cast thy burdens on the Lord, and he will sustain you." It is probably a very comfortable thought when a clergyman is arraigned for his immoralities, to feel that the Lord is bearing his burdens and helping him through his difficulties. It strikes us, however, the Lord has other and better employment than sustaining adulterous clergymen. We advise the Eliza Janes and the Anna Marias of that congregation to beware of their smiling, fascinating pastor, and if he pays them visits at night, to not allow him to extend them to a late hour. Let them remember poor Mary Pomeroy.

Since this was written, we see Mr. G. has had the good sense to decline regular preaching until after the Synod have assembled in October next. It is thought the Presbytery brought influences to bear to cause him to think the cause of Christ will be better served by his preserving silence. In this one matter of declining to preach while under charges of a criminal character, he differs from the distinguished Brooklyn pastor.

ANOTHER PREACHER IN TROUBLE.—The Reverend W. H. Johnson of Rahway, N. J., was not long since caught in a very disreputable business. A farmer who had been missing chickens from his hen house was on the alert for the thief. Discovering early one morning that some one had visited his chickens, and had taken four or five of them away, and seeing tracks in the snow he followed him to the depot, where he found the Rev. Mr. Johnson with several chickens in a basket, waiting for the cars. He recognized the fowls as his own and questioned the Reverend chicken thief so closely that he acknowledged the crime and could do little but hang his head in shame. Several of his neighbors soon gathered around, and one of them in discussing the offense remarked, that it was not a very good year for preachers, and cited the cases of Beecher, Glendenning and others. It turns out that this Johnson had, for a considerable time, been stealing chickens from different persons, and since it is found out has discontinued preaching for the present. It may be proper to state this Reverend gentleman belongs to the African branch of the church, but had a regular license to preach, and has been regarded as a pious man. Though in temporary disgrace just now, he is by no means the greatest offender among his brethren of the cloth, who assume to be guides and patterns for their coifing followers; nor are the chickens hofeloniously purloined the only kind which the dear souls seem to have a penchant for.

THE peculiar literature of the Brooklyn scandal is accumulating. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher and Miss Edna Dean Proctor have favored us with a pair of gushing "paroxysmal" epistles, in which appears a good understanding and a due amount of mutual admiration.

Judge Lord, the eminent jurist of Massachusetts, has given in the Springfield Republican an able review of the case from Beecher's letters and admissions, and shows conclusively that Beecher's guilt of the charges made against him, is the only reasonable decision that can be arrived at.

Mr. Beecher, in his paper, the Christian Union, again asserts his innocence, trusts his case with God, and professes anxiety to have the case hastened to a speedy trial. This brought out a reply from Mr. Tilton, in which he shows that Beecher and his lawyers have used their ingenuitly to prevent the case coming to a trial, unless the court enjoins him to bring evidence of adultery between Mr. B. and Mrs. T. on two days only. He claims the adulterous practices between the pair extended over a period of fourteen months or parts of three years, and that if the case is allowed to come to trial, he can prove by F. D. Moulton, Mrs. Moulton and others that the crime was confessed by Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton.

In view of this fact, he deems it unjust to compel him to confine his evidence to two days only, and thus prevent his using all the testimony that bears upon the case. He seems to fear the purpose of Beecher is to so fetter him by the specious plea for a "bill of particulars," he (Tilton) will be compelled to withdraw the civil suit, and that then Beecher, under pretence of magnanimity, will withdraw the criminal suit commenced against Tilton, and thus prevent the matter ever coming to trial. He closes by saying: "I ask all just men to join with me in declaring that, if Mr. Beecher shall still further clog and hamper the civil action on the one hand, and at the same time shall withdraw the criminal prosecution on the other, thus using both these cases only to prevent me from submitting to a jury the general fact of his long-continued adultery; Mr. Beecher shall then be deemed to have confessed judgment, and must stand self-acknowledged as guilty before the civilized world."

THE "KATY KING" BUSINESS in Philadelphia has been a little unfortunate. This somewhat noted resident of "the bright world beyond," had put in many appearances in the most satisfactory manner. She had conversed with many, had received many endearing tokens of regard from admiring friends. The distinguished Robert Dale Owen and others had witnessed her repeatedly; had taken her hand and arm, and realized how natural and life-like it appeared; had even been permitted to pass their arms around her waist, and to convince themselves that she was so thoroughly "materialized" as to appear like a veritable woman of flesh and blood and bones. Everything passed off pleasantly, and Katy King was fast becoming a very popular "spirit," and numbers flocked to see her. Many valuable presents were made her, and in return she gave her friends pieces of her dress and clippings from her hair, which preserved their permanence in a remarkable manner. Thus matters moved agreeably along until a gentleman to whom Katy closely approached discovered she had an offensive breath—whether from onions, garlic, bad teeth or a foul stomach, we are not informed—and this little fact did not quite comport with his ideas of refined "spirit life," and his suspicions were aroused. He discovered, too, this spirit Katy bore a very strong resemblance to a young lady he had seen at his boarding house hard by. He watched the matter closely, and when fully convinced of her identity, he approached the young lady upon the subject, and ultimately she acknowledged she was Katy King, and showed him the light gauzy dresses she had worn when representing Katy, and the numerous presents she had received.

It was found she had made her entrance and exit into and from the cabinet by means of a pannel or secret drawer in the partition, and with her artful representations, she had succeeded in "deceiving the very elect." The philosopher and close observer, R. D. Owen, had faithfully attended upon Katy's seances, and has he not detailed the whole "wonderful affair" in the Atlantic Monthly, and characterized the same as the most remarkable representations of spirit power? Now, however, since the fraud is exposed, the good man is compelled to acknowledge himself deceived by dishonest mediums.

A lesson is to be learned from all this. If Mr. and Mrs. Holmes have been frauds, it does not prove that all others are. Chaff does not disprove the existence of wheat, and all the lies in the world do not falsify one truth. But so long as money is to be made in the roll of mediums, it is not strange, perhaps, that dishonesty is resorted to. The public must be chary, and not believe too readily all representations made. "Try the spirits, that ye be not deceived."

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAR LOGOS.

CHAPTER VIII.

When Sloucher and Huskins turned away from the ferry, after having been outwitted by old Giles, the Fanatic, as already noticed, was in no very good humor.

"This is a pretty affair!" he exclaimed to the witchfinder. "Worst, and all because of that son of perdition, Miles, who no doubt deceived us at the villa, so that he should have time to dispatch a messenger to town to apprise the witch Ravenswood of her danger."

"I can't explain how she escaped," returned Peter, "and the wonder is, that the ferryman should have taken her across so readily, and yet have refused us so promptly."

"My opinion is," rejoined Solomon, "that he may not, perhaps, have taken her over at all; but on learning from her all that was on foot, stowed her away somewhere until this tempest has blown over." For although his appearing as if after having left her on the other side stands somewhat in his favor, he may have only just entered his boat at some point, after having disposed of her on this shore, and rowed out on the river and then in again at the ferry, to mislead her pursuers."

"It may be as you say," answered Peter, "and what's more, she may be stowed away in his own house by this time, although I scarcely think that either he or that daughter of his would venture to harbor her or have anything to do with her if she told them the true state of the case; for the law is strict with regard to harboring a witch."

"We must capture her! We must capture her!" almost roared Sloucher. "She is a witch! yes, the woman Ravenswood is a witch! and she is now likely hidden in the ferryman's; we must set a watch upon his house until morning, if we are unable, in this storm and at this late hour, to get enough of our people together to force our way into it; for this Giles is a daring and dangerous fellow that one or two only must not venture to deal with."

"Good!" said the witchfinder. "You are wise. Let us set a watch upon the ferryman's, and see what will come of it."

The latter few sentences of this conversation were carried on not more than three or four feet from the point where Red Wing had stepped aside, and, as already observed, stood against a tree in the path that the Fanatic and his companion were pursuing, and where they paused for a few moments in the eagerness of their observations, to decide upon the course they were now to adopt in relation to poor Alice. The Indian was so close to the two conspirators he heard every word they uttered; and having ascertained the whole scope of their designs for the time being, he, as known to the reader, set about thwarting them in the manner already described.

One of the most active and infamous emissaries of Sloucher was a villain called "Nat the Noose," from the circumstance of his having, on a certain occasion, strangled with a rope an alleged witch who had escaped from prison, and whom he had overtaken, and was barbarously dragging back to jail again. He had slipped, in a noose, the end of the rope about the young creature's neck, and because of her being unable to keep pace with him after he had seized her, he hauled her along the ground until life became extinct.

This scoundrel, who was a most forbidding wretch both mentally and physically, had been at the villa with the party that hoped to capture Alice, and had but just left the ferry with his companions, when it was supposed, from the absence of Giles' boat, that she had escaped across the river, and when the Fanatic and the witchfinder had decided to remain and await the return of the ferryman.

It was in search of him, therefore, that the two conspirators determined to proceed after their suspicions had been aroused in relation to the truth of the story told by Giles regarding the crossing of the river with the young girl. Sloucher knew that no more trusty spy could be set on the ferryman's, and that in case of their being unable to make any further move for that night, it would be advisable to dispatch him at once to look after the case, so that they might have an opportunity of laying their hands upon the fugitive before she reached The Heights, being well assured that through the instrumentality of John Langton and the numerous friends of the Fitz Raymonds, they might meet with not only powerful but dangerous opposition while attempting to seize their intended victim.

Nat the Noose was not found so readily as they supposed he would have been; for it was not until after Red Wing had grabbed Titmouse and dragged him away to the ravine that he was discovered and informed of the mission he was to undertake at once. His lower jaw fell in a sort of silent demoniacal chuckle when he learned of the suspicions of the conspirators and the part that he was now called upon to play in the infamous drama. The truth is, if Sloucher was a victim of the fascinations of Miss Ravenswood and was endeavoring to get that poor, wronged, young creature into his power, the Noose had fallen head and ears in love with the ferryman's daughter, Martha, from whom he already had had so many rebuffs and sharp cuts that a spirit of revenge was beginning to usurp the place of the more tender passion. Not that he had yet given up all idea of his suit, for he was one of those wily and indomitable fellows that hunt down their prey steadily, and never despair of accomplishing their ends, no matter how nefarious.

To be authorized, then, to keep an eye on the ferryman's house, and to enter it if necessary, was something in his favor, for he knew that in carrying out the views of the Fanatic and the witchfinder he should be sustained by both the Church and the State, and that no matter what excesses he might commit in the pursuance of what he termed his duty, they would be passed over with as much leniency as was the murder of the poor girl whom he had strangled with the rope.

Well armed and wrapped up, then, he left the witchfinder's, where he had received his final instructions and to which he accompanied the conspirators when they had fallen in with him, and as this unholy rendezvous was some distance from old Giles', he did not arrive at the latter until, as formerly mentioned, the dwarf had been borne away by the Indian.

It was late, therefore, when he reached the house of the ferryman, where he cautiously approached the door and the window alternately for the purpose of reconnoitering the interior, as Red Wing and Titmouse had done not very long previously. Like them, however, he was unable to get a glimpse through these channels of what was transpiring inside, and following the same train of investigation that had characterized their operations, he proceeded to examine the building most minutely in the hope of discovering some aperture, no matter how small, that might forward the designs of the conspirators or perhaps aid his own projects with regard to Martha.

Quick of eye, he soon detected the small, red gleam that had already attracted the attention of the Indian and the dwarf, and was quickly able to ascertain through the crevice between the logs, that Martha only was in the house, and that possibly she was awaiting the return of her father, who, as the wind and rain had ceased, had probably been summoned to the ferry by some belated passenger, or who, if he had deceived the conspirators, might now in reality have borne Miss Ravenswood across the ferry. He kept his eye to the aperture for a few moments, and perceived that Martha was in deep thought. Had he not feared the speedy reappearance of the ferryman, he would doubtless have sought admittance on the pretext of warning her and her father that they were suspected of harboring a witch, and in the hope of establishing more friendly relations between him and them through some offer of mediation in their behalf with the Fanatic and Huskins. But instead of this move he thought it more advisable to retire a few paces from the house and await in silence the return of the ferryman, whose approach could now be observed at some little distance, as the sky was beginning to clear, and the tempest had subsided almost completely.

He now took up his position under a huge beech whose branches well-nigh touched the roof of the building, and leaning against the trunk of the tree he fell into a train of musing, during which the time flew rapidly, and from which he was ultimately awakened suddenly by the crackling of some underbrush, not in the direction of the ferry, but from a totally opposite point. Presuming it to be caused by some wild animal, he was about to look to his weapons when he perceived the ferryman approaching cautiously and disappearing almost beside him as suddenly as if the earth had opened and swallowed him.

Astounded beyond measure for a moment, the spy scarcely dared to breathe; but speedily recovering himself, he bounded forward, and at once found himself standing by the opening to the root-house from which the fugitive and her protector had emerged earlier in the night, and which was almost level with the earth.

It was but the work of an instant to descend the steps and try the rough wooden-door that had been just closed by old Dick. It yielded to his pressure on raising the latch, when, through a brief gleam of light that illumined the end of the passage leading to the cellar, he caught a glimpse of the receding form of old Giles, and the next moment all was dark again.

From the direction of this passage the spy was satisfied it communicated with the house, and that it afforded a means of egress from the latter. Once decided upon this point he speedily followed in the footsteps of the ferryman, and in the course of a very few seconds found himself in the cellar, into which the light from the fire above flickered here and there through the flooring, and from which he could hear with the utmost distinctness every syllable uttered by old Dick and his daughter, who were now engaged in anxious conversation within a single foot of him.

"And won't it be very cold and solitary for the poor lady?" asked Martha on having been informed by her father that he and Alice had reached the cave without any mishap.

"Oh, no!" returned the ferryman, "not for a few days; for we have decided that she shall make her way to The Heights when Sloucher and his fiends have ransacked that quarter thoroughly, and satisfied themselves that she is not there. I will take her across when I find the coast clear and all safe."

"She has food, and plenty of furs to keep her warm I know," said Martha, "but what is she to do for drink and fire for even the short period you speak of?"

"There is a beautiful spring in the cave," replied the ferryman, "and as for fire, I warned her to be very careful, although I left her my tinder box and some brimstone matches. The cave is not dark as you might suppose, but rather otherwise owing to numerous fissures in the rock. It is besides quite dry and warm from the fact that it is small and not deep in the earth. However, it is the only place I know of that bids defiance, for the time being, to the prying eyes of the infamous villains Sloucher and Huskins, or those of that vagabond and murderer who is more dangerous than either of them—Nat the Noose."

On hearing these latter complimentary remarks the scoundrel in the cellar ground his teeth, and drawing a knife from his belt plunged it into the empty air. He was, however, anxious to hear how Martha received these observations, and was quickly all attention again.

"Yes," she rejoined, "you may well say that that villain, the Noose as they call him, is more dangerous than either of them; for I am certain there is not a more desperate or cruel wretch in the whole settlement. One glimpse of his horrible countenance is enough to satisfy any one that he is not only a villain of the deepest dye, but one of the most hideous looking objects in existence."

"You must be cautious, Martha, and not let your impressions of this scoundrel get abroad," continued the ferryman, "for should they come to his ears there is no saying what mischief the villain might work us."

"But where is this cave? Tell me the precise spot," said Martha, "for I am determined to steal to it to-morrow evening and spend the night with the poor lady. You say it is not more than a mile from this, and that it is close to the river. I can reach it and leave it unobserved, or without exciting suspicion, for I frequently walk along the shore in that direction."

"It is," replied her father, "quite close to the deep ravine that is so hard to enter, and that opens on the river. When you pass this about ten yards, turn to your left a few paces, and you will observe huge masses of vines falling down the face of a cliff. The opening of the cave is behind this screen; but if you are determined on paying the place a visit you must reach it before dark, else you will have difficulty in making it out. It is a lonely spot, and I would advise you to be most cautious, for it is rumored that some Indians have been discovered prowling about this locality lately; and you know that scarcely two years ago every house along the river was sacked by them, and this is why I have now put our furs beyond their reach until I can find a market for them."

"I wish, dear father, you had never traded for them," she answered, "as the knowledge that you possess them has gone abroad, and you know how dangerous that is in these uncertain times."

"True, girl," returned Giles, "but as they are now beyond the reach of the red-skins, there is nothing to be feared regarding them. I forgot to say, however, that I gave Miss Ravenswood to understand that I would if possible convey to her mother the intelligence that she is beyond the reach of the Fanatic and his crew for the present. I promised, also, that I would by some means keep the poor, young creature apprised of all that was taking place in relation to her, in so far as I was able to make myself acquainted with the movements of her enemies."

Both the ferryman and his daughter were educated far beyond their station, having seen better days; and Martha, feeling how severely the loss of books should be felt by Alice in her solitude, determined to share her own scanty library with her. Upon reflection, however, she began to consider that the poor, young lady would now be so absorbed with regard to her own ultimate fate she might not be expected to devote much if any time to reading. She therefore dismissed the idea she had just entertained in relation to taking the books, and merely decided to proceed alone to the cave on the following evening so as to reach it about dusk. This arranged in her own mind, she observed, in continuation of the conversation:

"Is it not a wonder that some of the Indians have never discovered this cave, and that you alone stumbled on it?"

"Why, yes," returned Giles. "But that they have never found it out I am satisfied, else Red Wing, who was with us so often a couple of years ago, would have mentioned the circumstance to me."

"What a noble fellow that Red Wing was," she answered, "and what a sweet creature, his wife. I wonder where they are now; for I am satisfied that whatever depredations some of his tribe may have committed when they were encamped near the ravine he was no party to their robberies."

"Not he!" returned the ferryman, "and I have heard that the government is now sorry that they treated him and the good red men who stood by him so harshly."

"Well," replied Martha, "I haven't much faith in the remorse of the authorities for any act of cruelty or wrong they may have committed; for as long as they continue to fill their dungeons with innocent persons, and to sacrifice human life so wantonly in support of one of the most degrading superstitions that ever disgraced any people, there is nothing to be hoped from them in any other relation."

As it was now long past midnight, Martha entered the snug little room already known to the reader, but not before she had laid down her father's sturdy settle-bed, that during the day formed a comfortable seat by the fire, and prepared it affectionately for him as usual. Soon a sanctified kiss and good-night told Nat of the Noose that his ears had a holiday. So when he found that silence reigned throughout the building he cautiously retraced his steps along the dark passage to the root-house, and soon emerged into the open air with a glare of fiendish triumph in his terrible eyes, more demoniacal than that which lit up the gloomy features of the Fanatic when he discovered the crimson rose-leaf on the beautiful arm of Alice.

The instant the Noose entered the town, late as it was, he posted off to the house of Huskins, determined not to sleep before he had apprised the witchfinder of the success of his mission. Contrary to his expectations he found a light still burning in the well-known window, and more unexpected still, on entering the building he was ushered into the presence of the Fanatic, who had not yet separated from his fellow conspirator.

When Sloucher perceived him he supposed that he had grown weary of watching and had come to report his inability to learn anything of Miss Ravenswood. Impressed with this idea, he launched forth against him in no very measured language, and at once classed him among the children of the Evil One.

"Don't be in such haste," returned the Noose to some bitter observation. "Wait until you are sure of your tongue. I have not said a word yet. You say all. Yes, you, who know nothing about it."

"What is it then?" observed Huskins, who was beginning to surmise that, possibly, their messenger might have something important to say. "Come Nat, let us have it; for if you have failed now, it is not often that such a thing happens to you."

"I have not failed," rejoined the villain, "for I know where Alice Ravenswood is concealed, and can lead you to the very spot this moment. But as there are more witches than one to be disposed of just now, and as another who is more dangerous can be secured at the same moment you lay hands on the one that has escaped you to-night, let us sit down and discuss the matter, for it is a serious one."

The instant Sloucher heard what had been said by the Noose, he leaped to his feet and exclaimed, as he shook him by the shoulder:

"Is it true? Is it true? Have you found the witch Ravenswood, and is she completely in our power?"

"She is completely in our power," replied the spy, "and what's more, I have evidence as clear as day, that Martha Giles is even a more terrible witch than the woman Ravenswood; because, not more than an hour ago, I saw her with these two eyes, astride of a broomstick going down the chimney of her own father's house, with a monkey astraddle behind her and one before her. I crept after her, through a dark passage that I discovered leading from a root-house close by into the cellar, just under the fire place, beside which she and the monkeys were sitting and chatting together. I heard every word they said and found out that they had been just visiting the witch Ravenswood in a cave near by, where she had been conveyed a short time before by the ferryman, who had deceived you in regard to her. I know where to lay my hand on her at any moment, for it is arranged that she is to lie concealed in the cave until The Heights beyond the river are searched for her, and then when it is found that she's not there, the ferryman will take her over and hide her among her friends or with the Fitz Raymonds. I advise, therefore, that we put off her seizure until to-morrow evening after dark, when she is to be visited again by her sister witch, and when we can entrap them both at the same moment, for they are to be quite alone in among the rocks."

"Are you sure," exclaimed Huskins, "that you saw this Martha on the broomstick, and heard her conversation with the monkeys?"

"Just as sure as I see you this moment," replied the villain, "for I was quite close to her when she flew past me, and afterwards was nearer to her and her two familiars than I am now to you."

"And did you understand her clearly as to where the witch Ravenswood is hidden?" ejaculated the Fanatic.

"As clear as the sun," said the Noose, "and what's more, on her father's return from hiding this woman, both the monkeys disappeared in a flash of blue flame when they heard him at the door, while this Martha soon seated herself beside him, and began to speak to him about the runaway."

"And what did he say?" growled Huskins, "for you know I have had my doubts of both him and this daughter of his for some time, and hinted as much to him at the ferry to-night. That she is a witch and a dangerous one I can well believe; so if we can manage to lay our hands on both her and her imp of a sister in the cave to-morrow night, the name of the Lord will be glorified."

"Yea, verily!" drawled out Sloucher, as his small, sunken eyes burned green, "the cause of the elect will be exalted and honored by such a capture; for, of late, we have suffered severely through the machinations of these children of the Evil One."

"Let us meet here, then, one hour after nightfall," said the witchfinder, "and proceed with sufficient force to capture these emissaries of Satan in their stronghold. The same party that was with us at the villa will be sufficient for our purpose."

"Well devised, brother Huskins," twanged out the Fanatic, "but we must keep our own counsel lest these witches might in some way get an inkling of our intentions, and escape us finally and forever."

"I will warn some of the bulwarks of the Faith to be here at the appointed hour, and Nat can see the rest," said Huskins.

"Very good!" exclaimed the spy. "All is safe and sure! I'll see one or two of the servants of the Lord who were with us at the ferry, and tell them that some of the brethren will meet them here at the hour you have mentioned."

"It must now be verging towards morning," said Sloucher with a yawn that swallowed up his whole face in a gloomy gulf studded around the edge with jagged and broken fangs; "let us, therefore, seek some repose, so that we may be refreshed and able to smite the enemies of the Lord at the time set down and make them a terrible example in the sight of the nations. But before we part, let us have a word of prayer."

With cruelty in their eyes and adultery and murder in their hearts, these three sanctified scoundrels now prostrated themselves before the Author and Giver of every good gift, and dared to ask a blessing upon the infernal work before them. Sloucher shook the rafters with his heavy artillery, while Huskins and the Noose worked in the "Amen!" In due time they arose to their feet again, and a few moments afterwards there was silence and darkness in the house of the witchfinder.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Be Still and Wait.

BY FREDERIC R. MARVIN, M.D.

Be still, O Soul!
Immortal Fates with tireless fingers work,
And from the tangled threads of time
Do weave the garment of eternity.
Be still, and wait.
The loom hath many threads;
But the swift shuttle runneth well.
A day, a night, and lo! between two hours
The fabric falls.
Be still and wait,
For thou shalt wear the garment of eternity,
The shining robe of immortality.

Lecture of B. F. Underwood.

"What Have You to Offer in the Place of Christianity?"

[The following is from the Milwaukee Sentinel of Nov. 21st.]

B. F. Underwood delivered the Sunday evening lecture at the Grand Opera House last night, the subject being an answer to the question, "What have you to offer in place of Christianity?" The gentleman was introduced by Mr. Spencer, and at once plunged into his subject.

First it was necessary to glance at the leading dogmas of Christianity. The Christians say they have the conception of God. The Freethinkers say in reply the conceptions of God vary with the ages in which they prevail. All these ideas are not external verities, but transient, whilst the power called God remained ever the same. Freethinkers say man makes God in his own image, or, with Ingersoll, "An honest god is the noblest work of man." The question is, not what we will give in the place of the transient image, but what in the place of the power?

ALL FREETHINKERS RECOGNIZE THIS POWER,

but are unwilling to limit it, condition it, give it qualities. Freethinkers call the power a phenomenon, meaning something they cannot account for. They deny the Christian belief that led them to address God as "our father," and to attribute infinity and omnipotence to him, in that shape worshipping him, and making him an enlarged edition of men. The Freethinker says we will not recognize this power as entire or feminine, but simply as a power unknown.

Secondly, the Christian believes in creation; that God suddenly awoke, and spoke a universe into existence. The Freethinkers substitute the idea that the universe never had a beginning, but was from and will be to all time. As the child says: "God cannot make a three-year old colt in a minute." The Freethinker looks upon nature and calls it matter. Since it was not created, there is

NO NEED OF A CREATOR.

For the idea of miracles they substitute the grand conception of law, or uniformity of action. Nature operates in a certain manner; by experience we find these methods do not vary. They are not suspended for the benefit of an individual; and Freethinkers came to the conclusion that this law is universal and has always prevailed. The Christian religion is based on the conception that God varies nature; and here they joined issue. They believe that natural life, species, and civilized society evolved, and that the whole process of expansion came without any special intervention of God.

Sometimes the Christian says: Where do you get your ideas of morality without God? The Freethinkers find the Christian not a rational system. For instance, they cannot reasonably explain the origin of evil. Christians say God made everything good, to begin with. What the Freethinkers consider good is everything that promotes happiness, and everything evil all that is calculated to do injury and cause misery. They do not believe, because God approved or disapproved, that things are right or wrong; but that it is right or wrong according as it promotes our good or works our evil.

FALLEN STATE OF MAN, and the Christian's view that God caused this as a punishment, the Freethinkers substitute the idea that man is not a fallen but a rising being, and as the ages roll on, man is improving, and the defects of his mind and body are the result of his imperfect state. Going back to the rude days of dwellers in caverns, we demonstrate with absolute certainty that the farther we go, the lower we find man to be.

The Christians say they have a plan of redemption, to save the soul. The Freethinker does not consider it right that salvation shall depend on the shades of a man's belief. The wisest men differ. The beliefs of men depend very much on their education, surroundings, bringing up, for which they are in no way responsible. Freethinkers substitute the practical idea that the development of character and works shall determine man's right to happiness. As to the scheme of the forgiveness of sins, the Freethinkers have by which men can get rid of the responsibility of wrong-doing, and would substitute the simple idea, that as a man sows, so he shall reap. We see everywhere the demoralizing tendencies of this Christian belief. We see murderers professing a belief in Christ's saving grace; whilst we are choking them, and they tell us that in a few minutes they are going to the angels; yet if they were to step down, free, we would not see them under our roof-trees. Freethinkers say there is no forgiveness in nature; nothing by which the consequences of an act can be avoided. Whatever a man does, the results and responsibility are enduring, and can never be wiped out. Every man and woman ought to take the responsibility of their actions, and not expect to have it wiped out by the blood of an innocent person shed eighteen hundred years ago. [Applause.]

NO SCAPEGOAT THEORY

As to

THE SYSTEM OF PUBLIC WORSHIP,

the Christian scheme is to make man a worm of the dust, and God beyond glory. He advocated glorifying man, and letting this power called God look out for itself. Instead of building churches, let us build school-houses and institutions dedicated to man. [Applause.] He would not destroy churches; they fill a want that is for the time felt, and by and by would have them teach something practical and good.

For the future life, the Freethinker will remind the Christian that Christians are beginning themselves to have doubts on the subject. His idea is that a homoeopathically small proportion of people go along a narrow, flinty road to heaven, and the rest go pleasantly to hell. Better the whole race should be annihilated than one should suffer such torments and the other enjoy ecstasies through all ages. There may be, beyond the portals of death, a region of unbounded bliss, but this is yet unproven; and we have in this world and life enough to do, and the best preparation for another world is doing our duty in this.

Freethinkers do not propose to substitute anything for the Bible. They accept the Bible. It is the property of the ages, come down to us to be accepted for what it is worth; although it is to be interpreted differently to the interpretation put upon it by superstition and ignorance. A conception that runs through the bible is that man is light, and woman the satellite that draws life from it. The clergymen themselves reject the code of poverty; and surely the Freethinkers might reject what they thought proper. They do accept Jesus as a brother, a noble man, whose virtues have been exaggerated. For prayers he advocated self-reliance, and for the Christian Sabbath he would substitute a day of rest, peace and innocent enjoyment.

THE HERITAGE OF MANKIND;

The lecturer was rewarded with frequent applause; and at the close of the lecture several persons enrolled their names as supporters of a continued course of Winter evening subscription meetings in behalf of free thought.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

NO. 338 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

"A Happy New Year."

To every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we wish a "Happy New Year"—one freer from trouble, care and vicissitudes than the one just closed. We would that the poor shall not want for food, and that the severity of the weather pinch them not for the want of clothing and comfortable homes. We wish the ignorant may not grope in darkness, but that knowledge and truth may shine upon all. We wish the galling bonds of superstition and error may be removed from the mental limbs of the sons and daughters of men, and that the truth and the right may ever be uppermost in the entire human family. We wish to see a feeling of brotherly love and paternal good-will actuate all mankind, that each one may find happiness in trying to increase the happiness of his fellow beings. We wish to see selfishness placed so far in the back-ground that we will at all times feel anxious about the welfare of others—that we regard the whole human race as brothers and sisters, and that we feel willing to do all we reasonably can to aid them in the struggle of life.

May we learn wisdom by the experiences the passing years afford us, and as time flits so rapidly on may we all have the good sense to wisely improve it in adding to our stores of knowledge good resolves and good deeds. If affliction and adversity visit us, may we learn to endure with patience that which we cannot prevent, but in every succeeding year we may use the constant effort to make ourselves and the world a little better and a little happier.

The Bible.

NO. XVII.

Some of our Liberal friends think it almost a waste of time in this latter part of the nineteenth century to bring arguments to show that the Bible is not the word of God, and that it is unworthy the blind adoration which the Christian world accord it. They think in this scientific age, men of sense and education no longer believe it was written with the finger of the Almighty, or at the direct dictation of the Supreme Ruler of the universe, and that the implicit confidence, that it is perfect and infallible, which the world has long felt in that book is fast dying out, and that very little more needs to be said about it.

But when we remember that the book is issued by millions, that immense sums of money are spent in scattering it broadcast over the land, that public libraries, reading rooms, schools, hotels, boarding houses, families, hospitals, asylums, prisons, ships, steamboats, and railroad cars, are furnished with it gratis; that it is kept for sale in every town and hamlet in the land; that it is gotten up in all conceivable styles, and prices running from fifty cents to twenty dollars per volume; that every family in the land must have at least one, and many of them several, that it is crowded in every where; that it is the foundation upon which is built the superstructure of one of the most injurious systems of superstition and error the world has ever known; that it has been, and is to-day, one of the greatest barriers to the advancement of science and mental liberty; that for centuries its influence has chained down in bigotry and darkness millions of human beings, we can readily understand how it is a great impediment to the onward progress of the human mind, and that it contains the errors and absurdities of past dark, superstitious ages, and of a mistaken, misguided people. We can readily understand the blind veneration and worship which millions yield to it is the great obstruction to the onward march of the human intellect. This is the antagonist we have to contend with, and it is idle to undervalue its importance, or to inadequately estimate its strength. So long as the Bible is worshiped and accepted as the infallible word of God, so long will mankind be led by wily priests; so long will mankind still hug the delusions of the past, when they should be stepping forward into the brighter sunlight of intelligence, science, mental freedom, reason and common sense.

In our investigations and criticisms of the Bible, we wish always to treat it fairly, and not unnecessarily shock the feelings of any who entertain an exalted opinion of it. We regard it as a human production only, and believe it wrong to charge such a tissue of impossibilities, contradictions, absurdities, obscenities, details of savage ferocity, carnage and bloodshed, of lascivious immoralities, cruel intrigues and murderous incentives there narrated, upon the Supreme Power which pervades the universe. It is wrong to charge this Power with being the weak, fickle, changeable, cruel, malicious, revengeful, blood-thirsty, and unjust monster which that book makes the Jehovah of the Jews to be.

It is quite time the world of mankind have a higher and more exalted ideal of the Supreme Power which pervades all worlds, and is equally the parent of all nations and all existences, than to believe he delighted in or ever authorized wars and bloodshed, and the plundering and extermination of one tribe or race of barbarians by another, or that he indulges in anger, passion, vindictiveness, cruelty, and injustice. These absurd ideas of Deity all belong to the past, and it is quite time the world had outgrown them. There is no more reason why we should go back four thousand years for our ideas and conceptions of Deity, and of his ways with mankind, than for instruction in the arts and sciences; in astronomy, geometry, chemistry, mathematics, agriculture, the art of printing, telegraphy, the power and uses of steam, and scores of other sciences and arts in which the moderns far outstrip the ancients. Why should we go back to them for our religious views any more than for our philosophic, scientific or artistic? Their ideas of all these were crude and imperfect and had not been developed by the superior intelligence and the spirit of progress peculiar to the modern mind.

We have opportunities and facilities for studying and comprehending Deity quite equal to those enjoyed by the ancients and it is not necessary we should go to them for their vague conceptions and errors. We of course have the right to inform ourselves in reference to them, but are under no obligations to accept their religious crudities and errors. We admit the Bible contains beautiful passages, poetical imagery, and good morals, but to less extent than the sacred writings of the Hindoos, Chinese, Persians and other nations, more ancient than the Jews. All the ancient nations imagined they held direct converse with God and had their prophets and sacred writings. The Christian world adopted the Jewish system, and Jewish scriptures, without any imperative reason why they should do so. If they want the most ancient, the purest, and the least bloody, they certainly will not select the Jewish scriptures, or the Jewish God.

As other articles are crowding for admission we will defer till our next our remarks upon the egress of the Israelites from Egypt, and their forty years' journey through the wilderness.

THE names of trial subscribers are coming in freely, but we wish a still greater number. True, the price we ask scarcely pays for the paper and press-work, but it is a good way to introduce the paper to those who never saw it, and a fair percentage we hope will become steady patrons.

Friends, please take a little interest in the matter, and send in good rousing lists of names. THE TRUTH SEEKER is not nearly as widely known as it ought to be. We hope every person friendly to the cause will take an active interest in extending its circulation. If every patron will make a reasonable effort, the list may be increased ten thousand. Remember we send THE TRUTH SEEKER to trial subscribers, post-paid three months, for twenty-five cents. Send in the names. We shall make a liberal present to the one who sends us the largest number of names of trial subscribers within sixty days.

Send in the names of friends and acquaintances who need the truth. Many of you can make a present of the paper to half a dozen friends at this low rate without much inconvenience. Send in the names.

Death-Beds of Infidels.

On no subject do our Christian opponents more persistently use detraction and misrepresentation than with regard to the dying hours of unbelievers. They seem to think if they can only make it appear that Freethinkers quail in the hour of death and recant in their dying moments, they have practically overthrown our strong arguments against the fallacies of their creed. Nothing is more common than for them to assert that all Infidels recant at the hour of death, and call upon priests to pray for them and intercede with God in their behalf, and thousands of times have they positively asserted that Voltaire recanted on his death-bed and that Thomas Paine repented at the hour of death, and renounced his life-long convictions. These assertions are entirely false, and though printed in books, magazines and papers, and though announced thousands of times from the pulpit and in common conversation, still are they wholly false, and without the slightest foundation in truth.

Our attention has, several times recently, been called to this matter by letters from friends, and by reading extracts from newspaper articles upon the subject. Even Harper's Weekly not long since contained a false statement that Thomas Paine died an intemperate death and loudly recanted and renounced his previous religious views. There is not a word of truth in this, and we wonder respectable journals will lend themselves to peddle out such worn-out falsehoods. It seems to be a very pleasant service to them to slander and abuse that good man, Thomas Paine, than whom none did more to inaugurate and establish liberty and free government in this land, but because he had the honesty and independence to avow his religious views, though in opposition to the claims of priests and church dignitaries.

A man's life is more than his death, and it matters little what a man may say on his death-bed, when subdued by disease, affected by medicines, influenced by surrounding zealots and friends, with life and strength nearly exhausted. It would not be strange if, under such circumstances, a man should say things and express sentiments not fully in keeping with his previous life and belief, and were it so it would prove nothing one way or the other. But, we repeat, these assertions about the death-bed recantations of Infidels are all false. We boldly assert, and challenge a disproval, that not one prominent Infidel ever recanted at the hour of death, or renounced the honest convictions of his life.

That Christians have often shown fear at the hour of death, and lost confidence in their religious faith and their certainty of heaven, there are numerous cases which can be cited. Even he who they call their Lord and pattern emphatically finched in the hour of death, and, unlike Socrates, who met his death placidly, calmly and heroically, he cried out in anguish and terror, with a loud voice, "Eli, Eli, lama Sabachthani?" (My God, my God, why has thou forsaken me?)

Brother Henderson in an article in another column gives some facts as to the death of Voltaire, and our next will contain a fuller article on the subject from another pen, which will obviate the necessity of our saying anything upon that particular case. We will however give the facts as to the death of Paine, who perhaps oftener than any other Infidel, has been slandered and vilified by Christian traducers.

Thomas Paine died on the 8th day of June, 1809, in this city, aged seventy-two and a half years. There are several yet living in this city who were here at that time. He was some time sick previous to his death, dropsy and debility of the stomach being among his ailments. His mind was clear up to his death and never for a moment did he evince a disposition to recant or renounce the religious views of his life.

He was, as a matter of course, frequently visited by officious clergymen, who importuned and wearied him with their harangues, and they were intent on extracting from him some expression which they could distort into a recantation, but failing in this they reported that which was untrue. A Rev. Mr. Milledoller and a Rev. Mr. Cunningham were among these persistent visitors, and a few days before Mr. Paine's death the latter said to him: "You have now a full view of death, you cannot live long, and whosoever does not believe in Jesus Christ will surely be damned." Mr. Paine replied: "Let me have none of your Popish stuff. Get away with you. Good morning; good morning." The other clergyman attempted to address him, but he objected, and after they left he turned to his housekeeper, and said, "Don't let them come in again; they trouble me."

Another clergyman, Dr. Manley, the last day of Mr. Paine's life, put this question to Mr. Paine: "Do you wish to believe that Jesus is the son of God?" and Mr. Paine's answer was, "I have no wish to believe on the subject," and these were the last words he spoke, as was testified to by Amasa Woodsworth who owned the house in which Mr. Paine died, and who visited him nearly every day during his last sickness, and was present on the occasion referred to.

That Mr. Paine did not recant or renounce his previous views was fully attested to by Mr. Willet Hicks, a Quaker preacher, who lived near him, and often visited him in his last sickness; by Mr. Jarvis, the particular friend of Mr. Paine, who saw him two days previous to his death; by Mr. Piggot, a very respectable gentleman, who visited Mr. Paine in company with his brother, who was a clergyman. He testified that Mr. Paine received them with politeness, but when he learned they wished to convert him, or to change his views, he abruptly closed the interview, and expressed a wish that they would take their departure.

Mr. Thomas Nixon and his friend Mr. Pelton visited him expressly to see if he had changed his views, also B. F. Harken, an attorney who many years after resided in Chambers street. As they were aware falsehoods in Voltaire's case had been industriously circulated, and believing they would be in Mr. Paine's, they questioned him closely and they took his replies down in writing, and they all gave written testimony that Mr. Paine did not recant.

This also agrees with the concurrent evidence of Mrs. Hadden, his housekeeper, his special friend Mrs. Bonneville and several others who visited him frequently during his last sickness. He died strong in the faith in which he had lived and the statements of those who assert to the contrary are utterly false.

The religious views of Infidels and Skeptics are very comfortable to live by and are perfectly safe to die by, let the howlers about the devil and hellfire talk to the contrary notwithstanding. We repeat we never knew a prominent Infidel who, in the hour of death, quailed before the grim visitor, or renounced the settled, honest convictions of his previous life. When Christian maligners assert to the contrary they depart from the truth.

We hope at a no very distant day to lay before our readers a succinct history of the Lives and Deaths of noted Infidels, including the Sages and Philosophers of ancient times, the Skeptics of the middle ages, and the Free Thinkers of modern times.

Christianity Examined.

NO. III.

These are "Christmas times"—in fact it is on Christmas day that we write this article. Immense preparations are made in the Catholic and Episcopal churches for the celebration of the anniversary of the birth of Jesus Christ. Evergreens for Christmas trees, festoons, wreaths, trimmings, crosses, stars, hearts, and the various kinds of similar ornamentation are furnished in great profusion. To look upon the sloop and schooner loads of evergreens that are brought to this city for Christmas purposes, one would think square miles of the hills bearing spruces, firs and cedars, must be denuded of their young growth. "Wax candles," "crucifixes," and "Virgin Mary's" are also staple articles of trade with certain classes just now, as well as an innumerable amount of toys and playthings, which are brought from Europe by ship loads for "Christmas times" in the United States. To walk through one of our popular commercial streets and witness the thousands of "holiday goods," toys, etc., exposed on the counters and in show windows is enough to dazzle the eye and bewilder the imagination.

It is the common impression among Christian people that all this ado—all these preparations to observe this celebration and feast of the 25th of December is from the fact their Lord and Master was on this day born into the world, and was first laid in the manger of a stable in Bethlehem eighteen hundred and seventy-four years ago. This, however, is extremely problematical. It is a matter of great doubt whether such a person actually lived, and if he did, it is by no means settled what year he was born, what month, or what day of the month. The early Christian authorities are very much divided upon this point, and it is extremely difficult for the most studious to arrive at a fixed conclusion in the matter. It was claimed by some his birth took place on the 25th of the Egyptian month Pachon, answering to the 50th of May; others, that it was on the 24th of Pharmuthi, corresponding with the 19th of April. The Egyptians kept the feast of Jesus on the 6th of January, and St. Epiphanius assures us it was fully established the birth of Jesus occurred on this day; but St. Clement, of Alexandria, much more ancient and learned, fixes his birth on the 18th of November of the twenty-eighth year of Augustus.

Despite the disagreement of the ancient Fathers as to when Jesus was born, it is by common consent now supposed the feast of Christmas is to commemorate his birth, and that the custom is of Christian origin. Here is another great error. The feast on the 25th of December was observed more than a thousand years before the Christian era. Its origin was probably with the sun worshipers of Persia and other nations, and was held in commemoration of the "birth of the sun," for on this day it has its birth, or, as we all know, begins its rise in the heavens, leaving gradually the night and death into which it had for months been sinking, and this is why the days from the 25th of December begin to increase and lengthen. In this feast, held in honor of the birth of the sun, we doubtless discover one of the original ideas upon which the Christian fable is founded. It is well known by students in ancient history and ancient religions, that religious worship and traditions were connected with the motions of the sun and heavenly bodies. The course of the sun in its yearly journey through the signs of Zodiac—Virgo—"the Virgin," Taurus, "the ram" or "lamb," accounts to some extent for the origin of the fabulous virgin and lamb. All systems of religions have evolved or grown out of pre-existing systems and traditions, and it is not difficult to understand how the Christian theory could, when knowledge was scarce in the world, by the manipulations of cunning and skillful persons, be made to appear probable, and caused to be adopted.

It is not a little curious that while the birth of Jesus was said to have occurred on the 25th of December, when the sun begins to rise in the heavens, and the days begin to lengthen, the birth of his herald, John the Baptist, was fixed on the 25th of June, when the days begin to shorten, or the sun begins to sink in the heavens. This may account for the somewhat mystical language attributed to the Baptist, when he said of his master: "He must grow, and I must become less."

It was a great matter of dispute in the early centuries of the Christian era, as we observed, when the birth of Jesus really occurred; and much blood was shed in trying to settle this disputed point. It is more than doubtful whether the correct day was finally settled upon. The stronger party compelling by force the weaker party to submit does very little towards establishing a truth. The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher in his evening meeting a few days ago, in referring to the bloody contentions among the early Christians about the birth of Christ, admitted that the contestants did not probably come within "several rods" of settling the matter correctly, and he seemed to think it made very little difference to us whether they settled the matter right or wrong. He alluded also to the ancient Druids in Britain, and how they used to believe the Nymphs of the Wood hid themselves under the evergreens when Winter came on, and staid there until Spring thawed them out, and how they thought by putting the green boughs into their houses they would call the good spirits there. From this source the English, doubtless, obtained their custom of decorating their churches with evergreens at the feast of the 25th day of December.

The more we examine into ancient history the more we learn the observance of the feast of the Winter solstice did not originate with Christians, any more than Jesus was the original "Son of God," which men claimed was born of a virgin, and the more we see Christians have set up false claims as to the originality of their dogmas and creeds. This is on a par with the claims they urge of originality of moral sentiments and inculcations. They would have us think Christianity has almost a patent for all the sublime, moral truths and utterances the world has been blessed with, and one of the strong proofs they advance in support of their religion is the superiority and originality of the moral teachings of Jesus over everything of the kind that had preceded him. Here, again, they are in error. Even as the whole Christian fable about the miraculous conception and birth of its reputed founder is a story borrowed from the legends of the old Pagan nations, so also were the best teachings and moral sentiments of their Jesus put into his mouth by his biographers hundreds of years after they had been uttered by others.

Even if we admit Jesus lived and spoke the sayings that are attributed to him, he was not the first that uttered similar sublime sentiments, and we claim the morality and beauty of the instructions and inculcations of those who lived and died from four hundred to twenty-five hundred years before he was born are as sublime, as true, and as divine as those he delivered. Our want of room will permit us to give but a few quotations here of the moral teachings of the semi-divine personages who preceded Jesus many centuries, but we will select a few.

Firstly, we will present a few passages from the ancient Vedas of India—the sacred writings of the Brahmans, which Sir William Jones and Max Muller informs us, were written from one thousand to two thousand five hundred years before the time of Christ, and even before the time of Moses. We ask the candid reader to notice if there is not as much of beauty and truth, as much of the evidence of inspiration in the sacred writings of the old heathens as is presented in the Jewish and Christian Scriptures:

"Any place where the mind of man can be undisturbed is suitable for the worship of the Supreme Being."

"The vulgar look for their gods in water; the ignorant think they reside in wood, bricks and stones; men of more extended knowledge seek them in celestial orbs; but wise men worship the Universal Soul."

"There is one living and true God; everlasting, without parts or passion; of infinite power, wisdom and goodness; the Maker and Preserver of all things."

"The way to eternal beatitude is open to him who without omission speaketh truth."

"God, who is perfect wisdom and perfect happiness, is the final refuge of the man who has liberally bestowed his wealth, who has been firm in virtue, and who knows and adores the Great One."

Several volumes are made up of sublime moral teachings of similar character. The following are a few of the inculcations attributed to Christna, the Hindoo "Son of God," who, it was claimed, was born of a Virgin, had a band of disciples, and was finally executed on the cross:

"As a man throweth away old garments and putteth on new, even so the soul, having quitted its old mortal frames, entereth others which are new."

"Wise men, who have abandoned all thought of the fruit which is produced by their actions, are freed from the chains of birth, and go to the regions of eternal happiness."

"He who can bear up against the violence produced from lust and anger in this mortal life, is properly employed and a happy man."

"The more happy in his heart, at rest in his mind, and enlightened within, is a Yogee, or one devoted to God, and of a godly spirit; and obtaineth the immaterial nature of Brahm, the Supreme."

"My servant is dear unto me, who is free from enmity the friend of all nature, merciful, exempt from all pride and selfishness, the same in pain and pleasure, patient of wrong, contented, constantly devout, of subdued passions and firm resolves, and whose mind and understanding are fixed on me alone."

"He also is my beloved of whom mankind are not afraid and who is not afraid of mankind; and who is free from the influence of joy, impatience and the dread of harm."

"He, my servant, is dear unto me who is unexpected, just and pure, impartial, free from distraction of mind and who hath forsaken every enterprise."

"He also is worthy of my love, who neither rejoiceth nor findeth fault; who neither lamenteth nor coveteth, and, being my servant, hath forsaken both good and evil fortune."

(Continued on Page 8.)

The Jews and their God.

CHAPTER IV.

Theology claims man fell from a high station of moral perfection, in which God had placed him, to that of total depravity. Being thus outwitted by the Devil, it has been, and now is, the sole object of the Jewish God to destroy this Devil and all his works; and to do this he calls to his aid his son—who, theology claims, is as old as his father, equal in power and in wisdom—and an innumerable host of angels, together with the assistance of man, in an organized capacity.

We have already shown the organization in the Garden of Eden, that it was vanquished by the Devil, and the designs of their God thwarted and a general smash-up took place; also the organization in the days of Enoch was demolished by this Devil, and a general state of wickedness prevailed over the face of the earth. Here ended the second organization in a general triumph of the Devil over God, his opponent.

We shall now speak of the third organization, which was commenced with Abraham, carried out through Jacob, and completed by Moses. First a trade was made between Abraham and his God, and a land contract entered into, the same as any two land speculators, each party covenanting to fulfill certain stipulations named in the agreement. Abraham was to do thus and so on his part, and for so doing his God agrees and promises to give a warranty deed to him and his seed forever, an everlasting possession of a certain tract or parcel of land, naming and describing its boundaries, flowing with milk and honey, indicating its extra goodness above all other lands. This tract of land was at that time inhabited by a race of people called Gentiles, the same as America was by the Aborigines of this country. The treatment of our American Indians at the hands of our professed Christians faintly shows the treatment the Canaanites received at the hands of a nation who acted as the executioners of a God of vengeance who had commanded their utter destruction. We would ask here, if that is called a possession in the promised land of Canaan above, as the land of Canaan is claimed a type, may we expect the Aborigines of heaven will be driven out at the point of the sword after the resurrection of the Jewish and Christian saints, as theology grants heaven to no others?

How was the possession of the promised land obtained? Was it in accordance with justice and the Golden Rule? We answer, no! The land was found in the possession of a strong, war-like people. And the Jews were commanded by their God to kill and destroy, and to take possession by force. To this they demurred, with tears in their eyes (see Numbers xiv), which caused their God to fly into a desperate rage, upbraiding them for cowardice, declaring in his wrath, they were unworthy even to see the land. We will illustrate: A covenants with B to give him a certain tract of land; B finds C upon the premises who shows fight. B informs A of the fact, A flies into a pet, and swears, "you cowardly pup, you shall not set your foot upon it; but I will give it to your children, who will accept my conditions." And the possession is taken afterward in a sea of human blood.

Friendly reader, the Jews taking possession of the land of Canaan under the dictation of God is now before you in its true light. It truly is a case without a parallel. Here was a nation of people, whose God was their Lord, and who had commanded, "Thou shalt not kill;" also, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood by man shall his blood be shed;" likewise, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's goods." This same God now curses and upbraids this same people for refusing to kill and to take that which belongs to another. Here our Christian friends may meet us by claiming the Canaanites had forfeited their title to life and property by transgressing God's laws. Supposing we admit this, and apply it in all like cases (which would be just), that the transgressing of God's laws works a forfeiture of life and property, what a hell on earth this would make if put in practice, and the Christians the authorized executioners. Nevertheless upon this idea the Jewish religion was based; and was by the Christians carried out for centuries, and would be now if they had the power.

The blessing of religious freedom, the value of which can not be estimated, arises from the fact that the power of the Jewish God grows weaker in proportion as man advances in civilization, and human rights are respected. But the Jews failed to conquer the world, and the Christians have about given up the idea, except Catholics and Mormons. The latter persons organized in Kirtland, Ohio, under a bible pattern; three persons forming the presidency of the church, the same as the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost form the head of all things; and Abraham, Isaac and Jacob formed the head of the Jewish nation. Next are their twelve apostles, representing the twelve sons of Jacob, and the twelve apostles of Christ. Then seventy elders, representing the Jewish sanhedrim, and Christ's seventies. All under the power of the two priesthoods, Aaronic and Melchisedek. With this bible organization, and the acknowledgement that Jesus is the Jehovah God, made flesh and dwelt among us, now enthroned in heaven, who had "set his hand again the second time to recover his people." (We would say the second time proved the first a failure.)

Under a firm belief in the Jewish God, and the fulfillment of the prophecies written in the bible, they assumed, and firmly believed they were the chosen of God; and taking the bible view that the Gentile world had filled up their measure of iniquity, and were ripe for destruction.—Isa. xi:11, 24, 25.

The reader can better realize the position the Mormons held by reading the prophecies in the bible, and in proportion as his confidence is in the prophecies, so will he justify the movements of the Mormons. They commenced in doing and carrying out the fulfillment of the prophecies in Kirtland, Ohio, then in Jackson Co., Mo., then at Nauvoo, Ill. But civilization and human rights overpowered them, and drove them out, the same as the Jews were. A firm, unshaken belief in the God of the Jews, and in the fulfillment of prophecies in the bible, was the soul and life of their religion, and is justly chargeable for every move the Mormons made. The result of this people has placed the Jewish God and the bible, as infallible guides, before the world in the truest light of any other sect now on earth. Yet our Christian friends call them a deluded set. Why? we ask. The answer is easy; the Mormons carried out the prophecies, precepts and examples in practical life which are recorded in the bible, while the Christian relies upon his faith in his God and bible, without practice, selecting a few of the rites and ceremonies that suit the times, and the balance of his time he uses in prayer, asking his God to do that which he won't do himself.

We shall examine the third church of God, or religious organization, as found on record. At the commencement, or the time this national church separated itself from other nations, Moses killed an Egyptian, hid him in the sand, and fled his country; and this was claimed to be a sign that God had appointed him as their deliverer. In due time, after this, Moses had an interview with a spiritual personage whom he sometimes calls God, at other times he is called an angel; at times he could be seen and talked with face to face, not only by Moses but by others. Invariably when seen he was in the form of a man, having all the attributes and disposition of a savage king. Uncivilization was stamped upon almost every act on his part, corresponding in full with the low, undeveloped condition of man at that age of the world. And how could it be otherwise, he being one of them, having only changed bodies and location, without reform? Possessing power as he did he undertook to organize and raise up a nation, with a full determination to conquer the world, and bring all nations to bow in subjugation to him. The Jews were by him intended to stand at the head of all nations; who should come and worship at Jerusalem, as the capital of the earth. But in all this he failed, for the want of wisdom. He not only failed in conquering the world, but failed in governing the Jews as a nation; whom he cursed and turned off as unmanageable, and has never shown his face since, and who can blame him after such a failure?

What, or who, can better portray the character of the Jewish God than in the character of an ambitious tyrant, who seeks glory and honor through blood and carnage, meting out acts and threats of unsatisfied vengeance to the full extent of his power?

Next to Moses killing the Egyptian were the plagues in Egypt. In this Moses and his God barely succeeded; the power and influence of other like spiritual personages, influencing and controlling the magicians or mediums of Egypt, the same as all other nations, show as their records do, a universal similarity throughout. As for blood and carnage, Moses and his God starts out to excel all other Gods and nations, all for the express purpose of glory and honor. But not being satisfied on this point, when death and mourning filled the land of Egypt, Moses' God brought his psychological force, or spiritual power, to bear upon the organs of the mind of king Pharaoh, that he thereby might achieve to himself a great name and get him honor among other nations and their Gods. For this purpose he controlled and changed the king's mind until he completed the king's ruin. It would make my thoughts too lengthy on paper to give the one-hundredth part of the exhibitions of blood and carnage that followed in the wake of the Jews and their God. As for the contentions and disputes between Moses and his God proves Moses was more than God's equal in wisdom and reasoning powers, and often in these disputations God came out second best, yielding to Moses' superior wisdom, abandoning his own purposes and adopting Moses' counsel instead of his own.

This may be a theological mystery No. 13, yet easily accounted for. Moses had the advantage of a later and better education, being learned in all the wisdom and arts of Egypt in his day, and was well calculated to give counsel. This his God well knew, and to execute his savage, revengeful disposition upon his own people, would have shown his weakness, and it would have been a proverb in the land, and a disgrace among the nations. This Moses saw, and persuaded his God not to execute his wrath upon his own people. This proves Moses possessed more wisdom, reason and humanity than God, and God appealed to him in these words: "Let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them." This also proves Moses had held him in check before; it also proves Moses was master as to wisdom and reason, but not in power. In the latter Moses feared his God, and oft times had to be still and quiet, lest God could not be restrained.

We have often thought it was well for the children of Israel, that Moses and God had not both been mad at the same time. As it was, only three thousand lost their lives, instead of the whole nation. Can it be true Moses prevented God from killing off about four hundred millions of human beings? If he did, he did well.

This whole affair is ridiculously absurd under any other view, than that God was of no higher order than himself. See the destruction of the lives and property of the Canaanites, infants and mothers, each alike suffering death, while virgins, young and beautiful, were saved alive, to be used as wives and concubines. Theologians may tell us, it was God's object in all this, to destroy the Devil and his works. But where can the Devil be brought in, in the case of Pharaoh changing his better judgment, in not letting the Israelites go, when the Jewish God said he did it himself? (Yet it compares well with the Devil's general character, according to theology.) But the destruction and tormenting of King Pharaoh and his host, was the work of the Jewish God, not the Devil. Mystery No. 14.

Nothing but a revengeful tyrant would punish a man for doing that which he himself caused him to do. We find on several occasions this God doing a Devil's work, supposing no other person than a Devil would deceive a man, and then punish him for being deceived. But what does the Jewish prophets say on this subject? They say the Lord, who was Israel's God, deceived them.—Jeremiah xx. 7; Ezekiel. xiv. 9. These men were inspired to write the truth. They also say their God or Lord put a lying spirit in the mouth of four hundred of King Ahab's prophets at one time, and they lied. We ask, how could they help it? Can theology tell us? The bible says the lie they told was concocted in heaven, suggested by a spirit, and sanctioned by the Jewish God, while sitting on his throne, in the midst of all his angelic hosts.—1 Kings, xxii. 23. It was the same with King Pharaoh, when God controlled his mind expressly to get him a great name, all at the expense of the king.

We pass over, without noticing one thousand and one circumstances of a similar character, low and savage in their nature, that would now disgrace any of our present heathen nations, yet we will name one or two instances where the wrath of the Jewish God was appeased. In one case, the heads of seven men were cut off and stuck upon a pole, so as the sun could shine upon them; this was well pleasing in his sight. One other case: The God was displeased with King David, and not being fully avenged on David, exposed to shame his wives upon the housetop, by his son Absalom, who, in the sight of the sun, prostituted his father's wives, and the Lord said "he should do it in the sight of all Israel." It truly shows wisdom and good sense in other nations to look with scorn and contempt upon the Jews and their God, (being under his tuition and his direct dictation,) yet they grew worse and worse, more wicked and steeped in crime, living as they did under, "thus saith the Lord," which proves the control their God had over them did not lead to moral goodness.

The Romans, as a nation, were far superior in kindness and moral goodness, yet were driven, by necessity, to kill them on account of the blind faith they had in their God, which prevented them from surrendering. (See Josephus.)

Theologians claim that their God forsook and left them as a nation on account of their wickedness, and the bible sustains this orthodox view, and it proves the correctness of our reflecting thoughts, that the Jews, as a nation, and their God as a moral governor, was a complete failure. The third organization closing as it did, under the most heart-rending destruction, without a parallel in the history of man. Thus ended the third organization, got up by this Jewish God, according to the claims of theology. A reform in the moral condition of man, was never more necessary, so far as the Jews were concerned.

The Devil thus gaining a victory over the third organization, and but little done, if any, toward destroying him and his works. (Poor encouragement so far.) But it is claimed by our theologians, the Jewish God left the Jews, that he might associate with the Gentiles, who he once called "heathens" and "dogs;" but in fact they possessed more moral goodness than the Jews; such as old Cornelius, his equal was hard to find; also Father Job, the only perfect man named in the bible, were Gentiles.

Thus the condition of man gave rise to a new and better system of religion, and a new organization was entered into, embracing equality and universal brotherhood, taking the place of bigotry and tyranny in a great measure. This organization had in it the spirit of reform and progression, with many other things leading to virtue and moral goodness, which originated in a social band of angels (spirits), which caused the angelic world to rejoice, and many made their appearance at the time, singing songs of gladness with great joy.

This system of religion being so foreign and different from that taught by Moses and his God, it was said by the Jews to be of the Devil, and they treated it as such, and put to death the founder and prime mover in this grand reform. But the same God was acknowledged by a large portion of the adherents, yet he was never known throughout the organization to have shown his face or any of his parts. But our divines say he overshadowed a virgin, and she brought forth a son, and he officiated in his stead. But be this as it may, he did not act in any sense like the Jewish God, providing he was by him begotten. He took no delight in murder and rapine, he discarded revenge, and condemned retaliation, sympathized with man in all his afflictions, a friend to the sinner and those who erred, taught moral goodness in all he said and did, was mild and loving in his ways, except when talking with the Jewish priests. For this no one will blame him, who can realize what a cursed set they were. (This expression does them no injustice, though it is harsh.) It is out of the question for a father to produce a son so unlike himself. He resembled the Jewish God in no sense whatever as to character, disposition or animal passion. It was a libel and gross slander, to charge him as being the son of the Jewish God. He acknowledged the God of nature, only referring to the Jewish God when remonstrating against them, but claimed universal fatherhood and brotherhood, and himself the son of man in the common sense of blood relation. This the Jews called blasphemy, and treated as such.

This organization was like all before it, inasmuch as it had the ruling passion of man; and having gained a victory under the generalship of Constantine, tyranny ruled, and the sword and bludgeon again was instituted. Here the fourth organization fell, merging itself into what was called the Church of Rome, and from that into the present Roman Catholic Church, called by the Protestants the Devil's church. Here ends the fourth organization, falling as it did into the hands of the Devil.

Here we would say, notwithstanding its fall and failure, there were prophets, seers or mediums in it, who looked down through time, saw this organization represented to their spiritual view under the figure of a woman, called "the great whore, the mother of harlots, and abominations of the earth," and she was drunk with the blood of those who had respect for moral goodness. How strange indeed, that blood and carnage were once the delight of a merciful God! Now the Church of Rome is charged with being drunk with the blood of saints, those who belonged to the class of which Jesus was one, who suffered and died under the hands of gods, high priests, clothed with the power of the priesthood.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

My Creed.

I do not know if future life
Has weal or woe for me;
I only know his laws of love
Forever more shall be.

I do not know that for my sake
A Jesus bled and died;
I think of all who for truth's sake
The world has crucified.

I do not know where God abides,
Nor of his great white throne;
I stretch my hand in darkness,
And childlike touch his own.

I do not know if works and faith
Will buy me heaven's joy;
The holy right to bless mankind
Is heaven without alloy.

I do not know that earth's ones,
In endless pain shall moan;
I only know that God is love,
And he will claim his own.

I know not that for one man's sin
All men to grief are born;
I only know the truth of this,
"Blessed are they that mourn."

I do not know that wrong and might
Will wrap the world in sin;
For right is right, since God is God
And right the day must win.

I do not ask that for truth's sake
I constant praise shall find,
If no reproach come to my name,
The blessing were not mine.

Among the pitfalls round our way
All of us blindly move;
Be careful! If thy brother falls
Give him thy hand in love.

Northumberland, Pa.

D. L. H.

THE Mohammedans of Constantinople, in a pamphlet called "Asia's Cry of Anguish," complain that their religion is likely to be overrun by English, Dutch and Russian "barbarians." The claim is put forth that Mohammedanism represents all of science and culture that Asia possesses, and Asiatics are besought to combine and resist the invaders.

Theology.

(Continued from our last.)

Nature is an outbirth of soul: natural existences are representative, corresponding to spiritual or substantial causes. Material substance has no definite form nor shape of its own; form is an effect, the result of the spiritual potentiality, its actual dynamic energy being manifested in the production of form.

Wherever form is manifested, there must be an interior and divine principle, termed spirit, soul or substance, which principle in its essence is life or love, the form and embodiment is wisdom, truth practically expressed, which is goodness. Therefore love, wisdom, truth and goodness exist in the divine humanity or Grand Man.

Love and wisdom can, by no possibility, exist outside of man's spiritual perceptions; that is, they cannot become objective to him as abstract principles or substances; we cannot, by the most strenuous effort, conceive a form, called love, neither can such form be created nor produced; also, as an individualized entity, there is and can be no such existence as wisdom.

What then is love? It is the going forth of the potentiality of the soul in action; potential life can only reach fullness of perfection in its activity.

To evolve and bring forth to freedom and spontaneous action, this divine life principle is the true aim of all philosophy and science.

As all general effects are made up of an infinite variety of particular causes, the general advancement, development and progress of humanity is made up of the free, spontaneous action of each individual, just as the general character of an individual is made up of the numerous and varied motives which successively actuate him.

Every individual atomic man, being part of the universal or Grand Man, is qualified to fulfil and perform some special function and use, existing in truthful relation to part or parts of such universal man, absorbed in the performance of such use; feeling a spiritual attraction or gravity to perform it; losing consciousness of self in seeking, promoting and advancing the happiness of all, he individually contributes to the glorification of the divine humanity.

The "regeneration" or "renewing of the mind" in individuals; the development, civilization and glorification of humanity is attended with great difficulties and numberless trials; they must be experienced, for man having once perceived the beauty and attractiveness of a higher life, has no peace, rest nor satisfaction whilst remaining in those internal associations, habits and manners, which he perceives are inimical to such superior state; not that the condition and state of his fellows is so bad; not external matters pertaining to society, but rather the state and condition of the self, the individual and inner man, and from which he earnestly desires to be liberated, crying, "who will deliver me from the body of this death?"

This is the transition state, the beginning of wisdom.

What is wisdom? Truth applied to life and use practically, ultimating in goodness; goodness being predicated of wisdom, being the ultimatum of truth in practical application to life and use in accordance with wisdom.

What is truth? That which concerns the realities and actualities of life, relating and belonging to individual collective and aggregate human life; of the system; the planet, the universe, it is one and inseparable, indivisible and eternal.

To man, individual man, it is a ray of light, illuminating his understanding; truth or light is received in the understanding, (as a receiver or receptive vessel), by and through the will; the mind of man seeking truth is open to its reception, and persistence in the seeking or pursuit of truth, its reception by the understanding, subsequent digestion and appropriation through the will to life and use is "regeneration;" there is and can be no other.

This gives nutriment and real growth to the man in his aspirations toward the infinite; since humanity is made up of individuals, the same action and consequent state or condition in the whole, make up the glorification of humanity.

Goodness, then, we repeat, is the reception of truth in the understanding, by the will and its application to life and use, by its loves and affections, unconsciously and spontaneously; there is, and can be no personification or personal expression of love and wisdom, goodness and truth, except by and through man; it is in man, not outside of him, these principles will be found.

Further, we have been led to believe, by education and other influences thrown around us in childhood, that the sensual portion of our nature is our enemy. This is a gross error; the sensual is as sacred and holy as the spiritual, and as necessary, for there can be no real, conscious existence of the individual until an actual phenomenal one has been acquired on the sensuous, physical plane of earth life.

Nature and history are portals or entrances into the realm of consciousness, they constitute an inevitable matrix, a preliminary mould or womb for the ultimatum and birth into spiritual life.

Nature, in its objective bearing, attesting the omnipresent, vitalizing principle on the lower and sensuous plane; history equally attesting man's subjective reaction upon nature, his steady and continuous rise by successive ascensive and discrete degrees toward the infinite, his spiritual consciousness (the keystone of the arch of life), insuring to him continuity of existence and eternal progression.

We, therefore, assert that the evils which effect the sensual nature of man are not the greatest, being in themselves only effects of internal and spiritual causes, (phenomenal only,) the supposition that they are, however, constitutes one of the greatest hindrances to the reception of truths, by which alone humanity can be elated and glorified.

The greatest and most mischievous evils are those false and erroneous ideas concerning God, the creation of man, his fall, total depravity and utter sinfulness, the unnatural and miraculous conception and birth of Jesus as a Savior, his sacrificial sufferings and death, physical resurrection and ascension to effect an atonement, expiatory and mediatorial, with God for man; the doctrines also of the Holy Spirit, his workings and strivings with man; repentance and faith in such Savior as being superior to a life morality, charity and use; these and others growing out of and connected with them, are the real obstacles to the reception of regenerating truth; such teachings are poisonous to the mind, paralyzing, weakening and destroying its life and power, the virus has penetrated and permeates the whole Christian world.

These doctrines and teachings modify the institutions of society, enslave and destroy individual thought and spiritual life, demanding that reason shall be subservient and subordinate to faith or educated belief in an utter impossibility, impossible because contrary to the order and rule of action of unchangeable love and wisdom. Before man can rise to a position capable of receiving, possessing power to digest and apply truth, he must be vastated, emptied of all such fables, fables which are now degrading, enslaving and crushing to the human soul.

Truth is one, as God is one; this infinite life principle permeates all material and spiritual existence, there can be no antagonism with perfect qualities and essences, if it were possible to exist in the realms of infinitude, an empire of sin, misery and endless wretchedness. God, as a principle, would be there: there can be no empire, no power at war with infinite principles; of this principle is the life of all things, the love of all things, and the death of all things; life and death are one.

It is of and through this infinite principle, the lightning's flash, the tempest and storm rages, the hurricane or zephyr blows, the world moves silently and harmoniously in its orbit with its sister planets; the whirlwind, hurricane, earthquakes, floods, fires, destruction and devastation by any and all means; frost, flood and flame are all of this omnipresent and eternal principle.

The general warmth of Spring, the returning vigor and growth of the vegetable world, after the dreariness and seeming death of Winter, clothing the bosom of earth with beauty, foliage and flowers, the sunshine and clouds, grief and joy, sorrow and gladness, love and happiness, hatred and misery, life and death, each and all are manifestations of the same infinite and eternal life principle, God.

As perfection must, of necessity, be free from the limitations which environ all finite existence, there can be no goodness, wisdom nor love; no wickedness, ignorance nor hatred; no subjective nor objective, but containing within its own infinite and eternal constitution the principles of all harmony, unconsciously active in accordance with its own intrinsic quality and essence; without either extension or progression, neither time nor space, high, low, great nor small, its presence will "extend through all extent," "live through all life," fill, bound, and equal all.

The great totality of all beings, the coronation of the universe, as man, finite man is the coronation of physical nature.

God and goodness are synonymous, being the ultimatum of truth, its practicable application to life and use in accordance with wisdom; the natural, logical and inevitable conclusion is that there can be no expression or personification of principle, except in and through man, universal man.

When the human mind is expanded and developed, when its varied elements assume "form and order," when its qualities and attributes become harmonized and adapted to each other, reconciled and in a state of oneness, then the oneness of the life principle, wherever and however manifested, will be perceived, for the individual human mind will become more and more pantheistic as it advances in goodness, wisdom, love and harmony.

For "all souls shall be in God, and shall be God, and nothing but God be."

God and man are one. The divine humanity is the incarnation of the divine in man universally. J. F.

It is said that the resignation of the Rev. Adirondack Murray was accepted in 1:14, the fastest time on church record.

(Continued from Page 5.)

"He also is my beloved servant, who is the same in friendship and hatred, in honor and in dishonor, in cold and heat, in pain and pleasure; who is unsolicitous about the event of things; to whom praise and blame are as one; who is of little speech, and pleased with whatever cometh to pass; who owneth no particular home, and who is of a steady mind."

"The man born to divine destiny is endued with the following qualities: Exemption from fear, a purity of heart, a constant attention to the discipline of his understanding, charity, self-restraint, religion, study, penance, rectitude, freedom from doing wrong, veracity, freedom from anger, resignation, temperance, freedom from slander, universal compassion, exemption from the desire of slaughter, mildness, modesty, discretion, dignity, patience, fortitude, chastity, unrevengedness, and freedom from vain-glory; whilst those who come into life under the influence of the evil destiny, are distinguished by pride, hypocrisy, presumption, anger, harshness of speech and ignorance."

BUDDHA, another demi-god, who was claimed by his numerous disciples to possess an equally divine and human nature, and like the last, these were inculcated and written centuries before Christ's time, taught as follows:

"A man who foolishly does me a wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love, the more good shall go from me. The fragrance of these good actions always redounding to me, the harm of the slanderous words returning to him."

"A man who cherishes lust and desire, and does not aim after supreme knowledge, is like a vase of dirty water, in which all sorts of beautiful objects are placed; the water being shaken up, men can see nothing of the beautiful objects therein placed; so lust and desire, causing confusion and disorder in the heart, are like the mud in the water—they prevent our seeing the beauty of supreme reason. But if a man, by the gradual process of confession and penance, comes near to the acquirement of knowledge, then, the mud in the water being removed, all is clear and pure; remove the pollution, and immediately, of itself, comes forth the substantial form. So the three poisons—covetousness, anger, delusion—which rage within the heart, and the five obscurities—envy, passion, sloth, vacillation, unbelief—which embrace it, effectually prevent one from obtaining supreme reason. But once get rid of the pollution of the heart, and then we perceive the spiritual portion of ourselves, which we have had from the first, although involved in the net of life and death."

"If a man commits a sin, let him not do it again; pain is the outcome of evil."

"If a man does what is good, let him do it again; let him delight in it; happiness is the outcome of good."

"Let a man overcome anger with love; let him overcome evil by good; let him overcome the greedy by liberality, the liar by the truth."

"He who holds back rising anger like a rolling chariot, him I call a real driver; other people are but holding the reins."

"There is no fire like passion, no shark like hatred, no snare like folly, no torrent like greed."

"He who, by causing pain to others, wishes to obtain pleasure himself, entangled in the bonds of hatred, will never be free from hatred."

"Not to commit any sin, to do good, and to purify one's mind, that is the teaching of the Awakened."

BUDDHA'S FIVE COMMANDMENTS.—1. Not to destroy life. 2. Not to obtain another's property by unjust means. 3. Not to indulge the passions, so as to invade the legal or natural rights of other men. 4. Not to tell lies. 5. Not to partake of anything intoxicating."

CONFUCIUS, the Chinese reformer and philosopher, taught as follows, more than five hundred years before Christ:

"When you go abroad, behave to every one as if you were receiving a great guest, as if you were assisting at a great sacrifice."

"Do not to others as you would not wish done to yourself. What you do not want done to yourself, do not do unto others."

"Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles."

"Have no friends not equal to yourself."

"When you have faults, do not fear to abandon them."

"To subdue one's self and return to propriety, is perfect virtue. If a man can for one day subdue himself, and return to propriety, all under heaven will ascribe perfect virtue to him."

"The superior man is modest in speech, but exceeds in actions."

"The way of the superior man is three-fold. Virtuous, he is free from anxieties; wise, he is free from perplexities; bold, he is free from fear."

"The superior man thinks of virtue; the small man thinks of comfort. The superior man thinks of the sanctions of the law; the small man thinks of the favors which he may receive."

We must for the present be content with the few quotations here given, which are but a very small fraction of the voluminous teachings of these reformers, and to omit entirely the sayings of others of the ancients. We trust, however, by the above, we have shown morals as pure, sentiments as sound, as beautiful in conception and expression as the most admired enunciations attributed to Jesus, and were made by others long before his time. Even the "Golden Rule," which is claimed to be the most sublime and God-like of all his utterances, was not first taught by him, but was distinctly taught by Confucius more than five hundred years before he taught it. Could the sayings and teachings of those ancient heathen philosophers and reformers be incorporated into the Christians' Bible, how easy it would be for them to recognize their superior and divine character, and accord to them the same adoration they yield to what their bible now contains? The absurd claim of our Christian friends, that the "beatitudes of Jesus" originated with him, and that Christianity is parent of all the morality in the world, we see falls completely to the ground.

Our Offers.

To our patrons, who have not renewed for the Second Volume and will do so within the next thirty days, as well as to new subscribers who send $1.75, we will send Vol. II of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Blakeman's Two Hundred Poetical Riddles.

To those who send us $2.10 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, Blakeman's Two Hundred Poetical Riddles, and either of the following standard works: Burns' Poems, the Arabian Nights, complete, or either of Marryat's Novels, Robinson Crusoe, Chas. Lamb's Essays of Elia, Tom Jones, by Fielding, The Scottish Chiefs, Sterne's Sentimental Journey, or Colleen Bawn.

To those who send $2.35 we will send them THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Two Hundred Poetical Riddles," and "Shakespeare's Complete Works," containing over 1000 pages and thirty-six illustrations.

To those who send us $4.00 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1875, The Ladies' Own Magazine for 1875, with sixty-four pages, and a fine Oil Chromo in sixteen colors, The Herald of Health, a monthly of forty-eight pages and Shakespeare's Complete Works.

To those who will send us four new subscribers, who have not before been upon our books, remitting us $7.00, we will send a copy of THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH of 500 pages in paper. To those who will send us six new subscribers, we will send a bound copy of the same. All sent post-paid by mail.

TO TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS we send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months for 25 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER three months and Blakeman's Two Hundred Poetical Riddles for 35cts.

THE TRUTH SEEKER three months and Lamb's Essays or Scottish Chiefs, Robinson Crusoe, either of Marryat's novels, Burns' Poems for 50cts.

THE TRUTH SEEKER three months and Shakespeare's works complete for 80cts.

Let all our readers become agents for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and let us see how far we can extend its circulation.

To those of our patrons who have already so generously renewed and wish the books named, we will send as follows: Blakeman's Poetical Riddles, 10cts. (This is half-price and is made only to those who have renewed their subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER). For 25cts. additional we will send either Lamb's Essays of Elia, Sterne's Sentimental Journey, Burns' Poems, Robinson Crusoe, The Scottish Chiefs, Colleen Bawn, The Arabian Nights or either of Marryat's Novels sent post paid. Who wants standard works at half price?

AFTER THIS NUMBER the postage on all newspapers will have to be paid in advance by publishers. We shall make no extra charge for THE TRUTH SEEKER on this account. We only ask that the patronage be generous.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS.—This eminent Magnetic Physician is now treating the sick with great success by his Magnetic Powder. We would recommend to those who require the services of a reliable physician to send to him. His powder is $1 per box. His address is Vineland, N. J.

A Great Convenience.

A PATENT BINDER.

We have made arrangements with the manufacturers of Koch's Patent Binder made to fit THE TRUTH SEEKER, so we can send them, post-paid by mail, with heavy board, cloth back and marbled paper sides, at 90 cents. All cloth, with THE TRUTH SEEKER handsomely stamped on the front in gold letters, for $1.10. This is an excellent invention; numbers of the paper can be easily and firmly inserted, and it holds them as securely as a bound book. It is the best thing of the kind that has been gotten up. It saves the numbers from getting lost, soiled or worn, and makes them a convenient volume for reference. Those who wish one, will let us know.

THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.—Bro. Wilson's paper makes its appearance regularly, and seems to improve as he becomes more accustomed to the editorial harness. It is a very readable, well printed paper. We are pleased to learn his subscription list is growing these hard times, and his hopes are cheering that his paper will become a permanent success. Let our Spiritualistic friends not forget him. His price is $2 for fifty-two numbers, or $1 for half that number. Bro. Wilson is a hard worker, and deserves encouragement. His address is Lombard, Ill.

THE SPIRITUAL MAGAZINE No. 1, Vol. 1, of this new publication of thirty-two pages, by Samuel Watson, of Memphis, Tenn., is upon our table. It is well gotten up, ably edited, and is well calculated to fill a place not hitherto occupied with the Spiritualistic public. The price is $1.50 a year, or 15 cents single numbers. Let there be a generous disposition to aid the new candidate for public favor. Address S. WATSON, 225 Union street, Memphis, Tenn.

THE NORTHWESTERN MAGAZINE.—We intended to notice this new visitor in our last number. The Freeman was merged into this excellent publication. It is Liberal and Literary. It is presented in good style, the articles are well written, and it richly deserves a place on the centre-table of every Liberal in the country. It contains sixty-four pages, and is not surpassed in a literary point of view by any magazine in the country. W. S. BURKE, Editor; STREET, WHITE & BOWEN, Publishers, 121 Lake St., Chicago. Price, $2.50.

EATING FOR STRENGTH is the title of a medium volume of 160 pages, by Dr. M. L. Holbrook, of this city. It comprises, 1st. The Science of Health. 2d. Receipts for Wholesome Cookery. 3d. Receipts for Wholesome Drinks. 4th. Answers to ever recurring questions. It is a concise, practical, useful publication which has immediate reference to our health and well being. The recipes alone are worth double its price. Sent by mail for $1. We have it for sale.

ACHILLE'S WRATH.—A composite translation of the first book of Homer's Iliad. Prepared by our friend, P. Roosevelt Johnson, M.D., of Sag Harbor, N. Y. A neat pamphlet of 42 pages from the press of Colby & Rich. It is a compilation from the principle translations of the best part of Homer's great Poem, which has not been excelled in four thousand years. Every person wishing the greatest poem the world has yet produced, should send for a copy. Price, 25cts. We have it.

Donations.

Jacob Reedy, $2 75; J. M. Kendall, $1; Wm. Reichkoff, $1; O. W. Lackey, 50c.; E. McGee, 50c.; Wm. McLenn, J. H. Alexander, Augustus Bailey, A. L. Grinnell, C. B. Lusk and Eliza Purchas, 25c. each.

We trust we feel duly grateful to our kind friends, and ask them to accept our sincere thanks.

THE daily papers inform us Mr. Beecher has recently placed another mortgage of $15,000 upon his Brooklyn home. Some of the unregenerate are so lost as to wonder how a humble follower of the "meek and lowly Jesus," whose income amounts to the handsome sum of $60,000 per year, should find it necessary to repeatedly mortgage his home. Do his lawyers require such munificent pay, or can it be possible he has any use for "hush-money?"

G. L. Henderson's Article.

NO. IX.

WOMAN vs. PRIEST.

"The survival of the fittest" was well illustrated two years ago in Washington Prairie, Winneshiek Co., Iowa, where I had been sent for to reply to a gentleman of the Methodist persuasion, who proposed to show that Christianity was the best religion, because it enabled men to die happily, while men of science dreaded to meet the last scene which restored man to the inorganic world from whence he came. The house was unusually crowded, as it was known that I was there, and a reply was expected.

The gentleman spoke long and loud, until both he and his audience were exhausted, but finally closed about the time when the candles had burned low in their sockets, so that if any more speaking was done, it would have to be in total darkness. As he closed, a call was immediately made for me to take the platform. The gentleman said he would be glad to hear the reply, but he must defer that pleasure, as the lights were about to expire at this important crisis.

A woman's voice was heard in the far corner of the room. "Ladies and gentlemen keep your seats. I am happy to announce that I have a good supply of candles here. When I came in this evening I noticed that every candle had been cut off to a uniform length and were intended to last only while the Christian continued to speak. But, as I wished to hear both sides, I sent my son home as fast as he could ride to bring a dozen of new candles, and here they are," as she began deliberately to put them in the place of the expiring candles, amid bursts of applause and laughter.

The discomfited clergyman at once saw that he had been outwitted by a woman, who had probably read with care the memorable text, "Be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves." Mrs. James Daniels is therefore a case in point illustrating the truth of the law of the survival of the fittest. You can imagine the benediction which she received from the Reverend gentleman, as he sat down to hear the facts about the death-bed scenes of Voltaire, Humboldt, David Hume, Adam Smith, Thomas Paine and Thomas Jefferson, whose lives and deaths are worthy the imitation of all good men and women, as compared with the terrible death scenes of Luther, Henry the VIII., Queen Elizabeth, Dr. Johnson, and other Christians.

The Protestants accuse the Catholics of vile misrepresentation when they write about the death of Protestant saints. But when Catholics write about the death-beds of philosophers whom they both equally hate, every word is accepted as divine truth, and is published by the London and American tract societies, and greedily swallowed by the faithful as a matter of fact.

On the evening referred to, when, thanks to a shrewd woman's wit, we were enabled to furnish the believers in miracles a double share of light.

First. Mrs. Daniels made a pyrotechnic display to the disgust of the reverend gentleman who had spent two hours in blackening and falsifying the memory of men such as Voltaire and then intended to leave the whole shrouded in darkness.

Second. Under the light of authentic history and Mrs. Daniel's candles, I went on to show the following facts relative to the death of Voltaire as given by Condorcet.

First. Voltaire lived and died nominally a member of the Roman Catholic Church, and in all that he wrote against superstition he had to so write that if tried for heresy he could, like Queen Elizabeth of England, or Cervantes of Spain, make it impossible for men to show that there really was heresy in his writings. In those days to oppose Christianity was to incur the risk of the rack, the gallows or the fagot in this world, and an endless hell in the next. Voltaire was trained among the Jesuits, and he became a consummate master of their own art. For he well knew that he wrote with the halter around his neck, and he had to launch his thunderbolts of sarcasm against the Church and the fathers, and still show outward respect for them and their dogmas. Writing of Abraham he says: "We must say nothing of what is divine in Abraham since the scriptures have said all. We must not even touch, except with a respectful heart, that which belongs to the profane—that which belongs to geography, with chronology and custom; for these being connected sacred history are so many streams which preserve something of the divinity of their source.

The account according to the Register is as follows:

Gen. ix, 26, "And Terah lived seventy years and begat Abraham, Nahor and Haran." 32d verse, "And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years, and Terah died in Haran." Chapter xxii, 1, "Now the Lord had said unto Abraham, get me out of thy country and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land which I will show thee, and I will make of thee a great nation."

"It is sufficiently evident from the text," says Voltaire, "that Terah having had Abraham at the age of seventy, died at the age of two hundred and five; and Abraham having quitted Chaldea immediately after the death of his father, was just one hundred and thirty-five years old when he left his country. This is nearly the opinion of St. Stephen in his discourse to the Jews, (Acts 7th chapter).

But the Book of Genesis also says (chapter xxii, 4,) "And Abraham was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran.

This is the principle cause (for there are several others) of the dispute on the subject of Abraham's age. How could it be at once a hundred and thirty-five years and seventy-five. St. Jerome and St. Augustine say that this difficulty is inexplicable. Father Calmet, who confesses that these two saints could not resolve the problem, thinks he does it, by saying that Abraham was the youngest of Terah's son, although the book of Genesis names him the first, and consequently the eldest.

According to Genesis, Abraham was born in his father's seventieth year; while, according to Calmet, he was born when his father was one hundred and thirty. Such a reconciliation has only been a new cause of controversy.

Consequently the uncertainty in which we are left by both text and commentary, the best we can do is to adore without disputing. So that according to Genesis xii and iv Abraham would be five years older than his father.

"According to Moreri, there were in his day, seventy systems of Chronology founded on the history dictated by God himself. There have since appeared five new methods of reconciling the various texts of scripture. Thus there are as many disputes about Abraham as the number of his years (according to the text) when he left Haran. And of these seventy-five systems, there is not one which tells us precisely what or where this village of Haran was. What thread shall guide us in this labyrinth of conjecture and contradiction from the first verse to the very last? Resignation with the above sample of this style of writing you will see that Voltaire was compelled by Christian tyranny to write like a Jesuit.

So I shall proceed to show that because of the same tyranny he was compelled to die like a Jesuit.

The Abbe Gauthier confessed Voltaire, and received from him a profession of faith, by which he declared he should die in the Catholic religion in which he was born. When this circumstance became known, it offended enlightened men more than it edified the devotees. The curate of St. Sulpice ran to his parishioner (Voltaire) who received him with politeness, and gave him, as was his custom, a handsome offering for the poor. But mortified that the abbe's hand anticipated him, he pretended that he ought to have required a particular profession of faith, and an express disavowal of all the heretical doctrines which Voltaire had been accused of maintaining. The abbe declared that by requiring everything, all would be lost. During this dispute, Voltaire recovered, Irene was played and the profession of faith was forgotten. But, at the moment of his relapse, the curate returned to Voltaire absolutely resolved not to inter him if he could not obtain the desired recantation.

"The curate was one of those men who are a mixture of hypocrisy and imbecility; he spoke with the obstinate persuasion of a maniac, and with the flexibility of a Jesuit. He wished to bring Voltaire to acknowledge at least the divine nature of Jesus Christ—a dogma, to which he was more attached than to any other; and for this purpose he one day aroused him from his lethargy by shouting in his ear, "Do you believe the divinity of Jesus Christ?" "In the name of God, sir, speak to me no more of that man but let me die in peace."

He died on the 30th day of May, 1778.

The curate was dissatisfied with his recantation, and declared that he was obliged to refuse him burial, but he was not authorized in this refusal; for according to law it ought to have been preceded by excommunication. He was buried at Secliers, and the priests agreed not to interfere with the funeral.

However, two pious ladies of distinguished rank and very great devotees, wrote to the bishop of Troyes to engage him in opposing the burial; but, fortunately for the honor of the bishop, the letters did not reach him till after the funeral. No wonder that the Church hated him after death as much as they had feared him while living; for according to their own statement he is now a saint in glory and yet they admit that he died as he had lived—the friend of Reason and the enemy of superstition; for his last words uttered the conviction that the man-god of the Church was to him but a man.

Condorcet concludes his admirable life of Voltaire in the following words:

"It ought not to be forgotten that Voltaire, when in the height of his glory, and while, throughout Europe, he exercised a power over the minds of men hitherto unparalleled. The expressive words—'The little good I have done, is my best of works' was the unaffected sentiment that held possession of his soul.

Thus and much more I was enabled to say in behalf of the glorious dead, because a woman had wit enough to outwit a Protestant Jesuit in the glorious free State of Iowa.

TEN THOUSAND FEET ABOVE THE SEA. — The Western Union Telegraph Company has opened offices at Fair Play and Alma, Colorado. The latter place is supposed to be the highest regular telegraph station in the world, being ten thousand five hundred feet above the level of the sea.

Friendly Correspondence.

W. E. CRANDALL, St. Catharine, Mo., writes: I would not do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, if it costs me the price of a cow. Set me down as a life subscriber. It is my Bible, Hymn and Prayer Book.

C. L. HEATH, Angola, Ind., sending in the names of fifteen new subscribers, writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper of the kind I have ever seen. My papers are doing missionary work here, and are universally liked. Yours, &c.

S. F. WOODARD, Osborn, Ohio, writes: I take more papers by one-half than I get time to read, but I cannot think of neglecting THE TRUTH SEEKER, the brightest gem of them all. In quality, your paper is a success. May it prove so financially. The cause of truth needs sharp, vigorous and manly strokes. Rest not till you have torn down the ancient strongholds of bigotry, superstition and ignorance.

AN ESTEEMED FRIEND writes us thus: At home, Lamar Co., Texas, Nov. 13th 1874, 11½ o'clock p. m. My very much respected friend, D. M. Bennett, Yours of Oct. 23rd came to hand in due time. I was glad to hear that you were not only living but working. I have trembled many times for the life of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think I admire it more than any journal I ever read.

I don't recollect when my paid time is out. I shall send $2 in this letter to add what I have already paid. Your articles on the Bible are truly delicious. I read "Old Abe and Little Ike," to a congregation a few Sundays ago. I have written out my creed, and read that in several congregations last summer. It is a strong dose. I have been a Methodist, and I have been a Cumberland Presbyterian. But now I regard myself as a confirmed disbeliever in the Bible—I hold that it is no more the word of God, than Webster's Unabridged, or any other book.

But Brother Bennett, I believe in being a GOOD MAN. I don't allow myself to do anything which my conscience condemns. I think I am as happy a man as any Christian I know of in the world. Well, the clock has struck 12, so, I am into to-morrow—I must correct the date of my letter, so here goes. Nov. 14th 1874. Now I must fold, put $2 in envelope, back, and then go to bed. I was born 1799, Jan. 31. I guess my race is nearly run, but my health is fine at the present. Farewell. J. A. RUTHERFORD.

THOS. H. DODGE, Oxford, O., writes: FRIEND BENNETT:

John M. Starn is very wise, And lauds your paper to the skies. He says he can't have it a minute Unless he reads what there's in it. So enclosed you will find $3.50 to pay his and my subscriptions to this volume.

So send it along without delay, Don't stop to wait another day. I am trying to get you more subscribers, for I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best papers in the world. I send you a few verses that I hurriedly wrote about my niece and her baby. If you will publish them in your paper they will doubtless please the boys on "Long St."

Clara's got another baby,
Darling, precious little "tyke,"
Grandma says, and she knows surely,
That you never saw its like.

Isn't it a beaming beauty,
Lying there so sweet and snug—
Mrs. Dye pray stop your scandal,
Darling's nose is not a pug.

Some one says, "'tis pa all over,"
Whereat pa turns rather red,
And to scan his features quickly
To the looking-glass has fled.

But recovers his composure
When he hears the nurse's story.
Who admits that, of all babies,
This indeed's the crowning glory.

Now aunt Mary says she guesses,
Says, indeed, she knows its Pa's;
That 'twill prove to be a greater
Man than e'er its father was.

Proving thus the modern thesis,
Held by reverend doctors sage—
That in babies, as in wisdom,
This is a progressive age.

Uncle Tom looks on, and wonders
At so great a prodigy;
Close, and closer still he presses,
Thinking something brave to see.

Up they hold the babe before him,
While they gather in a ring.
But alas the staggered uncle
Vainly tries its praise to sing.

As he stares, the lovely infant,
Nestling by its mother's side,
Opens its little mouth, and smiling,
Gurgles forth a milky tide.

Uncle tries to hide his blushes,
Looks about to find his hat,
Stumbles blindly o'er the cradle,
And upsets the startled cat.

Why, oh why such awkward blunders?
Better far have stayed away;
Nor have thrust yourself where women
Hold an undisputed sway.

Do you think that now they'll name it
As they meant to, after you?
Wretched mortal, let me answer,
You're deluded if you do.

Round about the noisy women
Pass the helpless stranger now:
Raptured with each nascent feature,
Chin, and mouth, and eyes, and brow.

And for this young bud of promise
All neglect the rose in bloom;
Eldest born, who, quite forgotten,
Pouts within his lonely room.

Blow the whistle! Ring the car-bell!
That the waiting world may know;
Publish it through all our borders,
Even unto Mexico.

Seize your pen, oh dreaming poet,
And in numbers smooth as may be,
Spread afar the joyful tidings,
Clara's got another baby.

UNCLE TOM.

Elder Zebedee Harkins.

Sermon No. 2.

[Reported by THOMAS A. DIDYMUS.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington, D. C.

"Go ye into all the world and preach my Gospel to every creature. He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not, shall be damned. And these signs shall follow them that believe: In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues. They shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

The Elder is in the habit of reading a whole chapter as a prelude to the regular exercises, but last Sunday he only read the four verses quoted, and laying down the Bible, he picked up the hymn-book and lined out that holy war song:

"Am I a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the Lamb;
And shall I fear to own his cause,
Or blush to speak his name?"

Brother Stutsman pitched the tune, and the whole congregation joined in and sang with as much enthusiasm as the boys in blue were wont to sing:

"We'll rally round the flag, boys,
We'll rally once again,
Shouting the battle-cry of freedom."

The Elder's prayer was rather long, and as it contained nothing new, it will be omitted.

On rising from his knees—he always bends the knee and bows the head when he addresses the Lord of hosts—he asked brother Stutsman to sing:

"Jesus, my all, to heaven is gone.
He whom I fix my hopes upon."

Before old Uncle Ben Allison and Aunt Sally Stuart—both of whom sing with more unction than time, and more spirit than understanding, and who always come out a stave or two behind at the close—had ceased to roll the last dying sentence of this inspiring hymn from their divinely-tuned throats out upon the palpitating air, the Elder had opened his bible and begun to read his text—none other than the lesson already quoted. Closing the holy volume with great deliberation, and removing his spectacles, he began his sermon.

"My beloved brethren and sisters, and you my impenitent fellow-traveler to the bar of God, I want to call your attention to the fact that the Scriptures of divine truth are plain and easy to understand. 'He that runs may read,' and the wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein. If we will only take the Lord at his word, it's all plain sailing.

Secondly, I want you to take notice, my beloved congregation, who it was that used the language quoted as my text. It was the Lord Jesus Christ himself—the Word of God. Therefore this text comes to us with all the power and authority of a direct, and positive, and unequivocal command from on high.

There are several points in this text, but I will confine myself to the three most important.

First, The plan of salvation.

Secondly, The means of salvation.

Thirdly, The consequences of rejecting the gospel.

"Go ye into all the world, and preach my gospel to every creature." This, my beloved brethren, was the last command of our blessed Lord before he ascended to his Father and our God.

He had taught them by precept and example for three years in the wilderness, and on the mountain and in the synagogue. They had heard the words of everlasting life, as they fell from his blessed lips, and now as he was about to leave them and take up his abode at the right hand of the Majesty on high, he commands them to go into all the world and preach the words of life he had preached to them. Thus we see, my beloved brethren, the great plan of salvation depends on preaching.

Yea, 'by the foolishness of preaching are men saved,' says the Apostle Paul. "Thank God for this gospel plan of salvation. And right here I want to notice, and refute one of the heresies of these modern times. It is this: Some of our own preachers, and many of other denominations, not to speak of the Universalists and Unitarians, who are all Infidels, and don't deserve to be counted among the Lord's hosts; I say some even of our own preachers have been carried away with the idea of progress, and are preaching a new gospel, and not the gospel of our risen Lord.

They talk about intellectual and moral development, and call religion a science, and all such blasphemous and anti-Christian stuff. Now this is all a trick of the Devil, and all these learned, scientific and philosophical preachers are the Devil's allies. They are not preaching the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, but the doctrines of Pagan philosophers, and modern Spiritualists and Infidels. Hear brother Paul on this point. He says to his brethren, 'I am resolved to know nothing among you but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.' And again he says: 'If any man preach any other doctrine than this, let him be accursed.'

Amen. Thank the Lord, we have got a gospel that is perfect, unchangeable and easy to preach, and the weakest mind can understand it.

And this brings me to the second point in my discourse. The means of grace or salvation: 'He that believeth shall be saved.' That's the condition, my friends. Faith in the Lord Jesus Christ is all that is required, and this has power to save the vilest of the vile. The thief on the cross, or the murderer on the scaffold can look to Jesus and live, for has he not said: 'He that cometh to the Father in my name, shall in no wise be cast out.' And again he says: 'Whatsoever ye ask in my name, that shall ye receive.'

Yes, my beloved brethren, faith is the saving power of the gospel of Christ. If salvation depended on knowledge, none but the wise could get to heaven. If it depended on righteousness, the whole world would be damned, for there is none righteous in all the land. But, bless God, all can believe, and therefore all can be saved.

By faith are ye saved, and that not of yourselves. Ah! my beloved brethren and sisters, faith is what we need. By faith Enoch walked with God three hundred years, and then God took him bodily to himself, that he might not taste death. By faith Noah built the Ark, whereby he and his family were saved, while all the unbelievers were drowned by the flood. By faith Abraham offered up his favorite son Isaac at the command of God. By faith Sarah conceived and bore a son in her old age. By faith the walls of Jericho fell down. By faith Joshua commanded the sun to stand still, and it obeyed him, and ceased to go down for the space of three hours. By faith Samson slew the Philistines with the jaw-bone of an ass. By faith Moses smote the rock in the wilderness, and the waters gushed forth to quench the thirst of the multitude. By faith Elijah was caught up to heaven in a chariot of fire. By faith the mouths of the lions were stopped, so that they could not hurt Daniel. By faith the three Hebrew children escaped from the fiery furnace unhurt. By faith have the lepers been healed, the lame made to walk, the blind to see, and the dead raised, and by faith alone can ye who are dead in sin be raised from your helpless state, and made to rejoice in the new birth of the Gospel of Christ.

Brethren, this is a comforting doctrine; a glorious gospel. Thank God, we have nothing to do but believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and all our sins are blotted out, and we become heirs of salvation, because his righteousness is imputed to us.

The blessed Savior died on the cross for us. Yes, bless God,

'He died for you, he died for me,
He died to set the sinner free.'

Yes, he died to set the sinners free indeed. That's true, ain't it Sister Barnes? "Yes, glory be to God, it is true," responded Sister Barnes. Thank the Lord, we who have passed from death unto life, and been translated from the kingdom of darkness, to the glorious kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, know what it is to be saved by faith. Satan may rage, and his infidel crew imagine vain things, we shall not be moved, for we know in whom we have believed.

Being born of the spirit, we have an advocate with the Father, even Jesus Christ the righteous. We know that our Redeemer liveth, and because he lives we shall live also. Bless the Lord, brethren, this is a glorious hope, the hope of salvation through Jesus Christ, and it's a glorious salvation, my brethren, that awaits those who have been redeemed through the blood of the Lamb, for whereas we were children of the Devil, and as such subject to the wrath of God; now we are children of the kingdom of light and joint heirs with the Lord Jesus Christ to an everlasting inheritance

In the mansion above, where all is love,
Where sickness and sorrow, pain and death
Are felt and feared no more.
There we shall bathe our weary souls
In seas of heavenly rest.
And not a wave of trouble roll
Across our peaceful breast.

But what shall I say to you, my poor unfortunate fellow-traveler to the bar of God?

My text not only assures the believer of salvation, but it also declares that 'He that believeth not shall be damned.' And this brings me to the third and last part of my sermon.

The consequences of neglecting the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, 'Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature; he that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned.'

There stands the word of God as plain and as positive as it is possible to make it, and with this text before your eyes, how can you escape the damnation of hell if you neglect this great salvation that is offered to you on such easy terms, namely, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

'It is not of works, lest any man should boast.' No, my dying friend, works will not save you; it is faith, and faith only, that can do that. Though you should spend your whole life in doing good, if you have not faith it would profit you nothing, for the righteousness of man is but filthy rags in the sight of God, and your good deeds count for nothing at the judgment seat of Christ.

No, my friends, the only thing that will avail you in that terrible day is the wedding garment, the robe that has been washed in the blood of the Lamb.

He that believeth not, shall be damned. Do you realize the full import of that terrible sentence, my friends? I am afraid you don't. If you did, you would not waste a moment of your precious time, but would make haste to close in with the terms of offered mercy. You would flee from the wrath to come as you would from a terrible monster.

It is an awful thing to be torn in pieces by a lion or a tiger, but it's more awful to fall into the hands of the living God and feel the rod of his vengeance. His wrath waxeth not toward those that deny his name, but his mercy abounds toward them that call upon his name in faith. He is long suffering and tender in his mercies, but the day of his wrath kindleth as an oven, and the wicked are consumed before it.

It's got to be fashionable in these latter days for preachers to explain away the passages in this blessed book that speaks of hell and the wrath of God. But the preachers that do such things are deceiving the people and endangering their own soul's salvation.

I tell you, my friends, the language of this bible is plain and can't be misunderstood, unless you want to misunderstand it. And this blessed book says: 'These'—meaning the wicked—'shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal.'

And the rich man died also, and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment, and one had not on a wedding garment, and the Lord commanded that he be cast into outer darkness, where there shall be weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. And again I read, 'All whose names are not found written in the Lamb's book of life shall be cast into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone.'

It's no use for Beecher and the rest of the Universalists to try to get over or explain away these passages. It can't be done, and any preacher that attempts to do it is either a fool or a hypocrite, and I warn you, my dying congregation, not to be deceived by any such infidel palaver as these new fangled preachers get off in the name of Christianity. They are wolves in sheep's clothing. They use the livery of heaven to serve the Devil in. Behold! they have their reward in big salaries, and the flattery of the rich and fashionable sinners.

But my lost friends, Elder Harkins don't dare to pervert the word of God as these preachers do, for he knows that the everlasting fate of your immortal souls hangs upon the issue of his preaching. If so be you accept the gospel, all is well, but if you reject it the red-hot mouth of hell yawns to receive your immortal souls.

O that I had the voice of the seven trumpets, that I might reach the dull ear of every unconverted sinner in the whole land, and tell them as I tell you now, that as long as you neglect the gospel of Christ, you are hair-hung and breeze-shaken on the very verge of the bottomless pit.

You have no lease of life. You are not sure you will live another year, another month, another day. No, no! my friends, you are not sure of another hour of life. If you leave this place to-day, without making your peace with God, his mercy may fail before the sun rises to-morrow morning, and you awake to find yourself in hell, beyond the reach of human help or divine mercy, there to sink in endless woe, forever and ever, and as often as you could rise to the surface of that awful lake of boiling brimstone, you would join the great host of the damned of all ages and nations in the one eternal cry, 'How long, O how long am I to be tormented in these flames?' And the only answer you would get, my dying friends, would be the echo of your own voice, as it rolled back to you from the cavernous walls of your gloomy abode and the fiendish laugh of devils as they mocked at your wails of anguish and rejoiced at your endless woe.

Hark! what is that that comes wafted across the plains of heaven, and the echos of which reach the very confines of hell? It is the song of the redeemed host that walk the gold-paved streets of the New Jerusalem.

You strain your eyes to catch a glimpse of joys you never can taste, and your ears to catch the last dying notes of music that is to you but the funeral dirge of your dead hopes. There in that happy throng is your pious mother, who has prayed for you and plead with you in tears and agony of soul. But her days of praying and sorrowing are past. She rests from her labors, and her works do follow her. She looks to your doleful abode. Ah! she sees her child. You lift your hands toward her, and cry out in the agony of despair, 'Mother! O mother, pray for me!' The redeemed and sainted mother replies: 'My child, your doom is just. God doeth all things well. To him be glory, and honor, and power, and dominion, and majesty for ever and ever,' and in a moment your mother is lost in the throng of the heavenly host, while you sink down in despair, and the waves of hell swallow you up.

This is no fancy picture, my dying friends, but the everlasting truth of God as found in the gospel of Jesus Christ, and I warn you and beseech you by the pains of everlasting damnation, and by the mercies of God, that you look to the Lord and live; for, as Moses lifted up a brazen serpent in the wilderness, that whosoever looked toward it might live, even so hath Jesus Christ been lifted up on the cross, and the sinner has only to believe on him and live. Yes, Jesus, the blessed Lamb of God, died on the cross to save you, and now he stands all the day long with bleeding hands and pleading tongue, saying, sinner, come to me and live.

O the Lamb, the loving Lamb,
The Lamb of Calvary;
The Lamb that was slain,
But liveth again
To intercede for me.

Brethren, sing

'Come humble sinner, in whose breast
A thousand thoughts revolve,
With all your guilt and fear oppressed,
And make this last resolve.'

If there is one soul within the sound of my voice that desires to flee from the wrath to come, let him come forward and let that fact be known."

During the progress of the song, which was sung with great unction by the entire congregation, the Elder kept up a vigorous attack upon the sinner's stronghold by means of a steady fire of exhortation, and after they had closed the first song, and run into the following camp-meeting chorus,

"I will arise and go to Jesus,
He will embrace me in his arms;
In the arms of my dear Jesus,
O! there are ten thousand charms."

some half-dozen young girls, from ten to fourteen years of age, went forward and knelt at the altar.

This, of course, involved the necessity of a prolongation of the services, and a large number of the congregation retired.

Your reporter begs to be indulged in a few reflections on the Elder's sermon. It seems to me that the Rev. Zebedee failed to do justice to his text, in omitting to impress upon the sinner the importance of baptism. The text says, "He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved." Now it strikes me that, according to the text, baptism is as imperative a condition as faith.

Again, the text speaks of certain signs that should follow them that believe.

Now the Elder professes to believe. Let him prove his faith by casting out a few devils, or by swallowing a dose of strychnine or prussic acid, or by letting a rattlesnake bite him, or let him try his hand at healing the sick by his saintly touch and the power of prayer. A few such miracles as is here promised would overturn Tyndal's theories effectually, and probably convert him to Christianity.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. II.

"I want you and your husband to understand that your sentiments have nothing to do with my estimate of your characters. I do not know any person in our village that I could more unhesitatingly trust in questions of truth and honesty, and I believe in real benevolence, for all of which I thank Jesus Christ, as all my knowledge of the world's history does not give me two persons of the moral status I attribute to you, outside of Christian influence, and this will be a good time to re-assert the absence of the scientist outside the shadow of the cross. It is bad logic in you to call this an assertion, while I can cite you to them in Christian countries, and you cannot find them outside."

FRIEND B.: It is hardly a fair proposition to ask me to find scientists "outside the shadow of the cross," as a proof that Christianity does not in itself advance science or morality, for the "shadow of the cross" rests on all the most civilized and enlightened nations of the globe. Christian missionaries are scattered wherever they can gain admittance, and thus Christianity plants the cross in all localities where there is science or morality, and then claims the credit of all the goodness and intelligence that is found beneath its shadow, whether those so shadowed are themselves Christians, Infidels or Pagans. As well say science and morality only flourish where sewing machines and steam engines are found. And besides, what is Christianity? And the cross, what is that? Only relics of Paganism, both of them. The cross was in use ages before the reputed birth of Christ, and Christ himself is only a myth created out of some ancient Pagan deity. At least we have so little evidence of any other origin for him, that we may safely conclude this to be the correct one.

The Christian religion itself is all the time changing, expanding, enlarging and widening itself, so that it may seem to its devotees to be leading science, while in reality science is actually forcing the "shadow of the cross" to yield step by step, and point after point, dogma after dogma, and superstition after superstition is given up, till at last the most advanced Christians of the Index and Golden Age stamp, bear no semblance to the Puritans of Plymouth Rock, the believers in the old, blue laws of Connecticut, than the enlightened scientist of the Nineteenth Century does to the old fogey who thinks the world a flat surface, and the sun, moon and stars made and set in the firmament especially for its lights.

But as I said in my first letter, there are scientists and moralists in all lands and all places, (though not being a traveler in those countries) that are "outside of the shadow of the cross." I may not be able to "cite thee to them" of my own personal knowledge.

John Fiske, speaking of ancient Athens, says: "The Greeks esteemed more highly the beauty of the body than that of its covering." Now is not that real science? the science of life, health and true beauty; while we, beneath the "shadow," cover, hide and smother, pad, stay, prop and lace our bodies, and are oftentimes ashamed to have feet, hands, or even face seen in public gatherings; and the lame, ill-shapen and deformed fill our hospitals, and throng in the dark, filthy alleys of our cities, a disgrace to the civilization which, in this respect, is so far behind that of the Greek age, which took such pride in the perfection and beauty of the physical proportions of the race.

Fiske also says: "There has been no other community of which the members have, as a general rule, been so highly cultured, or have attained individually such completeness of life." The Athenian public was, on the whole, the most highly cultured public that has ever existed. Their moral and religious life sat easily on them, like their own graceful drapery, and did not weary them like the hair-cloth garment of the monk. They were free from that dark conception of a Devil which lent terror to life in the Middle Ages. They had an open, child-like conception of Religion, and as such it was a sunny conception. They were the most profoundly cultivated people of all ages. A larger proportion of men lived complete, well-rounded, harmonious lives in ancient Athens, than in any other known community," notwithstanding the fact (?) that they were not "shadowed by the cross," and "they had no word for the idea of virtue." Respectfully,

ELMINA P. D. SLENKER.

Land Reform.

Each human being has a natural right to an equal, inalienable and individual share of soil and sovereignty in townships and democracies throughout every State and nation.

CAWKER CITY, MITCHELL CO., KANSAS, }
Oct. 21st, 1874.

LEWIS MASQUERIER—Dear Sir: I have just been reading your article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 1st, and have also read several articles in the Investigator upon the same subject, and I have come to the conclusion to write you and give you something of an idea of this, "the far West" in establishing Homes for the many homeless.

Here where there is such vast quantities of land, embracing the finest soil and climate in the world, I think would be just the spot to begin the work. More than four years ago, and soon after I embraced Infidelity, feeling that my opinions ostracized me socially, and longing to live where I could enjoy the blessing of corresponding sympathies, I determined to make an effort to build up, if possible, in some available spot, a society of Liberals, I came here to this point and established a beautiful site for a city, with a thousand natural advantages of geographical position, locality, etc.

Soon after I came here, a company of men from Milwaukee, Wis., came on and laid out this place, and finding I had the advantage of them in all respects, they resolved to beat me out of my quarter if they could. The story is too long to relate, but suffice it to say, after three and a half years of law in contesting me, I won. When I came here there was not a habitation to be seen, and the country swarming with Red-skins. Now, although the country is new, the settlements extend one hundred and seventy miles west of us still. We have good school-houses, and, as a matter of course, churches with two lazy ministers to support. Near here and near my land lie 4,500 acres of beautiful land, belonging to four different railroads in the State, and adjacent to this is thousands of acres of beautiful prairie, inviting labor to unfold their rich and unfailing resources. This point is forty-five miles from the Kansas Pacific Railroad south, sixty miles from the Missouri and Burlington Railroad on the north, and 375 miles east of Denver City.

The principal business to be carried on here would be stock-raising and wool-growing, and the Solomon river has some good water-powers, by which mills and factories might be propelled.

I like your ideas of social life. I don't wholly endorse Woodhull. I think she is an extremist, and her theories unnatural communism; can only exist under some theory that fetters the mind, and is also unnatural, for it is natural for a man or woman to desire the full control of their persons and labor. But I am extremely liberal, and am willing every one should enjoy their domestic relations as they see fit, but must all conform for their general good to a constitution, framed so as to secure to each and every one an individuality, and to the whole, security.

Our prospects for railroads here are not very encouraging at present. Before the great financial crash, several were proposed running east and west. That there will be roads here is only a question of time, for the demands of the country are constantly on the increase, and there must be some outlet to the vast productions of this valley to market. The mining regions of Colorado will ever furnish a market for the produce of Kansas.

This article is growing more lengthy than I first anticipated, and the subject being now open, I would respectfully invite your correspondence upon the subject, and if we can succeed in getting 10,000 Liberals to settle here upon small homesteads, and by co-operation of labor and means, build up the foundation of the future social life, I shall die content in the knowledge that there has been one step taken toward the ultimate happiness of the human race. Very respectfully, I am yours.

MARIE M. DEFORD, M.D.

REPLY.—Dear Friend: I heartily sympathize in all your good intentions and efforts. But while we are all more or less demoralized by the form and pressure of surrounding institutions, we can only escape from them by slow degrees, or by very short stages of civilization. If it were possible that some few of us could develop the thorough principle of rights, wrongs, and the remedies of all evil, why should we not reach the last stage of a perfect civilized form of society, with as little revolutionary struggle as we now strive to advance to some petty measure of reform? This could be done, if men could learn to give heed to the thorough principles of rights and wrongs, which would put them outside of the "ring" of all the present institutions of society and government.

I behold you contending with men demoralized by the present erroneous political economy of society; with men making use of property only to monopolize and swallow up other property, by grasping at large tracts of land, which should never have been desecrated by setting a money valuation upon it. If every human being was established in the natural right to an equal, inalienable and individual share of soil or homestead and sovereignty in township democracies, subject to no liability to alienate by any consideration whatever, such as debt, sale, tax, mortgage, etc., who then could acquire any other tract of soil or homestead, so as to extort tribute in the form of rent, when there were none but those who had homes of their own? Under this system, homesteads might be exchanged for each other by simply paying the difference in value. Here, too, no one could accumulate anything in any way but through labor and the natural aid of children. No one would hire out his muscle to servilely delve upon his neighbor's homestead, instead of his or her own. They might socially exchange an equal time of labor for labor on the same terms as the exchange of products, according to the time of labor with the materials added. Under this form of economy, no millionaires could arise. The few hundred dollars which these might accumulate upon their homesteads, would only be expended in improvements upon them, or in patronizing the arts.

I see, too, that you speak of laying out these kind of cities that consist of piling up houses against each other, to burn up by acres, and that only produce a destitute population, that depend on the uncertainty of trade, and whose meagre twenty-five by one hundred foot lot, is not enough for horticulture and an independent living. But by securing all upon inalienable homesteads, never to be divided down below the minimum of ten acres, the least for a family support, sufficient to raise all the grain, roots, fruits and forest trees, thus combining farm and park as one, with dwelling, barn and shop on every homestead, surrounded by this vegetation, the whole country would be reduced to a rural city all over the earth, while every six miles square of it would be organized as a township democracy, with a central exchange mart and town hall, wherein to meet and vote directly for the very little law or judicature then needed.

In our land reform movement, under George H. Evans, I furnished a plan for laying out a village in the centre of each township, with streets running from central circular public grounds to the cardinal points, which varied the size of the lots from the centre outward. But I consider that I have improved upon this idea by planning the whole township into a rural city, wherein the houses are surrounded with sufficient soil to raise all vegetables, where each can both farm and manufacture, or do only one. Mankind must eventually be forced into some such system as this in self-defence against the monstrous growth of present cities, concentrating capitalist landlords, traders and manufacturers commanding four-fifths of the product of labor at starvation prices, while creating paupers, criminals and wretchedness. The present over-growing cities must become ruins, leaving only enough of the warehouses, foundries, ship-yards, etc., in the sea and river ports of the earth for accommodation of commerce. Think no more, my friend, of building up little pauper-breeding villages, but get every one upon an equal, inalienable and individual homestead, which will be far more easy to induce mankind to embrace than the error of communism, which I am pleased to find you have not been deluded into. I would gladly aid you to arouse the ten thousand settlers you want, but the gloom of years is coming over me, and I have no power to move poor, conservative, ignorant and suffering humans. They will suffer themselves to be hurled by hundreds of thousands into each other in war, but no such number can be aroused to settle Kansas into a land reform State.

LOUIS MASQUERIER,
2d Cor. Sec., L. R. S.,
99 Java St., Green Point, N. Y.

New-York Liberal Club.

DECEMBER 11th, 1874.

R. A. GUNN, M.D., delivered a lecture, subject, "Co-education of the Sexes."

He commenced by showing the defects in the present system of education, one of which was a false delicacy by which the child was kept in profound ignorance of its own structure, and the various functions of the body. Another serious evil resulted from the foolish practice on the part of parents and teachers of meeting the enquiries of the child by lying and deceptions. This practice originating in a false modesty was attended by the worst possible results, as it tends to reproduce hypocrisy and cunning instead of frankness and truthfulness, which are virtues most admirable in either young or old. The physical development of the girl is prevented by her dress from playing in the dirt, and basking in the sun, and thereby acquiring like her brother a vigorous frame.

Girls learn much quicker than boys, but as the boy must prepare for some profession, he has an incentive to work, while the girl must look to marriage alone as the ultimate end and aim of her existence; and the wily mama stoops to all the despicable arts of husband hunting. Thus bad food, insufficient exercise, uncomfortable clothing, tight lacing, all combine to unfit the girl to become the future mother; and she, feeling her unfitness, often desires to shirk the duties of maternity, and procures abortion to avoid the great risk that nearly every falsely educated American woman incurs in becoming a mother.

The lecturer went on to show that a rational education would remove many of the evils which now result from false methods of teaching. Never lie to a child; let there be no Santa Claus fables, no superstition. Let the dress of the girl be plain and convenient, so that, like her brother, she may play freely in the open air. Let there be more play than study. Let the children of both sexes play together and study together. Let their studies be more objective than subjective. He denied that there was any sex in mind, or that there was any physiological hindrance to the complete education of woman, as was assumed by Dr. Clark and Maudsley. He affirmed that there was not sufficient data to support the assumption that the menstrual period in woman would hinder her from pursuing any course of education or industry, provided her physical education in early life was natural. He cited the women among the peasantry of Scotland, Wales, and Germany, who performed an equal and in many cases a greater amount of labor than the men.

In the name of justice he demanded that every road be left open for every human being, man and woman, and that like labor will receive like compensation. Let woman have an opportunity to become self-sustaining, and when she marries it will be for love and not for the sake of a home.

He closed with a fine passage in which he predicted what would occur when the light of science should illuminate the world; when man and woman should dwell side by side in intelligence, equal before the law.

The audience manifested their appreciation by long and enthusiastic applause.

Messrs. HALLOCK, LAMBERT, HOEBER and ELLSBERG, as physicians, followed, in discussing the lecture, and, with some exceptions, generally coincided with the spirit of the address.

Mr. DAWSON took some exceptions to the propriety of delivering such lectures before mixed assemblages; but in this matter the opinion of the great majority of the audience was clearly against him.

Dr. GUNN, in his closing remarks, said science embraces all subjects, and its teaching must reach every human ear; and there is no subject which can be of more interest than that which relates to the structure and functions of the human body. To dispel the popular ignorance it is necessary for the men of science to instruct the populace from the public platform. He deprecated the false modesty which could say limb, but would blush at the word leg, for to the pure all things are pure. For science must perform the special work of stripping superstition of its mystery, and ignorance of its crimes, thereby substituting knowledge for belief and happiness for misery.

Am I a Free Lover?

Who ever loved by compulsion? I didn't. Don't believe Falstaff ever did. He might as well give reasons by compulsion.

Hannibal, when twelve years old, is said to have sworn on the altar of the gods eternal enmity to Rome. I never swore eternal enmity to anybody.

Some go to the altar and swear eternal love to one little heap. How well they keep the swear your deponent saith not. The understanding is they'll not love any other heap. I infer that such is the understanding, for if the swearer looks in any other direction there is trouble in the wigwam.

Sylvester, the Pillar Saint, wasn't a free lover, was he? He wouldn't allow a woman to come within a mile of his pillar. The Empty Barrel Saint wasn't either; but who wants to be a Pillar Saint, or an Empty Barrel Saint?

Jacob Dox, of Geneva, Ontario Co., N. Y., some sixty years ago, was elected to the Legislature. Jacob would do the Legislature swear, but to never fight a duel he wouldn't swear. He didn't expect to fight a duel, but wasn't to be so tied up. So stubborn was Jacob that the House had to back down. That sort of swear got its quietus then and there.

Was the Nazarine a free lover? What a question! Is our Governor elect a free lover? I don't believe that he ever went to the altar and swore he would, or wouldn't, love, or hate, anybody in particular.

I'm some like His Excellency in some things. In the little matter of love, I square myself by the rules of our church. What church? What church do sensible people belong to? The Church of Humanity sure. By the rules of our church I can love every body if I've a mind to.

Do I love everybody? How do you wish me to answer that question? I have a way of setting a thing out, so as to make it appear just as it is. I love everything that to me is lovable—everything that is pretty.

As far back as I can remember, the prettiest, the most lovable of anything I could see or think of was a good little girl in her native innocence. To me such are angels—more than angels. I never worship; don't believe in it. It is undignified; self-respect forbids it. I reverence all that is reverenceable—adore all that is adorable. Have heard tell of an Individual, all of the masculine persuasion, three masculines grown together, like Siamese twins, only more of them. I never made his (their) acquaintance—could not see anything adorable in monstrosity.

This side, my Ideal Man—the two moietyies become one on the angel plane—my ideal better moiety claims my highest adoration, as the best exponent of the most loving—most lovable—moiety of the sublime center of all vitality on the democratic platform of this little universe.

If any kind of ignorance be bliss, why is not ignorance of humanity's lower planes, in ways that are dark, as blissful ignorance as any of the ignorances? How sad to meet mere caricatures of humanity, who have neither father nor mother, and never had. They who rushed the little, squalid things into existence had not children in all their thoughts.

Of the damning cases where the weaker vessel is forced into sexuality against the better feelings of her soul, by the worse than brutality of the he, delicacy forbids to make mention. The offspring of such embrace are worse than motherless. Instead of maternal affections, the poor little miseries are met with frowns and loathing. [Loud cries of order. Let the curtain fall.]

Jupiter is a prettier world than this—prettier folks there. They have had more time to get themselves up in good shape. This will be a prettier world sometime. Iconoclasts, God's faithful servants, are now smashing up the old theologic images—brushing away the rubbish preparatory to laying the foundation of a new earth—new generative order, in pursuance of uncontaminated physiological law.

And the new heaven will be then in the effulgent brightness of Divinity in Humanity. Amen. P.

A Remarkable Bequest.

A LETTER FROM BRIGHAM YOUNG.

The following has just been handed us by a friend from the far west, who assures us it is direct from Salt Lake City. It will be seen the distinguished and venerable Patriarch of Utah Valley makes a most magnanimous offer to his friend, the eloquent pastor of Brooklyn Heights. Will it be accepted?

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, Dec. 1, 1874.

REV. HENRY WARD BEECHER, BROOKLYN, N. Y.:

My Dear and Reverend Brother—Permit me to tender to you my warmest sympathy in this your hour of tribulation, and to offer to you an asylum from the troubles and annoyances of a narrow-minded, monogamic, sectarian community by which you are surrounded. Come out like a noble man, that nature intended you should be; openly avow and advocate your real belief and practice of Polygamy, and come with your many true and spirit wives and reside with us, where you and they will, whenever you openly recognize them as such, be respected by all. Do not remain where the highest and holiest attributes of your nature are looked upon by your neighbors with disgust and horror.

My most dear and reverend friend, I am getting old, my days of usefulness in certain respects are drawing to a close. For some years I have been looking for some one worthy and competent to take my place. I recognize in you sufficient ability in all respects. It only requires that you should openly avow your real doctrines. Come among us, and conform to our church regulations, viz: Openly marry your several, now wives defacto, and I am ready to surrender to you the leadership of this great people, and assign and turn over to you such of my younger wives as may prefer a more vigorous head. Consider this matter well. I must soon surrender my place, and go to my long home. I desire that my mantle fall upon one worthy, and thou art the man.

Hoping you will recognize the errors of attempting to live a Polygamous life, and advocate Monogamy, I remain, with great respect, truly your brother,
B. YOUNG.

Organization.

It is with the greatest pleasure we lay the following letter before our readers. We rejoice that the young city of Peoria is able to enroll such a respectable number of Freethinkers and free enquirers, with such a distinguished leader at their head. Let Liberals in all parts of the country act upon this noble example and go and do likewise. If they cannot count one-half or one-quarter as many names, let them not fail to step forward and organize. It is time for the Liberals of the United States to show some zeal and energy in the cause of Truth and Progress, and fear not to let their light shine. We hope soon to have some good reports to make from our own quarter. We shall be glad to often hear from our Peoria friends, and to lay a summary of their proceedings before our readers.

PEORIA, ILL., Dec. 17, 1874.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER—Dear Sir: We have just organized a Society in this city, and call it the "Peoria Free Thought Association." Col. Robert G. Ingersoll is our President. We meet at the Union Turner Hall every Sunday afternoon and discuss a theological or philosophical subject. The society is yet in its infancy, but it numbers about sixty or seventy members. We are now making arrangements to have a scientific lecture also, at every meeting. Our Society is open for the admission of members of every denomination, creed and belief, irrespective of sex or color, and our constitution guarantees them the privilege of expressing their views upon the subject for debate in full, and without any restraint whatever, except such as decorum may demand. Notwithstanding the broadness of our platform and the cordiality shown those who attend our meetings, the "faithful ones" have stood aloof, and about a hundred namby-pamby, milk and water, weak-kneed "doubters" are waiting for the verdict of orthodoxy before joining our Society. More anon.

DAN R. SHEEN,
Cor. Sec. P. F. T. Ass.

To the Rev. S. H. Platt.

DEAR SIR: I see by notice in the Brooklyn Eagle that you intend to give some lectures at the De Kalb Ave. M. E. Church on Sunday mornings, in vindication of the Christian God, the Christian Bible, the Christian Experience, against the assumption of Modern Skepticism, and the deductions of modern Scientists.

Shall I be deemed impertinent if I ask you to discuss this subject in a candid, honest manner? My past experience tells me this is very rarely done.

The "man of straw" you generally attack is of your own creation. The foundations on which this Christian superstructure rests are taken for granted, but it is those very foundations that are called in question to-day. Paley's Evidences does not meet the objection of to-day; for this is an age, as Froude says, of skepticism, and "it is covering the whole land like a mist," and therefore in your coming lectures we ask you to prove first that the records of the Bible are historically true. We assert that it is all allegory, metaphor, fable and imposture, and hold ourselves in readiness at all times to give a reason for our belief. Second, is the Christian Bible divinely inspired?

Is it the potential "Thus saith the Lord" from Genesis to Revelations? or is it only the "sayings of Solomon" that are inspired? Please tell us how much of this Bible we must believe as being inspired to-day? Third, is there any proof outside the Bible that such a person as Jesus Christ ever lived, moved and had his being on this earth? We say, we can find no historical evidence that he ever did exist. Now, as our only desire is to discover the truth, we should be pleased to discuss this subject with you in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we pledge ourselves to examine your arguments with fairness and candor; but it may be, not to be outdone in liberality, you will permit a discussion in your own church. If so as we think we can give a good reason for the faith we believe in, we will then and there compare our opinions, and see which has the better way.

Yours for Truth, WM. WILLICOTT,
362 Bedford Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.
Dec. 22, 1874.

THE REV. DR. CUYLER says that if, "by some extraordinary and terrible process," Brooklyn should suddenly be deprived of all the religion in it, property would depreciate fifty per cent. in value in twenty-four hours. This is the way of estimating the temporal value of religion that suggests great possibilities in real estate. Admitting the soundness of Dr. Cuyler's assertion, the sure method of "bulling" the market, is to build a church on every corner.

Scientific Department.

On the Perception of the Invisible.

BY G. F. RODWELL.

(Continued from No. 7.)

Let us endeavor to visualize some of the invisible actions which are perpetually taking place around us, such as the assumption of heat by a mass of metal, and the reception of sound and light by the brain. Having recognized from the foregoing remarks the fact that the senses are limited in their capabilities of observation, and otherwise may often give fallacious results, we must at the outset provide ourselves with a suitable organ of observation. And here we must beg the reader to grant us a few important concessions; we must divest ourselves of this "muddy vesture of decay," if we wish to hear the music of the spheres; our bodies will be in the way if we wish to glide amongst ultimate atoms. We will therefore dispossess ourselves of the material part of us, retaining only the eye and the ear, associated with our normal intellectual powers. But the eye can only be directed towards one point at once, and if a rapidly-moving body passes it, the moving body (like the whirled stick) will appear to be drawn out on account of the persistence of its image on the retina; hence we must have a more complete instrument of vision. Let us then imagine a sphere whose entire surface is studded with eyes, and let us call this organ of vision, for the avoidance of repetition, the oculus. We must grant it, moreover, the power of contracting to the size of an atom, and of penetrating where the luminiferous ether can penetrate; the faculty of seeing in the dark; infinite velocity in any direction, or across any position of rest; power of clearly distinguishing the most rapid motion, and of seeing the imagined but ordinarily unseen; and lastly, power of resisting any extremes of temperature. These gifts being conceded we have an instrument of vision well suited to our purpose, an all-powerful eye; potent as the winged-eye which hovers over the head of Osiris in the Hall of Perfect Justice, when the heart of the deceased trembles in the balance.

We will now accompany the oculus on its first voyage of discovery. We have before us a little ingot of silver; we magnify it a few billion times, until, for example, it is as large as Australia, and enter it as an oculus. We make ourselves as small as possible, and perfectly elastic, or all our eyes will be put out, and we shall be pounded to pieces, for we are surrounded on every side by small, black, elastic atoms of silver, nearly as large as peas. They are whirling round and round in various planes with exceeding rapidity, in circles about ten feet diameter. It reminds us a little of the effect produced when we look up at a heavy snow-storm accompanied by just enough wind to give the flakes a whirling motion in mid-air; only here the white flakes are exchanged for little black spheroids which move rhythmically. We soon perceive that the velocity augments, the circles become larger, a lurid light surrounds the atoms, the mass no longer preserves its shape; it has exchanged the solid for the liquid condition, and settles down as a vast lake of molten silver. The circles of revolution of the atoms are but slightly larger, they appear now to be eleven or twelve feet diameter. The motion still increases; in other words, the molten silver continues to acquire heat, when suddenly it commences to boil; the atoms, whose velocity has considerably augmented, leave the circular path in which they had hitherto moved, and fly off tangentially, moving rectilinearly through space. Now we fix our eyes on an atom, and notice that although its velocity is enormous, it does not make so much progress as we might have expected, because it perpetually comes into collision with other atoms; thus it does not get even a hundred feet of continuous rectilinear motion, its path through space is zigzag, because it is constantly diverted from its straight course by collision with neighboring atoms. Thus the direction of its motion is changed several hundred times in a second. The atoms are perfectly elastic, and bound off from each other whenever collisions occur.

The oculus now leaves the interior of the mass, and having reached the outside, notices a vast greenish cloud of silver gas floating above it. Presently the rectilinear motion slackens; the gas is cooling; the atoms approach each other until at length they come within the range of their cohesion, which compounds its own rectilinear attractive force with the motion of the atoms into the former circular motion; they abandon their rectilinear angular velocity. The cloud of silver vapor condenses; a gigantic rain of molten silver falls; the drops are spheroidal and ellipsoidal masses as large as the dome of St. Paul's; they solidify into a lengthened ridge of silver mountains. Again the oculus enters the mass, and finds the atoms still actuated by their ceaseless circular motion of heat. But on looking towards one end of the ridge, the inception of a new kind of motion is perceived; the particles are assimilating an elliptical motion, which travels rapidly from end to end: the mass is conveying an electric current. The atoms of silver, still retaining their elliptical motion, now assume a peculiar helicoidal motion in varying planes: the mass is under the influence of a magnet. The oculus then goes outside again and stations itself near the base of one of the shining silver mountains; it looks up at the bright lustrous sides, and sees the ether-waves dashing down upon them from infinite space; it notices also that the motion of the waves differs from that of the atoms—they cannot assimilate it. Consequently the ether-waves are dashed back, like great sea-waves dashing on a rock-bound coast; in a word, they are reflected, and to some extent scattered, as ether-foam.

Once again, the ingot of silver is placed in a Cycloæan melting-pot, together with some sulphur: the oculus places itself at the bottom of the mass, and diligently watches. The melting-pot is placed in a furnace; motion is rapidly assimilated by the atoms, more quickly by the sulphur than by the silver; at length a white atom of sulphur and two black atoms of silver are seen to coalesce, separate from the rest of the mass, and sink to the bottom as a molecule of sulphide of silver. The molecule continues the motion of heat which the individual atoms had before possessed, but the three coalesced atoms now act as one. The motion is observed to differ altogether, both in kind and velocity, from that of the single atoms; and the oculus no longer recognizes either the sulphur or the silver as separate bodies; the compound molecule now forms indeed a new substance. The individual atoms of the molecule also move relatively to each other. The combination of the two atoms of silver with one atom of sulphur continues until the whole mass of silver has become a new substance. A few million atoms of sulphur remain in the melting-pot in excess; they move more and more rapidly as the heating continues, and ultimately float away and are seen no more.

Here ends our first voyage with the oculus. We have seen some actions which are fairly familiar to many of us. We have endeavored to visualize the assumption of heat by a mass of melted metal; the continued assumption resulting in fusion and vaporization; the subsequent condensation of the vapor; the conveyance of an electric current by the metallic mass; the action of a magnet upon it; the reflection of light from its polished surface; and finally, its union with sulphur under the influence of the force of chemical affinity.

Whither shall we travel now? To the fiery maelstroms of the sun? To the zone of Saturn? To a cloud of planetary matter condensing into new worlds? Or shall we float with the light of Arcturus and a Lyre into the spectroscope of Mr. Huggins? Since we have attempted to visualize the infinitely little, let us now transport the oculus to the infinitely great, and place it in the midst of a new solar system about to be formed.

The oculus speeds through space; it sees an earth-lit moon; it reaches Mars during mid-winter, it examines the belt of Saturn with interest, and it gains some entirely new ideas about space of four dimensions. It passes the region

"where eldest Night
And Chaos, ancestors of Nature, hold
Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand."

At length, far out of sight of our solar system, it comes to a firmamental desert, and sees beneath it an extended nebulous mass, some ten trillion miles in extent; the mass is hazy and cloud-like, and is gradually contracting its limits, until at length it condenses into a semi-solid spherical mass, intensely radiant, in fact still white-hot. The sphere assumes rotatory motion, and as the motion augments it bulges out more and more in the direction of its motion; then some dozens of masses of molten matter of different sizes are given off from the circumference of the rotating mass. These fly out in orbits more or less eccentric, and revolve around the great central body, the remains of the original parent mass, still far larger than any of its offspring. These new worlds possess rotatory motion of their own; one has a girdle; one is accompanied by little moons; some follow a very elliptical path; some rush off into infinite space in hyperbolic curves. The great central mass, now the sun of a vast system, keeps his attendant worlds in order; the greater number revolve about him with regularity. But one of the worlds, a few times larger than our moon, has by the velocity of its impulse been projected into a large and very elliptical orbit, which brings it within the sphere of attraction of a distant but enormous sun. Then, as a ship is drawn into a whirlpool, is the errant world drawn to its destruction. It circulates about the greater body, not in a curved path which returns into itself, but in an ever-narrowing spiral. At last comes the final crash; it rushes into the sun with a velocity of more than a million miles a second, and the heat generated by the collision volatilizes the destroyed planet. A thin, fiery cloud is now all that remains of what had a short time before been a world. All this, and much more, the oculus perceives, and then returns to earth.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"He was killed by Providence," was the Ohio verdict in the case of a man who was struck by lightning.

Being Tapped.

BRO. BENNETT:—I am sorry to be unable to send you a full score of subscribers from here to your valuable semi-monthly TRUTH SEEKER, for it is truly one of the most consistent and effective taps that was ever inserted into the overgrown but decaying tree of ecclesiasticism. Every truly progressive mind and lover of humanity, can only wish that it might have as speedy result as the boy thought tapping his mother for dropsy would have.

The story runs, the mother was sick; the doctor came and said she must be tapped; the boy began to cry, and when asked what he cried for, said: "Father, don't have mother tapped, for nothing in our house was ever tapped that lasted a week." However, with the vast amount of fear, superstition, ignorance and credulity prevailing among the priest-ridden, and with such an unbounded supply of clerical cunning and dishonesty, we may not even hope that the life forces of the gigantic tree of ecclesiasticism, though mortally diseased, can be exhausted in a week; yet with a tap such as is contained on every page of your valuable paper, the last drop of vitality in it must be finally extracted, and the poor old mother of harlots be buried away "in the sight of the sun," and the presence of her worshippers.

It is a clear case, that when a professedly religious system becomes so notoriously false and corrupt, that its ablest defenders dare not submit it to the test of science, reason, and the enlightened judgment of mankind, the poor thing has "done its do," and must subside and make room for something that can and will, to take its place.

The ignorance, credulity, and hypocrisy, so plainly commingled in church history, leave no room for doubt now, that priestcraft in the past has so falsified, belittled and slandered the name and character of God (or good) that they dare not meet the plain issue of their own teachings and the legitimate fruits of their pious (?) slanders.

Only call to mind that villainous story of the sons of God (angels) taking unto themselves wives of the sons of men, and breeding a race of giants in those days, palmed on to poor, ignorant, and stupid men and women as God's holy word.

Then call to mind the thousands of priest-ridden dupes who, on a Sunday, will sit in the oldest rocking chair in the house, and with a pair of the oldest spectacles on their nose, will read that fable with a holy relish, pulling on a long face while rolling their eyeballs skyward, groaning out half audible sounds—"how holy!—how heavenly!—nothing so refreshing as the inspired word!—so full of warm gushing mercy and heavenly condescension!—bless God for his holy book!" we never should have known that had it not been for the goodness of God!

Then think of that nice little speck of "sacred literature," thrown in, it must be supposed by way of inspired condiment, about old righteous (?) Lot after coming out of Sodom with his two heaven-saved daughters.

Drunk! so drunk he didn't know what was up. O tempora! O mores! Is that not a sublime lesson to be read in our schools on bible physiology?

Theological goggles off, take a pitying look at poor Uriah, a side view at fascinating Bathsheba, and a square front look at King David, the heavenly tuned Lyre.

Time fails me and space forbids, yet I must come down to our era and mention a case spoken of in our scripture wherein a very noted Christian gentleman called Gabriel was badly mixed up in the "overshadowing" business. And while in mind will enquire of Bro. John Syphers, whether he can discover any broken links in the chain which connects that circumstance with "nest-hiding" of our day. From first to last the connection is complete so far as I can see. And unless what was right once is wrong now; what was truth once is a lie now; what would save a man once would damn him now; and unless what was once in harmony with the divine nature is opposed to it now, the Plymouth pastor stands exonerated—that is, on bible grounds.

Bathsheba was beautiful, so was Elizabeth.

Uriah was troublesome, so was Theodore.

He must be killed, the latter crushed.—

Therefore in Christian charity sing:

Who crushed Theodore?
I, says brother Hank, when I took him in the flank,
And I crushed Theodore.
Who struck at Moulton?
I, says Henry Ward, with a warrant from the Lord,
And I struck at Moulton.
Who stole Elizabeth?
I, says brother Beecher with my Plymouth wand and sereecher,
And I stole Elizabeth.

Now let us all again p-r-e-y. So mote it be, alms amen. W.

A CLERGYMAN of Reading, Pa., has made a hit by introducing "personals" in prayers. Here is a sample: "Lord, have mercy on John Shanahan, who keeps a saloon near the old bridge. Either lay him on a bed of sickness or have him moved out of town."

Altman's New Price List.

MORRIS ALTMAN begs to state to his old friends and patrons that he has made extensive reductions in his various departments, and earnestly calls attention to the following quotations. The fullest satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance, and all goods not suiting will be exchanged, or the money returned in full.

N. B. To insure the immediate dispatch of orders by mail a P. O. Order, Draft, or Registered Letter must accompany each. Goods by express sent C. O. D. Packages can be sent by mail at the rate of 2c. for 4 ounces and 1 cent for every additional two ounces, or fraction thereof under four pounds.

We refer to A. T. Stewart & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., E. S. Jaffrey & Co., J. B. Spellman & Co., and all the leading Houses in New York City, also to D. M. Bennett, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and G. L. Henderson, Banker, both of whom are well known to all Liberals, and especially to the readers of this paper, as to our responsibility and integrity.

Notion Department.

All goods incidental to this Department not herein comprised are in stock, and will be furnished at equally low prices.

Clark's O. N. T. Spool Cotton, warranted, at 68c. per doz.
Clark's Cotton on black spools, warranted, at 68c. "
Brook's glazed Cotton, white, black and col'd, 68c. "
Coat's white, black and colored cotton, at 68c. "
Corticelli's and Belding's bl'k and col'd
Sewing Silk, 100 yds. at 10c. per spool.
Corticelli's black and col'd Button Hole
Twist at 2c. "
Knitting Cotton, white and colored, at 9c. per ball
Milward's best Helix needles, at 5 cents per paper.
Crowley's patent Helix needles, at 5 cents per paper.
Milliner's best needles, at 6 cents per paper.
Best American Pins, at 6 cents per paper and upward.
Best English Pins, finest manufacture, warranted, at 10 cents per paper.
Patent Safety Pins, at 6 cents per dozen, in all sizes.
French Hair Pins, two papers for 3 cents, in all sizes.
Best English Hair Pins, at 6 cents per paper, all sizes.
Best English Hair Pins, assorted sizes, at 8 cents per box.

English Pin Books, black and white assorted, at 15 cents.
Mourning Pins, at 6 cents and upward.
Buttons of every description, in all the leading styles, greatly reduced. From 10 cents to $1 per doz.
Black and colored Alpaca Braids, 6 yard pieces, at 6 cts.
"Can't-Break-'em" Corset Steels, at 10 cents a pair.
Cotton Corset Laces, at 18 cents per dozen.
Linen 3 yards long, at 5 cents each, 55 p. doz.
Linen Shoe Laces, at 4 cents per dozen, all lengths.
Whalebones, at 45 cents per dozen, full lengths.
Jet Beads, all sizes, every variety, in latest novelties, at 5 cents per bunch.
Bl'k Alpaca from 25 cents to 50 cents in good makes.
The celebrated "Buffalo" Brand, pure Silk Lustre, at 82 cents per yard; equal to that sold at $1.00.
Dress Goods of every kind, style and price.
Bl'k Waterproof Cloth, a superior quality, at 92 cents.
The very best English Waterproof cloth at $1.38.
Navy Blue Waterproof Cloth at $1.13 per yd.
Medium and clear Blues from $1.25 to $1.75.
White and colored Flannels at all prices.
Ladies' Suits in Empress Cloths, Merino's, Cashmeres, Lateen, and all other cloths from $10 to $60 per suit, made and trimmed in latest styles.

"This Department is replete with the thousand and one articles incidental to it, but which cannot be enumerated in this advertisement."

MILLINERS, STOREKEEPERS AND DRESSMAKERS will be supplied with goods on unusually advantageous terms, and every care and despatch, will be used in filling orders.

MILLINERY DEPARTMENT.

One of the largest, and the most elegant and original assortment of Imported Novelties to be found in this city, is now in stock, including the following specialties. All goods selling lower than at any other house.

A beautiful assortment of French Flowers in Roses, Buds, Pansies, etc., from 10c. to $5.
Floral Dress Trimmings and Bridal Wreaths, branched to order, in any style.

A fine assortment of Pompons, Feathers and Wigs.
An extensive assortment of Fancy Feathers, very rich, from 25 cents up to $20.

All the newest shades of Ostrich and Plume de Cock Bands for trimming, from 65 cents and upward.
All the newest styles of blue steel and jet ornaments at the lowest prices.

Elegant Ostrich Plumes, in all the latest shades, $2 and up.

The latest shapes in Felt Hats, at 85 cents to $1.25.
Elegant Imported Felt Hats, best quality, at $1.15 to $3.
Drab Felt Hats, in the latest, most fashionable styles, 85 cents and up.

Silk Velvet Hats, of our own importation, in all qualities, at great bargains from $4 to $10.
Evening Bonnets, elegantly trimmed, from $20 to $35.
Carriage Bonnets, exquisite in design and quality $15 to $30, already trimmed in the latest styles.

Ladies' and Misses' trimmed Bonnets and Hats for general wear, in all shapes and shades, at $6 and upward.
Children's Bonnets and Misses' Round Hats, from $5 to $15, ready trimmed.

Infant's Caps in all the new styles, at great bargains, or made to order at lowest prices.
Mourning goods made to order at the earliest notice.
Sent in neat boxes, perfectly.

Altman's New Price List.

SILKS.

Black Silks, of excellent quality - - $1 $1 19 and $1 25
Better and wider - - $1 33 $1 50 and $2.
Black gros-grain Silk, very rich and good, $1 50 to $2 50
The very best grades, - - 3 and 3 50
Colored Trimming Silks, all shades, - - $1 38 and 1 50
Colored Dress Silks at - - $1 25, $1 50, $2 00 and 2 50
Black Satins, beautiful lustre, at - - 1 50, 1 75 and 2 00
Colored Satins at - - 1 50, 2 00 and 2 25
Black and Colored Velvets at - - 1 50, 2 00, 2 50 and 3 00
Silk Cloak Velvets at - - 5 00, 6 00, 8 00 and 10 00
Velveteens at - - 60c., 75c. and $1 00, worth 1 50
Hath Sashes in every shade and color.
Sash Ribbons in all colors and widths, from 65c. up.
Colored Fringed Sashes, all the new shades, at very low prices.

Laces and Embroideries.

These goods will all be found Extraordinary Bargains, and includes

Hamburg edging at 10 cts. per yard and upwards.
Real Guipure Laces at 25 cts. per yard and upwards.
Black Thread Lace at 20 cts. per yard and upwards.
Valenciennes edging from 5c. per yard and upward.
Patent Valenciennes edging from 6c. per yard upwards.
Beaded black Yak Laces at 25c. per yard and upwards.
Beaded black Yak insertion at 38c. per yd and upward.
Black Yak Laces at 18c. per yard and upward.
Cluny Laces from 15c. and upward.
Colored blonde Laces, from 10c. per yard and upward.
White blonde Laces from 9c. per yard and upward.
Spanish Laces for Scarfs at 50c. per yd and upward.
Black Lace Veils, all patterns, at 50c. per yd and upward.
Black Silk Fringe at 23c. per yd. Black Silk beaded Fringe 35c. per yd. and upward.
Black Silk Galoon 5c. per yd. and upward.
Black Bullion Fringe from 20c. per yd and upward.
Black Beaded Gimp at 20c. per yd and upward.
Large assortment in Hamburg Embroideries.
Large lot of Hamburg insertion at 6c. per yd.
Swiss Medalion Embroideries, great variety at very low prices.
Lace Tidies in every variety at 10c. and upward.

Ladies' Underclothing,

A Valuable Reduction in prices has taken place in this Department, and we imperatively state that no other house can compete with the general inducements we offer. We quote the following as a sample:

Ladies' Fine Chemises, warranted Muslin, finished superbly on Wheeler & Wilson machine. French corded band, extremely neat, 80 cts.

Ladies' Fine Chemises finished as above, with 75 tucks, yoke back and front, handsomely stitched, corded braids and sleeves, at $1.50.

Ladies' Chemises en pointe French pattern with fine hand-made needlework edging and inserting, at $1.48.

Ladies' Night Robes, Utica Mills Muslin, pointed, tucked, and ruffled yoke back and front, full length, at $1.10.

Ladies' Night Robes, tucked and embroidered yoke, Masonville Muslin, trimmed and embroidered collars and cuffs, reduced from $2.95 to $2.25.

Ladies' Night Robes, greatest attraction in stock, made of best muslin, with diagonal puffing and embroidered yoke, back and front, (new shaped) puffed and embroidered pointed collars and cuffs, at $3.50. Worth $6.50 to $7.

Ladies' Night Robes—another attractive article—entirely "our own style," just received, made with diagonal tucks, puffing and embroidery, robe front; very elaborate, $5 to $6.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, trimmed with deep hem and wine tucks at 75 Cents.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, trimmed with tucks and ruffle and diagonal tucking at 85 cents.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, with deep hem, cluster of tucks and needle work inserting, handsomely finished on Wheeler & Wilson Machine, at $1.25.

Ladies' Demi-train Walking Skirts, with double ruffle, cluster of tucks, at $1.

Ladies' Fine Walking Skirts, made of Lonsdale Muslin, with cambrie flower, six inches deep, diagonal puffing and tucking with needle-work inserting five inches deep at $5.

Train Skirts, fine muslin, deep hem, cluster of tucks six inches long, at $1.90.

Ladies' Train Skirts, very elaborate, with one row of tucks, puffs, inserting and puffs over, with deep cambrie ruffle, at $5.50.

Ladies' Masonville muslin Underskirts, with ruffles and cluster of tucks, at 95 cents.

Ladies' Cambrie Toilet Sacques, trimmed with fine ruffling, at $1.40.

Linen and Muslin Pillow-Cases and Pillow-Stands, in plain ruffles and needlework inserting, &c., on hand and made to order. Chemises, square-tucked bosoms, trimmed with ruffles, 75 cents.

French Flounce Skirt, at $1.20.

Corset Covers, trimmed with Hamburg edging, inserting, ruffling, tucks, &c., at 80 cents to $1.50.

HOSIERY, etc.

Ladies' Iron Frame Hose, excellent quality, at 25c. per pr.

Ladies' full regular made Hose, at 25c. per pr.

Ladies' fine Balbriggan Hose at $2 50 per 1-2 doz.

Ladies' Striped Hose in every variety at 46c. per pr. and upward.

A full line of Ladies' Cashmere and Woolen Hose at lowest prices.

Children's White and Colored Woolen Hose, a particular specialty.

Gents' full regular Half Hose, cheapest in the city, at 25c a pair.

Gents' Merino and Cashmere Hose at 41c. and upward.

Gents' Shaker Socks, not to be equalled, at 31c. per pair.

Ladies' Hemstitched Handkerchiefs, at 12c. and upward.

Gents' Linen Handkerchiefs, superior quality, at 18c. and upwards.

Gents' Hemstitched Handkerchiefs, all Linen, at 39c. up.

Altman's New Price List.

We have just received a fine assortment of Ladies' and Gents' Kid Gloves, including the following specialties. Single button blk and col'd Kid Gloves at 50c. per pair, Next grade better at 95c. per pr. Warranted.
"ALTMAN" Kid Glove, our own make, in black and all fashionable shades, at $1 25 two-buttoned, every pair taken back and a new pair given if they rip or tear.
"Josephine" real Kid Glove, perfect quality, at $1 95 per pair.

"Lucca" Kid Glove, an excellent wearing glove, at 95c per pair, two button.

Gauntlet Glove, every color and shade, 63c. and upward.

A large assortment of Woolen Gloves for Ladies', Gents' and Children at the lowest prices, from 25c. to $1 00 per pair.

Gent's Fine French Dogskin Gloves, every color, at $1 29 per pair.

Gents' fine French Gloves, excellent wear, at 95c. per pair.

Ladies' 3 4 and 6 button, every shade, $1 40 and 11 80.

Full assortment of Cloth and Wollen Gloves, from 25cts. to $1 per doz.

Gent's Furnishing Department.

This department is replete with a splendid assorted stock, and our prices are such as undersell any other establishment, where quality is included.

100 doz. Gents' Merino Shirts and Drawers, at 50c. and up.

75 " " Clouded, all sizes, at 64c. "

75 " " Red Flannel woven very fine, $1 69 "

Our own make Dress Shirts, perfect fit, made of Wamsutta Muslin, fine linen bosoms, open or closed at back, at $12 per half doz.

Extra fine perfectly fitting Dress Shirts, New York Mills Muslin with Richardson's best linen bosoms, made in any style to order, at $14 per half dozen.

Gents' White Dress Shirts as low as $1 each.

Gents' Merino Under Shirts at 85c. up to $2 00.

Gents' Suspenders, every variety, at 25c. up.

Gents' Windsor Scarfs, best quality, at 89c. and up.

" Wide end colored Ties, endless variety, at 45c.

" Collars and Cuffs in all the latest styles.

" Collars pure Linen, latest styles, $2 00 per doz.

" Columbia 3 ply linen collars, at $1 90 per doz.

" Turn down collars at $1 75 per doz.

" 3 ply cuffs at 25c. per pair.

" St. James Cuff, 3 ply, all linen, at 31c. per pair.

" Elmwood Paper Collars at 25c. per box.

" Superior Paper Cuffs at 32c. per box of 10 prs.

" Common Paper Collar at any price per box.

A large assortment of Boys' Merino Shirts and Drawers at 50 cents.

Boys' and Children's full regular made Shirts and Drawers at 73c. and upward.

Children's Merino Dresses, all sizes at $1 25 upward.

Ladies' and Misses' Merino Vests and Drawers at all prices.

Toilet Department Jewelry, &c.

Tooth Brushes, excellent to best, from 10c. and upward.

Nail " " " " 14c. "

Hair " " " " 28c. "

Dressing Combs " " " " 10c. "

Hand Mirrors, elegant designs, " 31c. "

Tortoise-shell Back Combs, " 25c. "

Ladies' Rubber Belt Buckles, " 25c. "

Jet " " " " 25c. "

Ladies' Jet Earrings, in latest designs, 10c. "

" Real Garnet Sets, " 38c. "

" Bracelets of all kinds, " 38c. "

" Beaded Belts, " 75c. "

" Leather Belts, " 20c. "

" Rubber Belts, " 45c. "

" Beaded Pockets, " 50c. "

" Leather Satchels, in newest styles, at $1.50 and up.

" Real Russia Leather Satchels, from $4.50 and up.

" Morocco Pocket Books, from 18 cents and upward.

" Real Russia Leather Pocket Books, from 35c. up.

" Shawl Straps, " " " " from 45c. and up.

Children's School Bags, " " " " 81 to 89 cents.

Ladies' Ties, " " " " 28 cents and upward.

" Linen Collars, " " " " 7 cents

" Linen Cuffs, " " " " from 5 cents per pair.

" Neck Ruffling, " " " " from 15c. and upward.

" Undersleeves, " " " " from 45c. and upward.

Gilt and Jet Earrings, Pins and Bracelets, from 25 cents per pair, or as high as $5 per set, according to quality and design. We guarantee that, in the exercise of our own judgment, on receiving as near a description as possible of what is required, and the price desired to be paid, we will give entire satisfaction or refund the money on return of goods C. O. D.

Ribbons of all styles, colors and widths, at prices that will astonish customers.

In Velvet, Velveteens, Satins, and all kindred goods, we have a full stock, of which we cut on bias at wholesale prices.

We have on hand 5000 pieces of the Worsted Ball and Twisted Fringes, now so much in vogue, which we are offering at the unheard of low price of 48 cents per yard, in all colors.

Forty different styles of the latest designs in Beaded Gimps and Fringes, now so fashionable, which we offer at from 25 cents per yard up to $3, according to the quality and design. I will personally attend to all orders coming through the Liberal papers, and having, for many years, filled orders for the readers of this paper, my judgment may be relied upon in the proper selection of purchases.

All goods not mentioned herein, including such as are entirely out of our regular line of business, will be as judiciously and carefully selected, and as readily sent as those enumerated, and I will guarantee, in all cases, that the prices will be as low as anywhere else in the United States. Ladies' and Misses' Suits and Gentlemen's Clothing may be confidently ordered, all that is requisite being the correct measure, and about the style, price and kind of material required. I will make myself personally responsible for the remainder.

I will guarantee to satisfactorily fill all orders that may be sent, and assure all patrons that wherever goods are sent, different in prices or kinds than ordered, that the goods may be returned by express, C. O. D., at our risk and expenses. Address

MORRIS ALTMAN,

OF THE FIRM OF M. ALTMAN & CO.

Sixth Avenue and 19th Street,

A Grand Combination!$10.00 for $4.00.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE FOR 1875.
THE HERALD OF HEALTH FOR 1875.
THE TRUTH SEEKER FOR 1875.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE, in one volume of over 1000 pages and 36 illustrations, and that charming Chromo.

"JUST ONE,"

all sent, post-paid, for only Four Dollars.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

Scottish Western Loan Co.,G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,*Bankers,*Le Roy, Minnesota,

BRANCH OFFICE, 332 East 13th St., N. Y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest
Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner.

10 per cent. paid on receipt of money at the Bank, or in New York until invested.
For full particulars, send for Circular.
To Jan. 1, 1875.

SPIRITUALISM.

The recent extraordinary attention the subject is attracting, and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless, and widely-circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

Religio-Philosophical Journal

3 MONTHS for 30 CENTS.

POSTAGE FREE AFTER JANUARY 1st.

The JOURNAL is a large 8-page weekly paper, regular price $3 per year, now in its Ninth Year. Address S. S. JONES, Editor, 180 E. Adam St., Chicago.

N. B.—State where you saw this advertisement.

J. M. FOLLETT.

E. B. HILL.

SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid:
Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz.
Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz.
All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUAL-IST at WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL.

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles,
Oils, etc., etc.,

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.

A Valuable Home Book for Women.Talks to my Patients*HINTS ON GETTING WELL AND KEEPING WELL.

BY MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

Table of Contents:

Growing Girls; Menstruation; Amen-
orrhoea; Menorrhagia; Dysmenorrhoea;
Prolapsus Uteri; Leucorrhoea; Pregnancy;
Approaching Confinement; Delivery; After Delivery; Care of the Breasts; After Confinement; Bathing of Babies; Dress of Infants; Nursing; Weaning; Feeding of Infants; Infantile Diseases; Diseases of Children; Children's Dress; Confidential to Mothers; Intentional Abortion; Accidental Abortion; Sterility; Nervous Derangements; Sleep; Indigestion; Constipation; Menopause, or Change of Life.

It is a most Valuable Work, and should be in the hands of every Lady.

Price, $1.50 by mail. Sold by
D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

RARE OFFERS!

We offer a sample of the

The Ladies' Own Magazine,

a sample of its premium Chromo, and choice of the following popular books, all for 50 cents: Victor Hugo's BELLING-
ER OF NOTRE DAME, Goldsmith's
VICAR OF WAKEFIELD, Lamb's ES-SAYS, Defoe's ROBINSON CRUSOE,
Gerald Griffin's COLLEEN BAWN.
OBJECT, to introduce our superb Magazine and get agents for it. It is the best LITERARY, HOUSEHOLD and FASHION Monthly published. SU-PERBLY ILLUSTRATED. Bound in ILLUMINATED COVERS. Over 40 first-class writers. ROMANCE, BIOG-RAPHY, HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY,
POETRY, PHILOSOPHY, HEALTH, SCIENCE, FASHION.

$2.00 A YEAR, postpaid, with a superb Chromo. In 16 Oil Colors. LARGE CASH PAY, or Splendid Premiums for Clubs.

AGENTS make $50 a week. Now is the time to Subscribe, and make up Clubs.

T. A. BLAND, Publisher,

11 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK.

Has great MAGNIFYING power, used for detecting Counterfeit Money, Shoddy in cloth foreign substances in the Eye, in wounds, etc., and to examine Insects, Flowers and Plants, to detect flaws in Metals, fineness of wood-grain; to decipher writing otherwise illegible; and for the inspection of grain, minerals, etc. Useful for everybody. Double
Convex Lens, 1 1/2 inches in diameter.
Mounted in Leather, and carried in the vest pocket. Price 60 cents, two for $1, free by mail. Agents Wanted. Illustrated circulars and terms free. Address

M. L. BYRN,

P. O. Box 4,669, New York. Office, No. 49
Nassau Street.

BEST AND CHEAPESTSEEDS*In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name.
A nice Floral and Garden Guide free.
Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

R. H. SHUMWAY,
Rockford, Ill.

till Apr. 15.

No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Free-thought and Miscellaneous
Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty.

Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole,
6ts Bronson, Mich.

Eating For Strength.A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

GIVEN AWAY.

The new chromo, "THE TERRIBLE BATTLE," 16x22 inches, will be sent postpaid to all who send 25 cents for the "Farm and Fireside," 117 Nassau St., room 22, New York.

Every PersonOf a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEENReligion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Sexual Physiology.

BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. With eighty fine engravings. AGENTS WANTED.

SYNOPSIS OF TABLE OF CONTENTS.

The Male Organs of Generation.
The Female Organs of Generation.
The Origin of Life.
Sexual Generation.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Impregnation.
Pregnancy.
Embryology.
Parturition.
Lactation.
The Law of Sex.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Theory of Population.
The Law of Sexual Intercourse.
Hereditary Transmission.
Philosophy of Marriage.

This work has rapidly passed through twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Prof. Wilder, of Cornell University, says it is the best work of its kind published.

Price, by mail, $2.00. Sold by

D. M. BENNETT.

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Parturition without Pain.

EDITED BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Editor of the Herald of Health.

CONTENTS:

1. Healthfulness of Child-Bearing.
2. Dangers of Preventions.
3. Medical Opinions as to escaping Pain.
4. Preparation for Maternity.
5. Exercise during Pregnancy.
6. The Sitz Bathing and Bathing generally.
7. What Food to Eat and what to Avoid.
8. The Mind during Pregnancy.
9. The Ailments of Pregnancy and their Remedies.
10. Female Physicians, Anesthetics.

To which are added:

1. The Husband's Duty to his Wife.
2. Best Age for Rearing Children.
3. Shall sickly people become Parents?
4. Small
Families.
5. Importance of Physiological
Adaptation of Husband and Wife.
6. Celibacy.
7. Effects of Tobacco on Offspring.
8. Latest Discoveries as to the determining the sex of Offspring.
9. Father's vs. Mother's Influence on the Child.
10. Shall Pregnant Women Work?
11. Effects of Intellectual Activity on number of Offspring.
12. Size of Pelvis, and its relation to healthful Parturition, etc., etc.

What is said about "Parturition without Pain."

Godley's Lady's Book says: "We give our cordial approbation to this work, and would like to see it in the hands of every mother in the land. The information it contains is most important, and, we are fully convinced, reliable.

Price, by mail, $1.00. Address

D. M. BENNETT.

335 Broadway, N. Y.

D. M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED,
AND PRICED
SEED ANNUAL 1875
Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.
Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

"Common Sense."A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.*A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY
OF SPIRITUALISM, SOCIAL RE-
FORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE,
Etc., Etc.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors.

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions.

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per Annum, Post-paid.
Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,

236 Montgomery St.,

San Francisco, Cal.

500,000 FreethinkersWANTED

To subscribe for the second volume of

THE LYCEUM.

A Monthly Illustrated Liberal Paper for the Young, designed to teach them "Religion without Superstition." Its writers are amongst the ablest in the Liberal ranks, and, as it occupies an exclusive field—the education of the young in the principles of Freethought—it appeals to every liberal and non-church member for support.

The publisher, determined to offer every possible inducement to subscribe, makes the following very liberal

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Two dozen steel pens, or the excellent little book, "Stories for Our Children," and THE LYCEUM three months for twenty-five cents and a 3 cent stamp for postage.

Two dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or four dozen steel pens and THE LYCEUM six months for fifty cts.
and two 3 cent stamps for postage.

For seventy-five cents THE LYCEUM will be sent one year and "One pack of Arithmetical Cards and Games," and four dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or "The Lyceum Stage."

For one dollar THE LYCEUM will be sent one year, with one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games and four dozen steel pens; or one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games," the "Stories for our Children," and two dozen steel pens.

When requested we will substitute other books of equal value for any of the above.
The above liberal rates are made to secure the patronage of every one not in sympathy with the churches. Please forward the amount of at least one subscription to

P. H. BATESON,

Publisher of THE LYCEUM,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

Odds and Ends.

WHEN a man ain't good for anything else he is about right to sit on a jury.

FIRE is said to be a dissipated element because it goes out almost every night.

THE color of the wind was discovered by the man who went out and found it blew.

"O YE WOMEN!" exclaimed a platform orator, and a voice in the crowd responded "Ah men."

THE proprietor of a Boston eating saloon advertises a "sacred clam chowder every Sunday evening."

GRUMP accidentally sat on a red hot coal, and spent the night following in trying to turn so he could see his wound.

"WILLIE, I'm going to heaven," she wrote, "and you will never see me again," which was pretty heaven on Willie.

A SCHOOLBOY spelled "sob," and then defined it thus: "It means when a fellow don't want to cry and it bursts out itself."

AN Ohio girl who went to Saratoga in hopes to find a count came back engaged to a man who makes waterproof blacking.

AN old lady upon taking her first ride in the cars, remarked when the train ran off the track: "You fetch up rather sudden; don't ye?"

THE body of a man murdered at Little Rock had thirty-four bullets in it, and the printers thought that the obituary ought to be leaded.

SOMEBODY advertises a preparation for keeping a lady's hands free from chaps. A report that she has no money would do the same thing.

NOTHING will sooner tempt a bachelor to abandon his resolution to marry, than to sleep in the adjoining room to a couple with a colicky baby.

THE latest case of indolence is reported of John Hole, who in writing his name simply uses the letter J and punches a hole in the paper for the remainder.

"WHEN I put my foot down, I'll have you to understand," said Mrs. Nojoker, "that there's something there." On investigation it was found to be a No. 11 shoe.

AN Indiana clergyman sued a newspaper for libel, and dropped dead within a week. The Detroit Free Press says these fellows will learn something by and by.

"I AM busy ploughing, and cannot entertain company," was the substance of a note sent by an Illinois belle in reply to an intimation that a gentleman desired to visit her.

MISS BACON, who lived out West, knew Beans and married him. The occasion is far too serious, however, for the perpetration of a single one of those too palpable jokes.

A boy coasting at Brattleboro' came up behind a lady and took her feet out from under her in such a way that she sat down on the sled and was carried to the foot of the hill.

AND when that blushing San Francisco bride showed the check for $1,000,000 to her husband, he burst into tears and exclaimed, with intense fervor, "And even this shall not separate us!"

A PARTY of Sioux Indians stole a patent ice cream freezer, thinking it was a hand organ, and all the big medicine men turned the crank a week before they concluded there was no music in it.

TWENTY-ONE girls of Kenosha, Wis., have "Resolved, That if the young men won't come and see us, we will go and see them." And the young men are stepping down and out, and taking to the woods.

READING the great Spurgeon's declaration that "a cigar is a thing to thank God for," a school boy in Rome bought a cigar. He was afterwards seen hanging over a fence, but he was not giving thanks.

AN improvident Danbury youth entertains a high appreciation for the State prison, which he regards as "the only place where a fellow is not dunned for his board and washing every Saturday night."

A LADY went into a carpet store recently and pointing out a carpet, asked the proprietor what it was. "Brussels," says the proprietor. "Brussels," quoth the lady, passing her hand over it. "Seems to me the bristles don't stick up much."

A HEN-PECKED husband closed his testimony in his action for divorce from his wife as follows: "I don't want to say anything agin the woman, Judge, but I wish you could live with her a little while, and you'd think I had told the truth."

A PARTY of young men were out serenading a few nights since. They sat on the pavement, which had been recently paved with a tar solution. Next morning the rear of six pairs of pants dotted the walk, and music is heard no more around that cottage.

THE Rev. Mr. Rexford of San Francisco is not an admirer of some of the Bible celebrities. In a late sermon he said that Job was a stupid fool, with a character beneath contempt, and that the author of Ecclesiastes was a poor, forlorn, morbid-minded creature.

"STEP in," said a cheap clothier to a countryman; "The cheapest goods in the market." "Have you any fine shirts?" "A splendid assortment, sir." "Are they clean?" "Of course, sir—clean, to be sure." "Then," said the countryman gravely, "you had better put one on."

LAWYER—How do you identify this handkerchief? Witness—By its general appearance, and the fact that I have others like it. Counsel (cutely)—That's no proof, for I have got one just like it in my pocket. Witness (innocently)—I don't doubt that, as I had more than one of the same sort stolen.

WHEN the duchess of Edinburgh wants to talk nicey-nicey to her boy baby all she has to say is, "And was it its own muzzy's blessed little Albert Alexander Alfred Ernest William?" And then that overburdened infant goes into convulsions that would wist the back bone right out of a plebeian baby.

As my wife at the window one beautiful day stood watching a man with a monkey, a cart came along with a broth of a boy, who was driving a stout little donkey. To my wife then I spoke, by way of a joke, "There is a relation of yours in that carriage." To which she replied, when the donkey she spied, "Ah, yes! a relation by marriage."

A GERMAN living near Louisville, went into the city to get a doctor for his father, who was very sick. On his way back with the physician, he was met by one who said his father was dead. "Mein Gott," exclaimed the afflicted son, "vat expenses. Only three weeks ago mein sister-in-law was dead, and now comes some more funeral expenses."

"How much is your stick candy?" inquired a boy of a candy dealer. "Six sticks for five cents." "Six sticks for five cents, eh! Now, let me see. Six sticks for five cents, five for four cents, four for three cents, three for two cents, two for one cent, one for nothin'. I'll take one." And he walked out, leaving the candy man in a state of bewilderment.

"Now, then, Joseph, parse courting," said a teacher to a rather slow boy. "Courtin' is an irregular active transitive verb, indicative mood, present tense, third person, and singular number, and so on," said Joseph. "Well, but what does it agree with?" demanded the teacher. "It agrees with all the gals in town!" triumphantly exclaimed Joseph.

A WONDER-STROCK CHINAMAN.—While the gale was at its height a nobby-looking Chinaman was walking behind a young lady dressed in the extreme agony of fashion, when a sudden gust of wind blew the Celestial's tail forward and wrapped the end of it around the lady's neck. Being frightened, she grabbed the end of the queue to snatch it away, but pulled in the wrong direction. The Chinaman also made a grab to recover his property, but he got hold of one of these long curls, and when he took a pull at it the whole of the lady's top hair, hat and all, came off. If ever you saw a Chinaman astonished, it was that one.

Science in Story,

A NOVELTY IN LITERATURE.

EDUCATION AND ROMANCE BLENDED.

Adapted to Children and Youth.

Imparts more valuable information than any other book.

SAMMY TUBBS,
The Boy Doctor,

AND
SPONSIE, the Troublesome Monkey.

BY E. B. FOOTE, M.D.,

Author of "Plain Home Talk," "Medical Common Sense," etc.

The entire series comprises five volumes, though the first four are perfect in themselves, and may be purchased with or without the fifth. Each volume contains over sixty illustrations, and is neatly bound in uniform style.

SAMMY TUBBS is an intelligent colored boy, who becomes a Doctor. SPONSIE is a very mischievous and interesting monkey. The story is so blended with physiological and anatomical science, as to make it not only interesting to the young mind, but very instructive.

The work is giving extraordinary satisfaction wherever introduced.

Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 per Vol.

Address D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

For Children and Youth.

Amusement and Instruction.

BLAKE MAN'S

TWO HUNDRED

Poetical Riddles,

ON A GREAT VARIETY OF SUBJECTS.

INTERESTING AND NEW!

PUBLISHED BY

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sent postpaid on receipt of Price—20 cents.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE

Heathens of the Heath,

A ROMANCE,

Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH

PRIESTCRAFT, THE MISSION-

ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shown up.

A perusal of it will open

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your

Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will Regret the Investment.

It contains nearly 450 pages, 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper, and gotten up in excellent style.

Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00

In Cloth, neatly bound.....1.50

Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,

335 BROADWAY,

New York.

AN EXTRAORDINARY BOOK!

FIFTY YEARS AHEAD OF THE TIMES!!

PLAIN HOME TALK,

AND

Medical Common Sense.

By E. B. FOOTE, M. D.

A Most Remarkable Work, published in both the English and German Languages.

CONTAINING

Nearly 1,000 Pages, and 200 Illustrations.

Price, $3.25.

It contains a full description of all Diseases given in plain language adapted to the Comprehension of the General Public; with the most Rational, Reformatory treatment. It contains a vast amount of valuable Information not to be found in any other Medical Work.

PART I.

This Part treats of Disease. Of Blood, mental and nervous derangements—how we violate our moral nature. The food we eat, its conversion into bone, muscle, &c.; The liquids we drink; The atmosphere we live in; The clothes we wear; Bad habits of children and youths; Bad habits of manhood and womanhood; (these essays are startling in nature and remarkably illustrated). The male and female element in nature; The ethics of sexual association; Prostitution; its moral and physical effects; Unhappy marriages; Why they are detrimental to the nervous and vascular fluids; Wealth; Failures in business; Excessive study; Melancholy; How to preserve the health of children; The physiological instruction of children; Sleep; CLEANLINESS; Sunshine; Therapeutic electricity; Animal magnetism; Water; Woman doctors; Rapacious doctors.

PART II.

This part treats on Chronic diseases: Catarrh; Chronic Affections of the Throat; Consumption (this essay on Consumption should be read by everybody); Chronic diseases of the Liver, Stomach and Bowels; Dyspepsia; Constipation; Diarrhea; Piles; Aches and pains; Neuralgia; Rheumatism; Affections of the Eyes and Ears; Diseases of the Heart; Chronic Affections of the Urinary Organs; Diseases of the Kidneys; Private words for Women; Derangements of the Menstrual Function; Falling of the Womb; Vaginal affections; Amorous Dreams; Man-hating; Sexual Dyspepsia; Ovarian Diseases; Hints to the Childless; Causes of Sterility; Local Diseased Condition of Man and Wife; Excessive Amativeness; Temperamental Inadaptation; How to Promote Child-bearing; Private Words to Men; Diseases of the Male Organs; Impotency; Paralysis; Syphilis; Other Chronic Diseases.

PART III.

PLAIN TALK.

This part treats of the Sexual Organs: The Causes of their Disgrace; Their Influence on Physical Development, and on health; Their Influence on the Social Position of Women, and on Civilization; (the philosophy of this subject is fully discussed on all conceivable points); History of Marriage; History of Polygamy; History, Customs and Principles of the Oneida Community; History, Customs and Practices of Mormonism; Early Customs; History of Monogamy; The Advantages and Disadvantages of both Systems; Historical Clippings with reference to Marriage; Marriage as it is in Barbarism and Civilization; Marriage in the Old and New World; Defects of the Marriage Systems; Demerits of Polygamy and Monogamy; The Remedy; Sexual Immorality, Causes and Cure.

PART IV.

ON THE IMPROVEMENT OF POPULAR MARRIAGE. This part treats of How Marriage may be better than it is; What we Want; Adaptation in Marriage; What Constitutes Mental and Physical Adaptation; The Vital Temperaments; What Combinations are Best; Why Marriage is now a Lottery; Mental Marriages; Physical Marriages; Philosophy of Elopements; sexual Moderation; Its effects upon both sexes; Jealousy; Its Infallible Remedy; The Intermarriage of Relatives; Essays for Married People; The Wife the Equal Partner; Sleeping Apart; Conception, Sexual Indifference; Food for Expectant Mothers; Card to Married People; Child Marking, its Philosophy; Larger liberties should be allowed to ladies to contract or propose marital association; Card to the Unmarried.

This brief summary gives but an inadequate idea of the interesting character, originality, practicability and instructiveness of this wonderful work.

Every Family wishing a Medical Work of the very Highest Order, cannot afford to be without DR. FOOTE'S

PLAIN HOME TALK and

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.

With each copy is presented a splendid Chromo, entitled "Throw Physic to the Dogs," representing a pretty girl administering medicine to some five sick canines.

Enclose the Price of the Work, $3.25, to

D. M. BENNETT, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

Publisher of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Dealer in all Liberal, Spiritualistic and Scientific Books, Sent post-paid by mail

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO

SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION, FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO

Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 10. { D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. } NEW YORK, JANUARY 15, 1875. { 335 BROADWAY, SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker,

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

EIGHT hundred thousand more women than men in England.

WHY was Ruth very rude to Boaz? Because she pulled his ears and trod on his corn.

No FRENCH play will hereafter, dating from Jan. 1, 1875, be allowed to be acted in Alsace or Lorraine.

"HELL closed for repairs," was the title of the Rev. Mr. Lutz's sermon, in New Haven, on New Year's night.

It is proposed to send out expeditions from India to Bentineck Island and the Andaman Islands to observe the eclipse of the sun in April next.

It is said that sixty different nations now burn American kerosene. Germany, in 1873, consumed 62,116,773 gallons, at a cost of $11,479,151; Belgium, 22,618,550 gallons, costing $5,127,408; England $2,000,000 worth, and Ireland about $1,341,765 worth.

A ROMAN says that a very important discovery has been made on the Esquiline Hill, consisting of seven statues in fine preservation. There is a remarkable bust of Commodus, several heads, and many fragments. All these have been found in one room not yet entirely excavated. There are indications of the presence of other objects.

A HARD TIME FOR PAPERS.—It is stated that over two hundred papers and periodicals have ceased to exist within the last two months for want of patronage. Hard times affect papers as readily as any interest in the country. It is hoped the friends of Free Thought will feel sufficient interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER to prevent its starving.

ANOTHER CLERGYMAN UNDER A CLOUD.—This time it is the Rev. Luke Miles, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Zion Church in Norwich, Conn. He has "stepped down and out" with a considerable sum of money belonging to his congregation, and which was raised for the building of a new church. There is said to be a "lady in the case" also, as usual.

DISGRACEFUL SCENE IN CHURCH.—Cincinnati, Dec. 25. There was a stunning sensation to-day in one of our high-toned Episcopal churches (St. John's) on the occasion of the Christmas services and Communion. The rector of this church, the Rev. C. B. Davidson, died recently, and his place has not yet been supplied. To-day another minister, of Covington, had been secured to officiate. Unfortunately, the latter gentleman had partaken rather freely of egg-nogg before going to church; and worse still, when he got there he dived into the jug of Communion wine, drinking long and often of the rich juice of the grape. He managed to get through the formal services decently, but by the time he commenced on his Christmas sermon, the mixture of egg-nogg and wine had so worked upon his brain that he was badly "off," wandering sadly. He rambled around, jumping from one topic to another in such a way that all could see that the man was drunk. At last, when the thing became unbearable, the wardens gave the signal and the congregation, a small one, got up quietly and left with dignity, leaving the minister to talk to empty benches.

CELIA BURLEIGH SAYS: "I see no reason why a girl should not be taught the use of the jack-knife, hammer, and saw, to drive a nail, tighten a screw or put up a shelf in her room. She should, if possible, have a garden, and be taught to take a pride in her acquaintance with Nature, in her good health and ability to endure fatigue. Each should be taught what is traditionally proper for the sex to which he or she belongs, but I shall be very far from saying, 'Only this and nothing more.'"

A NUMBER of lady gymnasts are in regular practice at the rooms of the Olympic Club in San Francisco. They do their contortions in slippers, striped stockings, loose pants, and other things, in which costume they are said to look sweetly pretty. They run, jump, swing, pull weights, and do lots of difficult things. The schoolmarm are given to practice on the trapeze and horizontal bar, while it is noticed that the married women mostly devote their efforts to practice in swinging the heavy clubs.

ONE night recently, a Detroit policeman, passing a certain house about 10 o'clock, saw a man drop from a window, and heard smothered cries inside. He seized the man for a burglar, but soon found that he had the owner of the house in his clutches. "Well," said the officer, "it looked suspicious to see you drop out of a window that way." "Well," replied the man, heaving a sigh, "when the old woman gets her dander up I ain't particular about what road I take to get out of the house."

"MIND is a property of matter. There can be no mind without matter, and there can be no matter without mind. When the matter is simple in its composition, its mental tendencies are simple; as it becomes more varied in its composition its mental tendencies become more complex. The various tendencies of the human mind are not in reality more wonderful than the tendency which impels two ships to approach each other in a calm. For what can be more wonderful than that which can never be explained? 'Every system which would escape the fate of an organism too rigid to adjust itself to its environment, must be plastic to the extent that the growth of knowledge demands.' 'For religion to oppose science proved disastrous in the past, and it is simply fatuitous to-day.'"

PREFERRING TO GO TO HELL.—An English teacher enjoining upon the members of a training class their duty of giving to children bright and happy thoughts of religion, used this illustration of the danger of the opposite course:

He said a little girl was once asking her elder sister about heaven.

"Do they play in heaven?" she inquired.

"No, they do not play there."

"What do they do?"

"They sing and are good."

"Are there no toys there?"

"No, not any."

"No dolls, nor balls, nor Noah's arks?"

"Oh, no!"

"Then," said the little one, "I shall take my dolly and go to hell."

A SCHOOLMASTER who had lately become a proud father "so reported," had occasion to punish one of his pupils, who was doomed to write a composition. It was a much dreaded effort, and was jerked off in the following manner: "On Babies; by 1 who knows. Babies are small, pet animals. Their chief fodder is new milk. You can't tell how old they are when they are born, for they haven't got no teeth. They run to taller, and if they didn't yell some of it off, it would be dangerous to take one of 'em near the fire, that is if you're afraid of grease spots. They are the most selfish critters any one knows of. Like 'children of a larger growth,' only more so, they are bound to have what they think they want, 'sink or swim, live or die,' that is, if they can't get it, but if they can have it, they 'don't want any on their plate,' and won't have it. They have no more concern for the future to come, any more than they care who was their great-grandfather. Some of them don't even know their own father, and may be never will. Enough said."

STILL ANOTHER.—Rev. A. B. Burdick, of River Point, R. I., according to the Providence Dispatch, has been guilty of improprieties of a social character with female lambs of his flock, and he has been notified by the officers of his church to preach no more until the matter has been duly investigated. When will inexperienced young ladies learn to beware of these oily-tongued, false-hearted tempters—these bogus teachers of morality and purity?

ANOTHER FALLEN CLERGYMAN.—Winchester, Pa., was lately astounded by the promulgation of the fact that Rev. Joseph Stillim had ruined Miss Sarah Hall, a young lady of high standing in society, and of heretofore unblemished character. The discovery of her ruin has thrown the young lady into a state of temporary insanity. In her sane moments she says he quoted the Bible to prove that his conduct was in accordance with the dictates of the Word of God.—N. Y. Sun.

THE Annual Auction Sale of pews in Plymouth Church was recently held, at which the Pastor pleasantly presided. The bidding was very lively, and many pews sold at a premium of over $500 each in excess of the regular rentals. The aggregate sales amounted to $58,325—some $12,000 more than last year. Mr. Beecher's popularity is not waning with his faithful flock of twenty-three hundred, and many of them have evinced a determination to sustain him and adhere to him, no matter what crimes he may be proved guilty of. It is a very wealthy congregation—gold and greenbacks, houses and lands, goods and chattels it has in abundance. It is admitted it stands at the head of the Christian Church in the United States; but the conviction with many is becoming settled that its purity and honesty are not commensurate with its riches. The resemblance between this church of rich men and their amorous pastor, with his salary of $20,000 a year, and the lowly Jesus and his penniless, homeless followers, is not so close as to mislead even an ordinary observer. If these rich men find ready entrance into heaven, why not the average men of the world?

A CERTAIN deacon, who was a zealous advocate for the cause of temperance, employed a carpenter to make some alterations in his parlor. In repairing a corner near the fireplace, it was found necessary to remove the wainscot, when lo! a "mare's nest" was brought to light, which astonished the workman most marvelously. A brace of decanters, sundry junk bottles—all containing "something to take"—a pitcher and tumbler were cosily reposing there in snug quarters. The joiner, with wonder-stricken countenance, ran to the proprietor with the intelligence. "Well, I declare," exclaimed the deacon, "that is curious, sure enough. It must be that old Captain B. left those things there when he occupied the premises thirty years since." "Perhaps he did," returned the discoverer; "but, deacon, that ice in the pitcher must have been well frozen to have remained solid."

THE GREAT BEECHER SCANDAL SUIT is at length in actual progress, and some eight days have already been devoted to it. Some four days were consumed in obtaining a jury, and with it both sides seemed satisfied, especially Mr. Beecher's. It is composed almost entirely of orthodox Christians, embracing Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptist, Lutherans and Catholics. If this dozen Christian gentlemen find the clergyman an innocent, injured man, we trust our Liberal friends favorable to Mr. Beecher will feel it is "all right."

Five able attorneys are engaged on either side, besides several aids. Gen. S. Morris opened the case for Mr. Tilton, occupying two days and part of another. His arraignment and argument, including Mr. Beecher's numerous letters, make a strong case against the Reverend gentleman. Mr. and Mrs. Beecher are in attendance at court, as well as Mrs. Tilton a portion of the time. In view of all that has been said and divulged in reference to these parties, it is a novel picture to see them sitting hour after hour within a few feet of each other without recognition. It is hoped the whole truth will be reached before the trial terminates, which bids fair to last for two weeks to come. Many predict the jury will not agree, but like the general public be divided in their verdict.

(Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER IX.

Long before the sun had set on the day of the departure of Maurice Fitz Raymond on his military campaign, the party to which he belonged began to comprehend fully that the service in which they had engaged was likely to be no child's play.

Maurice had been appointed to the command of a few followers from Charleston, who, were it not for his example and influence, would not have joined the expedition as the authorities well knew.

He had not, of course, the most distant idea of the conspiracy of Sloucher and Huskins against Alice, else he should have been by her side to defend her freedom with his life.

Singular enough it was, that while the Fanatic and his sleuth hounds were ready to pounce upon her and to consign her to the depths of a dungeon, a terrible and inexorable enemy was hovering about the path that he and his little party were pursuing, and that at one and the same moment, both his own life and that of his betrothed were exposed to sudden and imminent peril.

Of the danger of his own situation, however, he soon became aware; for scarcely had he and his followers proceeded a dozen miles in the direction of Cape Ann, when a couple of scouts fell back upon them with the intelligence that a small party of Indians, perhaps to the number of twenty or thirty, had been just discovered skulking ahead on one side of the way.

This was not very pleasant news, but as the whole force of the whites, when concentrated, had nothing to fear from an encounter with so small a body, he still moved onward, his little command being only a short distance ahead of another small body of adventurous volunteers, the commander of which was now, of course, informed of the precise state of affairs.

It being considered advisable, however, that the whites should, under the circumstances, keep as close together as practicable, the latter body quickening their pace, soon came up with the former. Maurice, not choosing to fall back, as the movement might countenance the idea that he was over-sensitive in relation to the danger that threatened him.

It was about four o'clock in the afternoon, and shortly after both divisions had become united, that the scouts again came in with the information that they were certain the small force of Indians they had first discovered, was lying in ambush about a mile further on, in the very path the campaigners were pursuing, and that there was no doubt a sudden and deadly attack would be made upon the advancing body.

Every precaution was now taken necessary to the repelling of the savage, and to the teaching him a bitter lesson, if such could be effected. That he was mainly armed with bow and arrow, knife and tomahawk, was supposed probable; but that he had some fire-arms could scarcely be doubted. If, however, as the scouts had reason to believe, he was not in anything like force so much the better; but as nothing could be positively known on this point until an onset was made, it was decided to push forward and take the chances as they happened to present themselves.

On, then, the dauntless little body moved, every eye and ear on the qui vive, and every finger on a trigger. As they approached the spot indicated by the scouts, it was discovered that the red man had taken up his position on one side of a narrow entrance to a deep ravine, among some underwood that crowned a ledge of rock which rose on the right of the pass.

When, however, the whites appeared about to enter the ravine, at a signal from their commanders, they suddenly dashed out of the track, and in a few seconds were in among the Indians, who, thrown into confusion by so unexpected a movement, as well as by a deadly volley that accompanied it the moment they were perceived, fled in every direction, without striking a blow, leaving five of their number dead behind them, and bearing off one or two who were wounded. This success, which was cheering in the extreme, raised the hopes of those who knew but little of the wiles and the cruel cunning of the red man, and who was not sensible of the fact that he seldom accepts a defeat as final, and is never taught a lesson short of absolute extermination.

As night was about to set in dark, dismal and stormy, the little body of whites encamped on the edge of the forest among some rocks by the sea shore where, an elevated open space, surrounded by heavy timber, afforded them dry ground and a favorable position for meeting successfully any sudden descent that might be made upon them before morning.

Now, however, the rain began to descend in torrents, and the wind to all but uproot the forest that soon commenced to thunder with the hoarse cannonade of falling pines. The animals that carried the baggage began to tremble with terror in the appalling tumult that surrounded them, while the tents, that had not been securely pitched, were one and all blown absolutely from their fastenings, and the fires completely extinguished. A comfortable mouthful was therefore out of the question; so that wet and cold, and in a measure hungry, the poor young soldiers to the number of fifty or sixty, had to content themselves, officers and men, with whatever food they could pick up in the light of a horn lantern, which enabled them to dispose of themselves, as best they could, in the shelter afforded, to some extent, by the rocks and the gigantic trees scattered about them.

In this position they lay all night; as when the wind and rain had abated, no one appeared desirous to renew his efforts to secure more comfortable quarters, inasmuch as the attempt would involve a labor which would have to be continued until almost daylight before it could be anything like successful. The fact, also, of their being fatigued, and of their having, in a measure, become familiar with their discomfort, prompted them to await the arrival of dawn before they should set about seeing to their tents or attempting to prepare a warm meal.

Maurice, although wrapped in a heavy cloak, slept but little. He knew enough of the Indian character to feel that the party that had been so suddenly defeated a few hours previously, would hang upon the footsteps of the whites, with a view to avenging their fallen comrades; and besides, now that he was surrounded with darkness, he gave himself up alternately to the thoughts of Alice and of the possibility of an attack being made, at any moment, upon the position of the party.

While the tempest, which had begun to fail about midnight, was still sobbing around him; he could scarcely banish from his mind the reflection that there was something terrible in the Christian creeds that created so much disorder and bloodshed. Here were two Christian nations, the French and the English, at war, each suborning the red man to carry death and destruction to the other, and both drawing the sword in the name of the God of battles, and asking the Supreme Being to consecrate their atrocities by lifting the light of his countenance upon them. Nor was this all; for in the very midst of the highest civilization known to the settlement, and with the bible in one hand, those who proclaimed themselves the servants of the Lord, were committing offenses so heinous against their own flesh and blood, that history stands appalled at their iniquity. Not sex, nor age, nor condition was spared in their fanatical onslaughts, and all, as alleged by them, "for the glory of Him who brought peace and good will into the world."

It was gray dawn before he closed his eyes, so intensely was he moved by these various reflections; but just as he was about to glide into the regions of dreams, the bugle sounded to arms, and the next moment the pickets were driven in before a small body of French and Indians, who were advancing rapidly upon the post.

In an instant every man was on his feet, with his arms in readiness; but before any disciplined move could be made, the enemy was in upon the camp, when a hand-to-hand encounter the most frightful at once ensued.

At first, owing to the uncertain light, friend and foe appeared mixed together in the most inextricable confusion; but as the sky gradually became brighter, the lines between them were drawn with fearful distinctness, and the work of death was resumed with awful earnestness and effect.

The men that were commanded by Maurice and his brother officer, although new to the field, performed prodigies of valor. Emulated by the example of their superiors, as sword in hand they both dashed in among the thickest of the enemy, blood soon began to flow in streams.

As the bodies engaged were nearly of equal strength, the one seemed resolved upon the extermination of the other; so that, in an incredibly short period, the space around the prostrate tents was strewn with the dying and the dead of both parties. The French fought gallantly, but were not sustained adequately by the Indians, who skulked with their bows and arrows behind the trees and rocks; while even those who had fire-arms, could not be prevailed upon to keep the ranks—from the fact, as it became afterward known, that they were greatly intimidated, having belonged to the party that had suffered so severely on the previous day.

Notwithstanding this defection, however, the issue of the conflict was beginning to wear a doubtful aspect for the colonists, when Fitz Raymond, perceiving the fact, urged on his men once more, the commander of the remainder of the party behaving gallantly also.

At this juncture, and while the contest raged fearfully around him, he encountered a French officer whose sword, like his own, was literally dripping with gore. As if tacitly recognizing each other as leaders upon whom the issue of the day depended, they stepped aside and were quickly standing almost foot to foot in a small open space that, by mere accident, had not been encumbered with the fallen.

The appearance of the two men thus pitted against each other, seemed to have an electric effect upon both parties, whose numbers were now terribly thinned, for they fell back as if by common consent, apparently impressed with the idea that the issue of this single-handed encounter was to decide the day in favor of the one body or the other.

As good fortune would have it for the colonists, Maurice was a swordsman of rare skill; and, now, as the two blades began to flash in the rising day, it was evident that the antagonists were well matched.

The Frenchman, who was the commander of the party on whose side he fought, was a noble looking fellow, and as brave and as chivalrous as a man could be; for he had made a sign to his men to keep aloof until the encounter was ended, while the officer who had the second party of colonists in charge, not to be outdone by an enemy in this relation, gave his men also to understand that they were to ground their arms, and, so long as their antagonists held aloof, to follow their example. Even the Indians seemed to comprehend the whole affair, and to share the spirit that prompted it.

A thrust from the Frenchman was parried with the speed of lightning, and returned with a dangerous adroitness that made him compress his lips and rivet his eye more keenly upon that of his antagonist. Fitz Raymond was cool and collected, and knew, from the manner in which his blade had been foiled, that his life hung upon the cast of a die, as it were. That the slightest carelessness or injudicious move on either side carried death with it was obvious; so that now each of the antagonists knew that his hour or that of his adversary had possibly come.

Another few seconds and the swords rained fire, while each combatant advanced or retreated as he happened to press the other, or to be pressed by him in turn. A slight scratch that soon reddened on the Frenchman's hand, told that he had had a narrow escape; and this conviction so chafed him, that he again assailed Fitz Raymond, but this time with a glow of mortification and anger which so disturbed him, that again the swordsmanship of Maurice made itself felt, but still in a very trifling degree. This second evidence of the skill of his opponent so inflamed him, however, that he determined to make short work of it. So, bounding forward with the most deadly intent, he sought to deal his powerful foe one of those adroit and deadly coups which are regarded as a dernier resort by some swordsmen, but the fates were against him, for the next instant he was run clean through the sword arm, and his weapon dropped from his hand. He stood erect, as if waiting the coup de grace from the victor; but instead of receiving the expected death-stroke from the hand of Maurice, his sword was restored to him; and as both of the main bodies of the antagonists had evidently had enough of it, a truce was agreed upon, during which the French commander, in gratitude for the nobility displayed toward him, restored to freedom a colonial officer whom he had taken prisoner a few days previously, placing him in the hands of Maurice, who acknowledged the act in becoming terms.

After this, the dead on both sides were buried, and the wounded cared for so far as circumstances would admit, when all that remained of both parties separated—the Frenchman and his thinned following, winding their way with their Indian allies whither they would. The colonial soldiers, now that the excitement of the single combat was over, withdrew from the scene of carnage to a point where they pitched their tents once more, with a view to rest and refreshment, but determined, from their terribly reduced numbers, to retrace their steps to Boston at once with the intention of recruiting their ranks, for they were now only a mere handful, although in the prisoner that had been restored to liberty, Maurice not only recognized a powerful ally, but an old friend.

In the meantime, affairs at the villa were in a terrible state. Mrs. Ravenswood suffered the most inexpressible torments and forebodings regarding the fate of her beautiful daughter; and as may be presumed, her agony was intensified when hour after hour passed away without the re-appearance of Titmouse. At last she found herself constrained to retire to her chamber, where she lay tossing upon a weary and tear-bedewed pillow until the arrival of the dawn, a little after daylight, with an account of the cause of his delay, and the welcome intelligence that he had received from old Giles, as he passed his house, of the safety of Alice for the time being; but at what particular point, or under what circumstances, the ferryman refused to divulge.

As the day advanced, the fact of Miss Ravenswood having been denounced as a witch, and of a warrant having been granted for her apprehension, became known far and wide, while her sudden disappearance from the house of her friends in town, and her escape from her pursuers, was bruited abroad also. Such news travels apace, and as it reached The Heights before noon, Florence Fitz Raymond, in the direst dismay, prepared to visit the villa and to learn from the lips of Mrs. Ravenswood herself, the particulars of the terrible case.

Just, however, as she was about to summon John Langton, the Fanatic and Huskins made their appearance, together with a number of the men who had been with them at the ferry on the preceding night. No sooner had Sloucher and the witchfinder presented themselves, than the former began with his usual sanctified drawl, to excuse their intrusion to Florence, whose eyes flashed fire, and who, stung to the quick at the idea of the monstrous and unfounded charge preferred by them against Alice, met them in a manner they little expected, and which they were in no position to resent, as her brother was defending the interests of the colonists, and as she herself had sufficient influence to get the scoundrels ducked in the river, although they visited her dwelling under the authority of the law, however she might suffer ultimately for causing them to be treated so unceremoniously. John Layton and all the domestics were soon at her side when they heard her voice in the hall, as she demanded of the Fanatic his right to invade her house unannounced and uninvited; although she was quite well aware of the cause of the visit.

"We appear under the sanction of the law, and as the servants of the Lord," twanged out the Fanatic, "to sieze upon the person of the woman Ravenswood, a vile witch, to whom we believe you have afforded shelter, as that godless ferryman informed us that he had landed her on this side of the river last night."

Now the visit to The Heights had been concocted by Sloucher, so that it might be supposed that neither he nor Huskins had the slightest idea of the place where the poor young fugitive lay concealed, and that any suspicion on that head might be lulled to sleep, so that the visit of Martha to the cave should not be prevented by any surmise that Miss Ravenswood was suspected of being still on the Boston side of the river. The move was adroit enough, but as Florence knew nothing of this feature, of the case, she replied indignantly, and with the utmost scorn to the scoundrel who addressed her,

"You, a servant of the Lord? Say rather an emissary of the foul fiend himself who has filled your heart with lust and with lies! I know why it is that you and your bloodhounds are now on the track of Miss Ravenswood. It is because that, not long since, while seated by the side of my brother on the terrace of her own home, she gave you to understand that your presence was no longer agreeable at the villa. There is more known regarding your nightly prowlings beneath her chamber window than you wot of. John Langton, there, could tell you something that he heard from one who knows of your infamous rhapsodies and your criminal presumption in relation to that young lady. But, remember, the day of your power is drawing to a close. Lady Phipps has already heard that you are whispering witchcraft with regard to her also; and this, sooner or later, seals your doom."

The eyes of the Fanatic seemed to disappear altogether, and his features turned an ashen grey as these words smote his ear, while his ponderous jaw fell as he peered for an instant into the angry face of the speaker. Recovering himself quickly, however, he returned with his usual demoniacal self-possession:

"It is the witch Ravenswood we want, fair lady, and not your ungodly words. So deliver her to us at once, ere we turn your house inside out."

"Yes, yes!" chimed in Huskins, "it is the witch we want, and we must have her or know for what."

"The witch! the witch!" echoed the remainder of the party of intruders, "we must have her or know for what—"

"Go find her where you may, if it's a witch you want!" roared John Langton. "But this much I say, that if Miss Alice Ravenswood was even beneath this roof, you should only take her hence over my dead body! And as for your turning the house inside out, just let me see the first man of you that dare lay a finger upon a single article in it, or even cross the threshold of one of its rooms."

"Well spoken, John Langton," said the servants one and all, together with some of their friends who had already gathered in the hall. "And it is time," they muttered in chorus, "that this witchfinding business was put an end to, and the sooner we begin to do it the better."

At this threat, the two leaders and their creatures began to draw in their horns; while Sloucher, fearing some personal violence might be offered them, commenced to discourse on the necessity of all good Christians aiding the servants of the Lord in ridding the earth of the agents of the Evil One, who were now working their infernal spells throughout the land, "in the shape of beautiful maidens."

"The only infernal spells that are now being wrought in our midst," exclaimed Miss Fitz Raymond, "are wrought by a host of secular scoundrels and clerical monsters, who, steeped in ignorance and superstition, as well as in every infamous lust, have been wallowing in blood and crime for more than one generation; and all, as they allege, under the special sanction of that great disturber of mankind and obstruction to human progress—the Bible. Containing, as it does, a warrant for the commission of almost every sin known to the annals of infamy, and inculcating social views, and morals repulsive to every pure mind, you and your fellow-conspirators avail yourselves of its monstrous precepts and debasing innuendoes as authority for the perpetration of the crimes and for the indulgence of the lust that are born of your own hearts, and that render you dead to every feeling that ennobles humanity. The ghoul of your religion has been wading knee-deep in human gore under the banner of the Cross for nearly seven centuries, and feeding upon the hideous repast of millions of our race that have fallen in the red and revolting highway of the so-called soldiers of Christ. From Calvary to Plymouth Rock, leading by the way of the nations of both hemispheres, your course has been one of blood and rapine; and now you are, in this latter day, but illustrating that you possess, in connection with all your other monstrosities, a cannibalism which sets all human ties at naught, and prays upon even those of your own household."

At the close of this fierce assault, the Fanatic and the witchfinder thought it best to withdraw quietly from the scene of action. So, with muttered threats and imprecations, they turned away and were quickly by the river again, where they entered the boat of the ferryman who had brought them from the opposite shore, and who now, seemingly without any interest in their search for Alice Ravenswood, recrossed the ferry, amused secretly at the ill-humor of Sloucher.

It was far advanced in the afternoon before Florence reached the villa, where she soon learned all that had transpired in relation to Alice. John Langton, who had long been the favored suitor of Martha, was in instant consultation with Robert Miles, who had been endeavoring to sooth his own sweetheart, Emily Graham, poor Alice's maid, who had but just returned from a visit to her friends, and had only heard a moment previously of the flight of her mistress. The two men determined to pay a visit to the ferryman; but as Giles had warned the dwarf that no one from the villa should approach his house during the day, it was resolved to wait until night before they should start for his dwelling.

About eight o'clock, or an hour or two after dark, Martha set out for the cave in pursuance of her resolution to spend the night with Miss Ravenswood, who, as may be presumed, passed a weary and anxious day in her solitary retreat. A short period afterwards, by a strange coincidence, John and Robert left the villa, and the Fanatic and his party started from the witchfinders—the friends of Alice taking the road to the house of the ferryman, and Sloucher and Huskins, together with half a dozen other blood-thirsty wretches, proceeding cautiously, under the guidance of Nat the Moose, in the direction of the cave, the locality of which the Moose had refused to indicate to any one, lest a premature movement on the part of Sloucher or the witchfinder, might destroy his prospects of laying his hands on Martha. To these conflicting elements now abroad in relation to poor Alice, there should be added one more, that of Red Wing, who, with two stalworth Indians of his tribe, had, since nightfall, been moving about the entrance of the ravine that opened on the river, intending to drop down to the ferry about nine or ten o'clock, in hopes of getting some information from his old friend Dick, not only in relation to the intentions of the Government regarding his own people, but with reference to the case of Miss Ravenswood, in which he had become deeply interested.

The Lesson of History.

BY T. A. BLAND.

Certain races of Asiatic origin, notably the Chinese and Hindoos, have maintained an existence on the planet, while race after race of Europeans have arisen, flourished, and disappeared, or sunk into obscurity. China was an old country, thickly populated with a highly civilized people, when Rome was founded; when England had no population but a few naked savages, when America was in possession of the now extinct mound builders.

China is still a populous and wealthy empire, whose inhabitants have all descended by direct line from progenitors who lived in China before the Pyramids of Egypt were built, before the foundations of Babylon were laid, ages and ages before Rome was founded. Why this difference in the ability of races to maintain an existence? History contains a full solution of the problem, and the philosophical student has no difficulty in understanding it.

Useful labor has always been and still is universally respected in China, and the whole people—from the Emperor to the poorest subject, are required by law and custom to maintain habits of industry. Idleness is a sin and disgrace in the eyes of the Chinese.

The history of those nations that have arisen, flourished a while, and disappeared or sunk into contempt, shows that honest toil was held in contempt by all of them.

Food, clothing, shelter, and all of the good things of life are the results of labor, the just reward of the industrious worker; and the God of the universe has declared through the constitution of nature, in the pages of history, and by the mouth of the prophet, that he who will not work shall not eat, and the people that despise labor shall be cut off from the face of the earth, as unworthy and contemptible cumberers of the ground.

It required a period of seven hundred years for Rome to reach the climax of her greatness and the height of her folly and sinfulness. Her decline was by rapid stages, her fall a hopeless one, her degradation complete, her extinction, a matter of time. No nation has ever arisen from obscurity and poverty, to greatness and wealth, so rapidly as the United States of America. But as no people ever had such contempt for, and antipathy to honest labor as the Americans, it requires no prophet's foresight to read the horoscope of this country.

True, from necessity a large proportion of our people are actively at work in various industries, but only from necessity. Almost without exception those who can live on inherited wealth, or by their wits, do so, and those who cannot envy these, and toady to them as though they were a superior order of men. Even the literary or professional man, though ever so talented or cultivated—if poor—ranks below the wealthy idler, in American society. And the man or woman who lives by hard work, on the farm, in the shop, the factory, or the kitchen, is under universal social ban. If the worker is a small but independent farmer, he is but a clodhopper; if a skilled artisan, he is a greasy mechanic. But if he or she is a hired worker, the still more odious term servant is used. These terms express the popular estimate placed upon the most useful classes in this country.

"I think I shall sell my farm and put my money into bank stock," said a young farmer in our hearing recently. "Why do you wish to do that?" said the person addressed. "Well for several reasons. Labor is so high and unreliable, that a man can't make anything farming unless he works like a hired man; and my father left me enough to keep me without work if I invest it properly, and I don't propose to be a clodhopper, or a drudge. I could live like a gentleman on the interest of my money, if I was to sell my farm, and I've made up my mind to do it."

"That suits me exactly," said his wife, who was present. "Why, would you believe it? I can't keep a servant in the country. The American girls are too proud to do kitchen work, and the Irish and Dutch all want to live in the city; so you see its absolutely necessary for us to move to the city."

This man's father worked hard and lived close for fifty years to accumulate this wealth for his son; and this woman's mother was her own servant during her whole life. Labor was respectable when they were young.

But the dry rot of idleness, and the malignant cancer of snobbery, have made a combined attack upon the vitals of society within the last fifty years, and although the symptoms were mild at first, they have recently become so violent as to produce in the minds of all intelligent social science doctors, the gravest apprehensions, and most serious doubts as to the fate of the patient. And the wisest of them are convinced that naught can save us from speedy and complete ruin—social and political—and ultimate annihilation, but an entire change of sentiment, and consequent change of habit, on this subject of labor. The honest worker must be respected, and the idler—he be rich or poor—put under ban. Snobbery must perish, and true democracy come into its lawful inheritance.

Labor is not shunned because it is disagreeable, but because it is not respectable. To be known as a laborer who earns his bread is to be excluded from polite society. Neither intelligence nor culture have much to do with determining one's social status in America; that is settled by his habits. If you live on inherited wealth—no matter how obtained—or if you are sharp enough to dead beat your way in some successful, hence honorable game of fraud, you are an aristocrat of the true American type, but if you through choice or necessity, earn your bread and raiment, you are but a mud-sill, a commoner, a drudge.

This is the reason American boys leave the farms and workshops, and factories, and American girls refuse to do housework, or any other sort of work. Through this monstrous heresy, our cities and villages are being overrun with idlers, our prisons with thieves; the almshouses with paupers; the brothels with girls who believe that a life of the basest sort is more respectable than one of honest industry.

People of America are not these things so, and will you allow this most contemptible, this most vile, this most fatal of all the heresies inherited from our European ancestors, to continue to poison the atmosphere of the republic, paralyze the energies of our people, sap the foundations of our liberties, destroy the usefulness of the rising generation, and annihilate the anglo-saxon race?—The Ladies' Own Magazine for November.

CHURCH quarrels are almost as common as they are disgraceful, but they seldom amount to more in the present age than mere wordy battles. But certain staid churchmen in Lancaster county were belligerent last Sunday week after a more carnal fashion. The circumstances are briefly these: Muddy Creek Church, in that county, was the field, and a dispute about a charter the cause of a pitched battle between a German Lutheran and a Reformed congregation, joint occupants of the church building. A lawsuit to which resort was had not having settled the difficulty, and both parties essaying to take possession of the church, a forcible laying on of hands, likewise of fence palings, etc., made up a very pretty fight, which was not quelled until some county constables intervened with the persuasive argument of revolvers.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL

OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XVIII.

In our Bible article in our issue of Dec. 15, we noticed the Bible account of the dealings of its God with the Egyptians, when he wished them to let "his people" go, and how he brought the plagues of frogs, lice, locusts, killing fish, turning all the water into blood, sending terrible lightning and hail-storms that broke down trees and drove nearly everything to the earth, killing off all the cattle, and finally the first-born of every family in the land. How, upon the inflictions of these various scourges, Pharaoh's heart would relent and he consented to let the Israelites depart, when God immediately hardened [it again, and caused him to prevent their going, thus necessitating more cruelties, devastations and loss of life to bring around the desired result. We saw, also, that the Israelites were authorized by God to dishonestly wrong the Egyptians out of all their valuables, gold, silver, jewels and their best wearing apparel. It may be difficult for many to understand how the kind Father of all—the Supreme Power of the universe—could thus engage in spreading suffering and destruction over a vast country, and incite one portion of his people to swindle and defraud another portion. It is hard to realize or believe that such is the conduct of the good, impartial, benevolent Being men fondly imagine presides over the destinies of his creatures, who is all love and kindness to every human being and to all animate existences, but the Bible tells us so, and we have either to believe it or conclude there is some mistake about it, and that it is simply an imperfect rendition of an old legend.

The narrative states after the Israelites left Egypt the Lord again hardened Pharaoh's heart and caused him to raise his armies and pursue them to the Red Sea. Certain destruction seemed imminent, but Moses stretched out his rod and the waters parted and were piled up like a wall on the right hand and on the left, and the Israelites walked through on dry ground, when the Lord once more hardened Pharaoh's heart and induced him and all his hosts to rush in after them, when the waters closed back upon them and drowned every man and every horse, so that not even one was left. In this way God is said to have "got unto himself great honor."

There are several very difficult things to believe about this story, and if they were narrated anywhere else than in the "word of God," a sensible person could not be found in the world who would believe them. The matter of water being piled up like a wall on either side, leaving a dry roadway for hundreds of thousands of people, horses and cattle, through the mud and sediment that must inevitably lie at the bottom of the sea, was a most singular occurrence. In no other instance was water ever known to act in that manner. It is a fluid so elastic that it always seeks its level at once, and ever moves in unison with the universal law which controls it. If it did comport itself in the manner thus described, the invariable laws of nature were changed, and God may be said to have acted against himself for the sake of showing a special favor to a portion of his offspring, and overwhelming with destruction and death another portion.

Such extravagant statements are however much easier made than sustained by proof. It so happens this remarkable affair is attested to by no historian or writer save the unknown one who wrote the story under consideration. The Egyptians have histories dating back long anterior to the time of Moses and they have no account of one of their great kings and all his hosts being drowned in the Red Sea by this device which the Lord planned for them. If such a thing had ever occurred it is altogether probable their histories and literature would have contained some account of it; whereas not the slightest allusion to it has ever been found.

This story is of the same character as that of the cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night which went before the Israelites in their forty years' tramp through the wilderness; and of the water suddenly flowing out of the dry rock at Horeb when Moses struck it with his rod; also of this vast concourse of 600,000 people being fed for years with manna which descended from heaven like dew, and was about the size of Coriander seed, and when the people tired of this food and loathed it and murmured at their fare, the Lord became very angry and sent his fire among them which burned and consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp. This fire was not stopped until Moses cried out unto the Lord, when he was kind enough to stay his anger and quench his fire.

The grief of the people was so great at the sameness of their diet, that Moses entered a formal complaint to the Lord, and asked him to kill him and thus relieve him of his burden and responsibility in the charge of the people. This seemed to so soften the mind and purposes of the Lord, that he agreed to give the people all the flesh they wanted to eat, not for one, two, five, ten or twenty days, but for a whole month, and until it came out at their nostrils and it became loathsome unto them.

The statement goes on to say a wind went forth from the Lord and brought from the sea (a singular place, by the by, to get quails from,) such a vast quantity of quails that they covered the ground for a day's journey on every side of the camp to the depth of two cubits, or over three feet. This is unmistakably the most extensive quail story the world has ever been favored with, and it illustrates the tendency the Lord exhibited on so many occasions of "overdoing the thing," and when he got angry to go from one extreme to the other. He seemed to act upon the principle of "feast and famine." If this vast supply of quails could have been apportioned to the people as they required them, as the manna was said to have come, the stock provided on this occasion would have lasted them for years.

It is not strange they were able to gather large quantities of these fowls; the story says those who gathered the least, gathered ten homers, equivalent to forty bushels. What prevented them from gathering four hundred bushels or four thousand bushels each, we cannot see, when the birds covered the ground in such profusion. It seems unnecessary they should have been gathered at all, more than they were already.

This quail feast would truly have been a rich treat to the flesh-hungry wanderers who had been so long without animal food; but, unfortunately for them, while the flesh was still between their teeth, and before it was chewed, the Lord's wrath was again kindled against them, and he smote them with a very great plague, and it seems a vast number of them were then slain and buried, for simply craving animal food, and for which reason the place was called Kebroth-hattavah, and whether this means "Pigeon-roost," or "Quail-camp," we are not Hebrew scholar enough to decide.

How much effort it required on the part of the Lord to produce this supply of quails, we are unable to judge, as the narrator does not inform us, but from a human point of view, it must have been a great feat. Anderson, the Scotch Wizard, and Hermann, the great prestidigitateur, frequently produced half a dozen pigeons or so, apparently from a boiling kettle, but that was nothing in comparison to a bed of quails fifty miles in diameter and three or four feet deep, and all blown from the sea. We beg pardon for drawing comparison for a moment between the feats of the Lord and those of Anderson and Hermann, but really it seems a pity to have wasted such a fine lot of quails—to produce them only to putrify and cause a deadly plague. We feel confident neither Anderson nor Hermann would have done this—first raise the hopes of a hungry people, and then after they got the food into their mouths, but before they had time to chew it, to smite them with a deadly plague, even had they the power.

Seriously, these childish tales about the Deity getting angry and doing weak, silly things on so many occasions, are utterly unworthy the Supreme Power of the universe, and it is singular sensible people will continue to give credence to these old stories and do all they can to compel others to believe them. These legends and tales may have answered very well for a barbarous people thousands of years ago, but they are utterly unfitted to the intelligent, scientific mind of the present day. It is an absorbing question among thinking people of our age as to what is the principle of life and motion which is found to exist everywhere in the universe and inherent in every molecule of matter in whatever form. It is a debatable point whether this living principle is outside of matter and superior to it, or whether it is part and parcel of it and inseparable from it. The more intense thought is brought to bear upon this great and almost unknowable question—the better it is understood that the force which exists in the Universe—the principle of all life and motion—the Supreme Power which is denominated Deity, Lord and God, is not confined to our planet, our solar system, or our constellation, but pervades equally the boundless, eternal universe of which our globe forms but an infinitesimal part.

In this elevated view of the ever-present Power, how imperfect, how absurd, how utterly silly appears these ancient Jewish legends and tales about their Jehovah who was so fickle, who so often got angry with his helpless creatures, who busied himself in getting up plagues of frogs, lice, locusts, quails, etc., to tantalize, torment and destroy them. It is certainly high time these puerile notions of Deity gave place to more sensible views; that the vagaries of a barbarous time should be unceremoniously set aside and instead be adopted the teachings of science, the axioms of truth, and the dictates of common sense.

Are We Really Progressing?

In the Marine Court of this city, Judge McAdam presiding, in a suit between Mrs. A. M. Truman vs. Woodhull, Claflin & Co., a few days since, Joseph Treat was prohibited by the Judge, at the instance of C. F. Brooke, attorney for defendants, from giving evidence in the case; not because he was an incredible, untruthful witness, nor because his statement of a fact is not just as correct as another person's, nor because he is not a citizen of the State, or the United States, but because he did not subscribe to such a religious belief as the judge thought he ought to, or that he did not believe in such kind of a God as is prescribed by others.

This ruling in a court of justice (?) seems more fitted to the times of religious intolerance, a few centuries back, or in the Dark Ages, than to this advanced part of the Nineteenth Century, when the teachings of science and increasing knowledge is more and more shaking to the very foundation, the creeds and superstitions of the past; when the teachings of Humboldt, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Mill, Draper and many other scientific minds are being accepted by intelligent men in all parts of the civilized world. Is it still to be the ruling of our courts that, in order to be allowed to bear testimony in an ordinary suit, a person must believe in a Pagan God, a Jewish God, a Christian God or some other God that is a person, having body, parts and passions, and occupying, as such a being must, but a single point in the entire Universe? In short, must he subscribe to any particular set of opinions before he can give evidence in our courts? Are we really advancing with science, reason and intelligence, or are we groping backward toward superstition, proscription and intolerance?

To the questions from the attorney, "are you an Infidel?" "are you an Atheist?" Dr. Treat admitted that he was what is commonly understood by those terms. The Judge then asked, "Have you any religious ideas?" and the reply was, "I am a Scientist, and accept that postulate of science which makes the Universe the only Infinite, Eternal and self-Existent." "You cannot testify," was the immediate decision.

We hope all our judges are not to be McAdams, or so Mac-adamized that a person who honestly believes the inherent powers and forces of the Universe are eternal like the Universe itself, will have equal privileges in court, and elsewhere with those who imagine God to be a person in the form of man, occupying a throne somewhere in the ethereal regions of space, and governed by the passions and incentives of anger, cruelty, vindictiveness and revenge.

Christianity Examined.

NO. IV.

In our last we gave a few extracts from the sacred writings of some of the Asiatic nations which were written hundreds and thousands of years prior to the Christian era and a portion before the time of Moses even, in order to show our readers that in point of morality and purity of the teachings of these ancient, seers, sages, philosophers and reformers were not inferior to the inculcations attributed to Jesus and that the best even of his doctrines were not original with him but had been taught by others hundreds of years before he was born. We will give a few more of these quotations that it may be better seen various nations and religions in the world besides the Jews and Christians have sacred writings and divine instructions by no means inferior to those of the nations named. And we here again make the assertion, that if we had been educated to regard these teachings with the same veneration with which we have been reared to regard the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, they would seem to us as equally inspired, divine, and holy.

ZOROASTER the Persian philosopher and prophet who is held by different authorities to have lived from seven hundred to fourteen hundred years before Christ, taught thus :

"I raise my hands in adoration and worship ; first, all true works of the divine spirit and the intelligence of the good mind, that I may be partaker of this blessedness. To those works and the earth-soul do I offer up my prayer.

"With pious sense will I approach Thee, thou wise and living, with the prayer that thou grant me the earthly and spiritual life. Through truth are these blessings to be attained, which the self-luminous sends to those who strive therefor.

"Long as my strength shall last to worship, so long will I continue in search after truth.

"Thee I conceive as the original first, as the one, supreme, both in nature and in mind, father of the good disposition,—since with clear eye I beheld thee, as the essential substance of truth.

"All good do I accept at thy command, O God, and think, speak and do it. I believe in the pure law. By every good work seek I forgiveness of all sin. I keep pure for myself the serviceable work and abstain from the unprofitable. I keep pure the six powers—thought, speech, work, memory, mind and understanding.

"I repent of all sins, all wicked thoughts, words and works which I have meditated in the world, corporeal, spiritual, earthly and heavenly, I repent of in your presence, ye believers.

"I confess myself a Zarathustrian, an opponent of the Daevas, devoted to the belief in Ahura, [Ormuzd] for praise, adoration and satisfaction.

"I praise the best purity, I hunt away the Dews, I am thankful for the good of the Creator, Ormuzd, with the opposition that comes from Gava-Mainyo. I am contented and agreed in the hope of a resurrection. The Zarathustrian law, created by Ormuzd, I take as a plain act. For the sake of this I repent of all sins.

"That which was the wish of Ormuzd the creator, and I ought to have thought, spoken or done and have not; that which was the work of Ahriman, and I ought not to have thought, spoken or done, and yet have ; of these sins I repent, with thoughts, words and deeds."

HERMES MERCURIUS TRISMEGISTUS a noted king of Egypt, and placed among the Pharaohs before the time of Moses ; in the DIVINE PYMANDER, a work which has been translated into several languages and deemed authentic by eminent writers, wrote as follows :

"That part of the soul which is sensible is mortal, but that which is reasonable is immortal.

"Every essence is immortal. Every essence is unchangeable. Every thing that is, is double.

"None of the things that are, stand still. Not all things are moved by a soul, but every thing that is, is moved by a soul.

"Heaven is the first element. Providence is Divine Order. Necessity is the minister or servant of Providence.

"What is God? The immutable or unalterable good. What is man? An unchangeable evil.

"Holy is God, the Father of all things.

"Holy is God, whose will is performed and accomplished by his own powers.

"Holy art Thou, that by Thy word hath established all things. Holy art Thou of whom all Nature is the image.

"Holy art Thou, whom Nature hath not formed. Holy art Thou, that art better than all praise.

"Accept these reasonable sacrifices from a pure soul, and a heart stretched out unto Thee.

"I believe Thee, and bear witness, and go into the life, and light."

THE PYMANDER contains by another writer the following Song or Psalm :

"Let all the nature of the world entertain the hearing of this hymn. Be open, O Earth, and let the treasure of rain be opened. Ye trees, tremble not, for I will sing and praise the Lord of creation, and the All, the One. Be opened, ye Heavens, ye winds, stand still and let the immortal circle of God receive these words.

"For I will sing and praise Him that created all things, that fixed the earth and hung up the heavens, and commanded the sweet water to come out of the ocean into all the world inhabited, to the use and nourishment of all things, or men.

"That commanded the fire to shine for every action, both to God and man.

"Let us together give him blessing, that rideth upon the heavens, the Creator of all Nature.

"O, all ye powers that are in me, praise the One, the All. Sing together with my will, all ye powers that are in me.

"O holy knowledge, being enlightened by thee, I magnify the Intelligible Light, and rejoice in the joy of the mind.

"This is God, that is better than any name, this is he that is secret; this is he that is most manifest; this is he that is to be seen by the mind; this is he that is visible to the eye; this is he that hath no body; and this is he that hath many bodies, rather there is nothing of any body that is not of him, for he alone is of all things.

"And for this cause he hath all names, because he is the One Father."

ORPHEUS, of ancient Greece, 1,200 years before Christ, thus sublimely taught :

"There is one unknown Being, prior to all things and exalted above all. He is the author of all things, even of the eternal sphere and all below it. He is Life, Counsel and Light, which all signify One Power, the same that drew all things, visible and invisible, out of nothing. We will sing that eternal, wise and all-powerful Love, which reduced chaos to order.

"The Empyrean, the deep Tartarus, the earth, the ocean, the immortal gods and goddesses, all that is, that has been, or that will be, was contained in the fruitful bosom of Jupiter. He is the final and the last, the beginning and the end. He is the Primæval Father, the immortal Virgin, the life, the cause, the energy of all things. Thine is One only Power, One only Lord, One universal King."

PYTHAGORAS, another Grecian philosopher and instructor, thus taught 600 years before Christ :

"There is one Universal Soul diffused through all things—eternal, invisible, unchangeable; in essence like truth, in substance resembling light; not to be represented by any one image, to be comprehensible only by the mind; not as some conjecture, exterior to the world, but in himself entire, pervading the Universal Sphere.

"Unity is the principle of all things, and from this Unity went forth an infinite duality.

"Truth is to be sought with a mind purified from the passions of the body. Having overcome evil things, those shall experience the union of the immortal God with the immortal man.

"Every man ought to speak and act with such integrity that no one would have reason to doubt his simple affirmation.

"Do what you believe is right, whatever people think of you.

"It is either requisite to be silent, or to say something better than silence.

"It is impossible he can be free who is a slave to his passions.

"We should avoid and amputate by every possible artifice, by fire, sword and all various contrivances;—from the body, disease; from the soul, ignorance; from the belly, luxury; from a city, sedition; from a home, discord, and at the same time from all things, immoderation."

Prayer of SOCRATES 500 years before Christ.

"O Beloved Pan, and all ye other Gods of the place, grant one to become beautiful in the inner man, and that whatever outward things I may have, may be at peace with thee within.

"May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such a portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ. Do we need anything else, Phædrus? For myself I have prayed enough."

We could give, would space allow, many quotations from the voluminous writings and teachings of Socrates, Zeno, Plato, Aristotle and others, all of whom lived hundreds of years before Christ and left much behind, of their deep and pure thoughts. These teachings of the ancients perhaps have no direct connection with the subject of Christianity ; but our object in giving them is to show our readers that Jesus, who never wrote anything himself, was not the first to inculcate moral sentiments ; that philosophies as deep, instructions as elevating and morals as pure as his were taught by others, long before he came upon the earth. And we repeat, had we been reared to regard the utterances of these Heathen philosophers and teachers with the same reverence that we have been required to pay to the sayings of Jesus, they doubtless, in our eyes would have seemed equally as profane, equally as wonderful and equally as divine.

In our next we will probably give some extracts from other ancient reformers and teachers, after which we will resume the direct examination of Christianity, with a view of ascertaining its origin, early history, characteristics, its cruelties, persecutions, bloodshed, and its general influence upon mankind.

[NOTE. In our last, in mentioning some of the signs of the Zodiac, we inadvertently named Taurus, where it should be Aries. Our readers will please make the correction. Ed. T. S.]

New Enterprise.

It is with pleasure that we call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of our esteemed friend and co-laborer in the cause of free thought, G. L. Henderson, of the firm of G. L. Henderson & Co., of Le Roy, Minn., who, as our Western readers know, has established a branch office in the city of New York, and who now proposes, in addition to their regular banking business, to open a GENERAL SUPPLY AGENCY, by which the wants of their friends and the public living remote from the business centres may be supplied at greatly reduced rates. This they can do by reason of their large business connection and the great amount of patronage at their disposal.

In this age of corruption and general decay of commercial integrity, it is gratifying to be able to assure our readers that in his case, as in the case of our other advertising patrons, "HERE IS A MAN."

Mr. Henderson will be assisted in this new branch of business by Mr. Hugh Byron Brown, a gentleman well known to our patrons as a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER and to all the radical papers, and whose integrity and reliability are well known to us and to the liberal public. We cheerfully recommend our readers to patronize the new firm.

A Generous Donation.

With due gratitude we acknowledge the donation from Col. Robert G. Ingersoll of THIRTY DOLLARS, much the largest we have received from any source. In connection with five dollars he presented us on another occasion, it establishes the fact of his Liberality.

This present we consider not as personal but as devoted to spreading truth and freethought, and with all humility we are bound to acknowledge we have no trouble in finding legitimate uses in that direction for such material.

We still have the Colonel's Lectures for sale and shall feel renewed pleasure in sending them to such of our friends as have not yet ordered a copy. Price $2.00. Postage 15cts.

Col. Ingersoll recently paid our city a visit with his family. We called at his hotel to see him, but were not fortunate enough to find him in, and consequently did not see him.

WE OWE an apology to many of our correspondents for not more promptly answering their letters many times. We receive so many, and our time is so occupied we are often compelled to let them lie over longer than we would desire.

We again ask the forbearance of contributors for the tardy appearance of their articles. It is impossible to find room for all that come, and we mean to select the best. We have many filed for insertion as soon as possible.

We again ask contributors to study brevity. Short articles are nearly always preferable to long ones, and they afford a larger number a chance to be heard.

B. F. Underwood

Will lecture at Oskaloosa, Iowa, Jan. 9, 10; Buchanan, Mich., Jan. 13, 14; Anderson, Ind., Jan. 15; Indianapolis, Ind., Jan. 17; Brighton, Mich., Jan. 19, 20; Auburn, O., Jan. 22; Elyria, O., Jan. 23, 24; Erie, Pa., Jan. 25, 26.

The Jews and their God.

CHAPTER V.

After some five or six thousand years, with all the aid and assistance that theology claims for him, the Jewish God has so far failed to establish a church, or an organized kingdom on earth; and as for destroying the devil, by insnaring, catching, chaining, or imprisoning him, there is no encouragement, by way of getting rid of so loathsome a creature. He remains an eye-sore to the clergy, and yet their best friend. We will now look after those who perished under the priesthood of the Jewish God. It is not to be wondered at, that John the seer, saw the church organization, by which the priests held their power, and by it thousands were put to death; that it was drunken with human blood, being controlled as it was by the Jewish priesthood, which put to death all who dared to oppose its authority, Jesus not excepted.

The church under the control of Constantine, a tyrant in every sense, whose genius failed him in inventing ways and means to kill, torment and punish heretics, as they were called under that organization, (or witches and wizards by the Jews.) The estimate we have made of the Jews and their God is based, as a foundation, upon their own record, sacred and profane; but we will not vouch for the truth of it in all its fullness and particulars. Nevertheless it is held by many as the unerring word of God. If the Bible account is reliable, we have not misrepresented the Jews or their God; but believing it is not all strictly true, justice demands this qualification. The Jews charged their God with many things he was not guilty of, by saying, "Thus saith the Lord," when the Lord had not said it; yet it is so recorded.

Second, they did many things themselves to gratify their own dispositions; if successful they ascribed it to their God, and it comes down through their records to us, as being sanctioned and dictated by him.

Third, many things arose from superstition, and imagination; yet were recorded as facts. What I say of the Jews on this point, I say of all nations. There is a universal similarity, and there is nothing more wrong in the Hindoos believing Alayone, daughter of Aolus, who drowned herself in grief for her husband, was turned into a kingfisher, (a bird) than for the Jews to believe Lot's wife, for looking back, was turned into a pillar of salt; all from the same cause (ignorance) and equally untrue.

We have now shown the failure of the fourth organization, which was swallowed up by the Church of Rome, "the great whore," seen in a vision by John, a seer and me him, as being the "mother of Harlots," out of which most of the present religious sects have sprung. These four failures prove one of these things. The Jewish God was incompetent to govern man in the capacity of a nation or church. If this is not true, then it proves all these organizations had no higher origin of authority than man, in and out of the earth form. If this is not true, then it proves the Devil, after achieving a victory in the garden of Eden, has kept the field ever since, in spite of all the efforts on the part of God, man and angels. As we have heretofore relied upon the Jewish history, in reference to the Jews and their God, we do the same in looking after those who perished at the hands of, and was put to death by the authority of the Jewish priesthood; and those in power. The Jews in no instance claim or admit they ever put a man to death without just cause; therefore their laws and statutes were so worded there was no trouble to convict and put to death all who violated their laws, under which Jesus, with thousands of others, suffered death. Jesus spoke to those Jews then in authority, who held the priesthood, forming the grand Sanhedrim, who sat on the judgment seat and condemned him to death, he whose motto was to do good, and, he said, "Woe unto you for ye build the sepulchers of the prophets, and your fathers killed them." From the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zacharias which perished between the altar and temple, embracing a period of some four thousand years. Luke xi. 47-51. Who dare say this testimony is false? If true, it speaks louder than the thunder of Sinai; and what does it mean? If true, and we take it as such, it amounts to this. The Jewish priest, and those in authority, had been in the habit of killing, stoning, and putting to death a certain class of people that Jesus called prophets and apostles. We will call them mediums; the Jews called them witches, wizards, blasphemers, necromancers, persons who talked with the spirits of the dead. For all this class, they had a law that all such should be put to death; if the testimony of Paul can be relied on, where he speaks of the treatment and condition of such. Heb. xi. 37-38 "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword, they wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy; they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth." These were considered as violators of those laws, the same as in the days of king Saul. It is evident the woman that is called by our present priests, the Witch of Endor, who was banished by king Saul, and had secreted herself as best she could, was one of these. In this case we will quote from Josephus' history—a well authenticated work, and one that may be relied on. In his 6th book, 14th chapter of the "Antiquities of the Jews;" a much fuller account is given of this woman than in the Bible. "When Saul had heard this, he could not speak for grief, and fell down on the floor, whether it were from the sorrow that arose upon what Samuel had said, or from his emptiness, for he had taken no food the foregoing day nor night, he easily fell quite down, and when with difficulty he had recovered himself, the woman would force him to eat, begging this of him as a favor on account of her concern in that dangerous instance of fortune-telling, which it was not lawful for her to have done, because of the fear she was under of the king, while she knew not who he was, yet did she undertake it, and go through with it, on which account she entreated him, to admit that a table and food might be set before him, that he might recover his strength and so get safe to his own camp. And when he opposed her motion, and entirely rejected it, by reason of his anxiety, she forced him, and at last persuaded him to eat.

"Now she had one calf that she was very fond of, and one that she took a great deal of care of, and fed it herself, for she was a woman that got her living by the labor of her own hands, (I wish this could be said of our clergy,) and had no other possessions but that one calf; this she killed, and made ready its flesh, and set it before his servants and himself, so Saul came to the camp while it was yet night. Now it is but just to recommend the generosity of this woman, because when the king had forbidden her to use that art whence her circumstances were bettered and improved, she did not remember to his disadvantage that he had condemned her sort of learning, and did not refuse him as a stranger, and one, that she had no acquaintance with; but she had compassion upon him, and comforted him, and exhorted him to do what he was greatly averse to, and offered him the only (calf) creature she had as a poor woman, and that earnestly, and with great humility, while she had no requital made to her for her kindness, nor hunted after any future favor from him, for she knew he was to die; whereas men are naturally either ambitious to please those that bestow benefits upon them, or are very ready to serve those from whom they may receive some advantage. It would be well therefore to imitate the example of this woman, and to do kindness to all such as are in want; and to think that nothing is better nor more becoming mankind, than such a general beneficence, nor what will sooner render God favorable, and ready to bestow good things upon us. And so far may suffice to have spoken concerning this woman."

We would ask where does that woman live, in all Christendom, that is worthy of a better character than the one Josephus, the great historian, gives this poor despised woman, stigmatised with the name of, the "witch of Endor," nevertheless as for her moral character she is the person whose life, habits, and disposition, are the nearest and most like Jesus—always ready to do good. How did the life and death of Jesus stand among the Jews? He was in like manner condemned; pronounced and looked upon as an impostor and put to death, by what the priests called the law of the Lord, under which thousands before him lost their lives; of whom he spoke, when he said, "your fathers have killed them." Notwithstanding all this, our present teachers of theology are threatening us with hell and everlasting damnation if we do not acknowledge the Jewish God, declaring Jesus (who was born of a woman, the same as all children are) to be the legitimate son of this personal God, who talked face to face, with Abraham, Jacob, and Moses; when his character, disposition and manner of life, had no more resemblance to the character of Jesus, than a ravenous she-bear, (such as destroyed forty-two children) has to a dove which was the emblem of Jesus' God, the spirit that abode with, and controlled him through life on earth; while these two she-bears, carried out and executed the curse of Elisha, when under the influence or spirit of the God of the Jews when he cursed the children. Who dare deny this, that believes his Bible, and who dare say, these two she-bears did not portray the God-power under which Elisha cursed the children, whose offense was a childish retort, upon a man who had a bald head? Who dare say the dove does not portray the God-power by which Jesus was controlled through life?

There can be no doubt, but that Abraham, Moses and others who acted under authority were influenced by the spirit of a savage king, whose disposition had undergone no change perceivable, by way of reform, who was by times petulant and cross, at other times noble and grand, varying from the sublime to the ridiculous, never above, but often below that of humanity; while the prophets, who Jesus says were killed and put to death, were controlled and influenced by spirits more mild, such as the one he was; and for instance, John the apostle, who was controlled and governed by a God-power that was all love. What a contrast between the God-power that controlled Jesus and John; and the power that dictated these words: "I am a jealous God, and a God of war, I will stir up nations to battle; vengeance is mine and I will repay; I will laugh at your calamity and mock when your fear cometh. I the Lord have deceived that prophet, and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. Also the Lord had put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets." Can it be possible, a man possessed of common sense can sink his ideas of the God of the universe, the fountain of truth and perfection, low enough to meet the demands of those recorded facts, and the teaching of theology? I confess I cannot.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A Lady on the Social Question.

[The following private letter was not written for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but is published at the request of a friend. It is a clear argument in favor of the social theory it advocates, and is deserving of a careful reading.—ED. T. S.]

MANHATTAN, Oct. 28, 1874.

My Dear Friend: Your letter reached me yesterday. I can never be offended at anything you may say to me, especially when the question is prompted by such tender maternal solicitude. Let us discuss all these questions relating to my affairs freely and fully. With any one else I would not deign to lift the veil of my inner life, unless it may be I could aid some poor soul in its struggle for its share of earthly happiness. I should rather say I would not open my life to the gaze of the simply curious, only to those whom my experience might help to better things. I would shrink from the world's gaze, not from shame, only because good causes are so often damaged by injudicious handling by well meaning but misguided people. I would calmly live my life in a dignified way; "commencing," as the poet says, "by my presence." You seem to imply in your letter a fear that I am in the future to be subjected to treachery and desertion. Now just suppose that is to be the case—that in the future, somewhere, I am left alone by this man whom I so dearly love. If this happens it will be because, either some other magnet attracts more strongly, or he will be tired of me. Now bring to bear on this question all your naive wisdom and answer me candidly. Which would be the most comfortable position in such an emergency, the deserted wife or love? I would much prefer to be the deserted love than the coolly treated and neglected wife. Is not the quick stroke of the executioner for kinder and less painful than the horrid agony of the inquisitor, the torturer? The world thinks if a man swears to a paper, he will be obliged to do his duty. He will do this under any circumstances as long as he can. And any woman ought to be thankful to be well rid of a man whose word isn't as good as his bond. Legal marriage is a bondage from which only death frees many a poor, wretched soul. Could any woman of fine feeling allow herself to be dependent on a man who despised her? Or any man hold a woman who despised him? Why, when two people are as happy as we, urge a change—a change, that seldom brings anything but wrangling, deceit, selfishness and tyranny. Look around and tell me, do you find much real happiness in the social married life? Take—your parents for instance, (and they are a fair sample of the world,) are they happy? She watched him as the cat watches the mouse, for even a glance of infidelity. Instead of studying to increase her attractions, she is prematurely old and sour, in this constant struggle to look after him. There is not even the ghost of happiness under that roof. They are what the world calls respectable, nice people. Yes, respectable to everything but their own souls, which, being untrue and hypocritical, poison the springs of life, producing wrangling and bitterness. The fountain of all domestic peace is dried up because of this abject slavery of heart and life. Let me be left alone, driven out into the desert like Hagar, (far from all human life), before ever I am subjected to such a humiliating dose of gall and wormwood. Desertion is heaven compared to it. Do not argue that we are so perfectly suited, so harmonious. Wise navigators don't run any nearer shoals and rocks because the day is clear. The unwary may do this, the sudden and unaccountable storm may dash them to pieces. Good navigators, profiting by the experience of past times, mind the danger signals. Along the shores of life are thickly strewn matrimonial wrecks without number. With such a sight before us who dare venture? There are unaccountable freaks of nature both mental and physical, that two persons can never discover until they have lived together. What has poor humanity done that it must be compelled to suffer a whole mortal life for a mistake? No! no! I am not one of the scheming young ladies of the period trying to entrap some man into providing me a support. I ask only health and the means of earning an independent livelihood. If I ever take this man's name, it will not be through any legal marriage ceremony. In this I am living up to my highest convictions of duty to myself, to him, and to the world. He came to me freely, and poured his love into my life; if he ever desires to go, the door is open, kindly as he came he shall depart. Did you ever see a child forbidden to do a certain thing, or go beyond a stated limit? It at once becomes frantic to do the thing, which under ordinary circumstances it would never have thought of. We are very much like children in the marriage relation. If compelled to a certain line of conduct it becomes irksome, whereas if spontaneously done we should never think of any other way. But, I need not argue nor do I desire to apologize. All the arguments of reason and common sense are in favor of freedom. I am to-day a happier and more self-respecting woman than ever before.

Marriage—the true one—is founded on love, and not dependent on man-made ceremonies for its truth, faithfulness and continuity. I love this man so well, that nothing but his perfect happiness will satisfy me, and if that can come only through the ministrations of some other woman, then in the words of Emerson, and with a heart overflowing with tender love, I say, "go, sweet heaven." Do you never feel when you are looking at some glorious sunset, fine work of art, or listening to some poem or gem of thought, O, if all my friends could share this! So do I feel as, day by day, some new beauty of —'s character is unfolded to me, if everybody could feel the joy of this gentle, tender, glorious love. If it ever goes from me it will go in the same noble, open-handed way that it came, for it could do no injustice.

How much talent has been lost to the world in domestic slavery! Souls from a mistaken idea clinging to each other, though each moment brings only agony. The life narrowed, the powers which in other channels might flow out to bless and gladden some other life, now, only "cabined, cribbed, confined," from a false idea fatal to all the good they might do in the world. Too often it is only selfishness that binds two, in those too weak to have idea or principle. Whittier says:

"O doom beyond the saddest guess,
As the long years of God unroll,
To make thy dreary selfishness
The prison of a soul."

I cannot resist the temptation to tell you a little anecdote apropos to this subject, which as a facetious friend remarked who imparted it to me, "contains the whole thing in a nutshell." And unhappy husband and wife quarreling. The wife says, "see how peaceably the cat and dog lie on the rug." "Yes," said the man, "but tie them together and see how like h—l the fur will fly."

I must live in the truth as I see it. Speak of me with the same confidence and joy as ever, and remember our marriage, when it comes, will be the purest under heaven, because "God will have joined us." And now one word from the outside world. We went last Sunday to hear Mr. Frothingham. Shall I tell you my impression of the whole service? Well, then, in the words of Burns, I found there, "devotion's every grace except the heart." I came away with a sense of coldness. My heart had not been warmed to any new love of humanity, nor had my intellect been quickened and fed by those scientific truths poured out so freely now to supplant old errors of superstition and bigotry. I came away in a very negative condition. Good, red-hot Methodism, where heart, soul and fists are in earnest operation, is far preferable to this cold-blooded, meaningless talk, which is neither good science nor good religion, but just pulpit buncombe which tickled amazingly a few shallow-headed, fashionable women.

But I must draw this letter to a close, though I could fill another sheet, with telling you of our several glorious trips to the Park lately, and how it glows in an unusually fine dress of Fall splendor. And then I should like to tell you what glorious times we have with our books. Think of me always as contented and perfectly satisfied with my present bliss. If change and sorrow come, so let it. Shadow and sunshine are ever mingled. Shadow has its divine use as well as sunshine. Ever with dearest love,

Yours, H.

Voltaire.

Among the recent contributions to our Liberal literature, there is none more worthy of a careful perusal than that of Voltaire by John Morley. He places the great Iconoclast in the very front rank of those who have bravely battled with sacred creeds and time-honored superstitions.

His opening sentence is grandly prophetic, for he says: "When the right sense of historical proportion is more fully developed in men's minds, the name of Voltaire will stand for as much as the names of the great decisive movements in the European advance, like the revival of learning or the reformation."

We who are living in this present day, are apt to underestimate the great work that was so ably done by this glorious Reformer. Our author tells us that: "The existence, character and career of this extraordinary man, constituted in themselves a new and prodigious era. The peculiarities of his individual genius changed the mind and spiritual conformation of the West, with as far spreading and invincible an effect as if the work had been wholly done, as it was actually aided by the sweep of deep lying collective forces."

To be able even slightly to comprehend the great work accomplished by those great Reformers, Calvin, Luther, Spinoza, Voltaire, we must endeavor to realize the condition of the greater part of Europe at the commencement of the fifteenth century. What had Christianity given us as the result of fifteen hundred years of her work? Did she not have a fair trial? Neither let nor hindrance; none to make her afraid. SHE HAD DONE HER BEST. And what that best was, the iron pen of the historian has indelibly written.

Every leaf we find paged with blood, every volume filled with records so black, cruelty so fearful, statistics telling of millions slaughtered to the great Jugernaut of their faith. For fifteen hundred years this black cloud of superstition covered all Europe, and the fairest portions of our earth was turned into a Pandemonium—a Hell. It was the days of the Inquisition, when the morning and the evening sacrifice was not pascal lambs, for the fiend they worshiped as God, now demanded human victims.

"And blood-red rainbows canopied the land."

Yet, he whom they claim to be the founder, was ushered into this world with the words, "Peace on earth, good will to man." But the Church gave for peace, war and all its horrors, and for good will, the fires of persecution and the tortures of the Inquisition.

I differ somewhat from my friend, Mr. Henderson, for he says "that Voltaire wrote in such a manner that if tried for heresy, he could, like Queen Elizabeth or Cervantes, make it impossible to find any in his writings." He also says, he was a "consummate Jesuit." I do not; never have thought so. I never thought that Voltaire spoke with feeble voice or faltering tongue. "Is it with trembling lips that he puts these questions: Is the bible historically true, and divinely inspired? and is your Christian church a holy and beneficent organization?" Did he answer those questions with Jesuitical casuistry, and so leave you in doubt as to his meaning? No, sir! for he answered those questions without the possibility of a misconception; for he says: "The records were saturated with fable and absurdity; the doctrines imperfect at its very best, and a dark and tyrannical superstition at its very worst, and the Church the arch-curse and infamy!" If Voltaire was a Jesuit, how could he merit this glowing encomium which this essayist passes on him?

"Our lofty new ideas of rational conviction, and of emancipation of understanding, as emancipation from the duty of settling, whether important propositions are true or false, had not dawned on Voltaire. He had just as little part or lot in the complaisant spirit of the man of the world, who, from the depths of his mediocrity and ease, presumes to promulgate the law of progress, and as dictator to fix its speed. Who does not know the temper of the man of the world, that worst enemy of the world? His inexhaustible patience of abuses, that only torment others; his apologetic word of beliefs, that may perhaps not be as precisely true as one might wish; and institutions that are not altogether as useful as some might think possible; his cordiality toward progress and improvement in a general way, and his coldness or apathy to each progressive proposal in particular his pigmy hope that life will one day become somewhat better, but still it might be infinitely worse."

To Voltaire far different was it from this; to him a degrading superstition was not to be treated with light indifference. Cruelty, wrong and injustice were with him something to overcome at every hazard.

Our author says "that the rays from Voltaire's burning and shining spirit no sooner struck upon the genius of the time, seated dark and dank like the black stone of Memnon's statue, than the clang of the breaking cord, was heard through Europe, and men awoke in new day and more spacious air." Voltaire a Jesuit! why, man, he was in the front rank and in the very midst of the fight. Our author calls him the "dogmatic destroyer," and that he carried a banner many times rent, but never out of the field."

So much for the Jesuitism of the man that Morley calls "the very eye of modern illumination." Ah! but say you, when he came to grapple with death, what then? Did he not seek the saving power of the Church? Was he not agonized at the bare possibility of Christianity being true? After a long and patient search, I have not been able to find the least evidence in support of this assertion. They are like Sir John Falstaff's eleven men in Buckram existing only in their own fertile imagination.

Let us present this case as we are able to gather it up from the records. We find that Voltaire, now nearly eighty years of age, was greatly excited by the monstrous proceedings against La Barre, who was condemned by the tribunal of Amiens, at the instance of the bishop, to have his tongue and right hand cut off, and then be burnt alive, a sentence that was commuted by the Parliament of Paris to decapitation, and the ease which in this, and numerous other cases, the tribunal lent itself to the cruelty of fanatics, no doubt excited in the mind of Voltaire a very painful alarm for his own safety, and most certainly he had good reasons for it. We know he could not—dared not—venture into Italy, for the Inquisition would have thrown its great antagonist into its secret dungeons.

Who is there to-day that does not sympathize with this old man of eighty, and make every allowance for an occasional fit of timorousness?

We are told that in 1768 he makes a nominal peace with the Church by confessing and participating in the solemnity of an Eastern communion. This he did do, and the philosophers of Paris were deeply scandalized, and D'Alembert, his own familiar friend, could not refrain from protest; and Voltaire, in his reply, was honest enough to give what was no doubt the true reason, that he did not wish to be burnt alive, and that the only way to make certain against such a fate was to close the lips of spies and informers.

But the Bishop sees the ruse for he is very angry with the priest of Fernay, and he writes to him, forbidding him to confess Voltaire or administer the eucharist to him. Voltaire is at once taken with a fever, and he summons the priest to administer ghostly comfort. The priest pleads the rumors of the world as to the damnable character of the books he had written. Voltaire warns him, in the most peremptory manner, that in refusing to administer the viaticum he was infringing the law, and the consequence was the priest did administer the viaticum.

Condorcet remarks on this tomfoolery, (for such I consider it), "that the satisfaction of forcing his priest to administer by fear of the secular judges, and insulting the bishop in a judicial manner, cannot excuse such a proceeding in the eyes of the free and firm man." It would be taxing our credulity too much to suppose for one moment that any one in that day saw in this conduct of Voltaire's anything approaching to a recantation. No wonder the bishop was mad, for Voltaire in his confession actually pardons the bishop, for we read that he signed a solemn act in the presence of a notary, declaring that he (Voltaire), pardons and forgives his calumniators, and that he finally forgave the bishop of Annecy, who had calumniated him to the king, and whose malicious designs, had come to naught. My Christian friends, your cause must be weak indeed, if you need the support of this confession of Voltaire's. I have no need to speak of his return to Paris in 1778 after an absence of nearly thirty years—for that is one of the historic events of the century. It was the last great popular burst of enthusiasm under the old regime: that reception has been described over and over again, no one ever received a more splendid greeting: but the agitation of so much loud triumph, and incessant acclamation, was more than his feeble health could resist. The immediate cause of his death was thought to arise from the administration of an overdose of laudanum. He died on the 30th of May, 1778.

"Stick a pin here please," as Capt. Cuttle would say. Voltaire's death in Paris is just ten years after his celebrated recantation. We hear nothing now of ghostly comfort, or priestly blessings, but his last writing was a line of rejoicing to young Lally that their efforts had been successful in procuring justice for the memory of one who had been put to death unjustly. And now if I have been able to brush away some of the cobwebs which the spiders of malice and superstition have woven over the fair fame of Voltaire. I am more than content, and will conclude with the words of the poet Shelley:

"That tho' the grave hath quenched that eye,
And death's relentless frost withered that arm;
But the unfading fame, the deathless memory of that man
Whom kings call to their mind and tremble, Shall never pass away."

WM. WILLICOTT.

Brooklyn, Jan. 5, 1875.

A NEW MOTIVE POWER.—A new, cheap and powerful motive power is said to have been discovered by John M. Keeley of Philadelphia. Little is known about it, as the invention is jealously guarded, and the secret known to only a few persons. Mr. Keeley claims that with two gallons of water he can generate force enough to draw a train of cars from Philadelphia to San Francisco and back again. He uses no fuel, neither does he employ any chemicals, or electricity, or magnetic currents. It is supposed the force must be obtained by the rapid decomposition of water into its constituent gases, but he denies using any of the customary methods for reaching that result. In the machine he is now constructing he has developed, he asserts, a pressure of 7000 lbs. to the square inch, and when it is remembered that the pressure to which steam boilers are subjected is seldom more than 200 lbs. to the square inch, the enormous leap Mr. Keeley claims to make with his new motor may be partially appreciated. The public will have to wait for the practical application of this power before they can decide upon its merits. As a rule things that threaten to revolutionize the world seldom do.

RAISING ALMONDS IN CALIFORNIA.—Mr. Olmsted of Carpenteria has finished picking his crop of almonds. He will have from his orchard this season over five tons of the Languedoc or soft-shell almonds. Mr. Olmsted's orchard is only four years old, and, of course, is not yet in full bearing. His trees bore a few nuts when two years old. The third year the average yield to the tree was about five pounds. Two rows in the orchard, covering ground equivalent to two acres, that received great care in planting and special culture, produced two thousand pounds of dried almonds. This yield, at the wholesale San Francisco market price for the soft-shell almonds, will give Mr. Olmsted about $230 per acre, after paying expenses of the year's culture, gathering, sacking and marketing. Mr. Olmsted keeps the ground clear, cultivating nothing between the trees, nor allowing weeds to grow up to rob them. The trees should be at least twenty feet apart each way.

"PRETTY bad under foot to-day," said one citizen to another, as they met in the street. "Yes, but its fine overhead," responded the other. "True enough," said the first; "but then very few are going that way."

More Offers.

In addition to the liberal offers made in our last and to encourage the patronage of THE TRUTH SEEKER we hold out the following inducements:

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and one set of Rogers' Best silver Plated Teaspoons which sell everywhere for three dollars, for $3.00.

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and one set of Roger's Silver Plated Table Spoons which retail for four dollars for $3.75.

We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and Calkin's Champion Washer which retails at $7.50 for $5.75.

The plated ware is from Rogers, Smith & Co., is double plated on alabatta. Every package is stamped and warranted by the manufacturers. Our friends can rely upon getting first-class goods every time.

The Champion Washer is an excellent machine, it has taken several premiums and over 60,000 of them have been sold within two years.

We will furnish The Ladies' Own Magazine, one year, a fine mounted oil chromo in sixteen colors, THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a set of best silver plated teaspoons all for $4.00.

It is not necessary that all should go to one address. The paper may go to one and the premiums to another, if desired.

Here is a fine opportunity for those who wish to take THE TRUTH SEEKER and be paid for doing so.

THE supply of some of the books we offer as premiums and which comes from London are exhausted. Our patrons will please wait patiently, we will forward as soon as received.

PHILOSOPHIC REVIEW; Darwin Answered, or Evolution a Myth, a volume of 85 pages, by LAWRENCE S. BENSON, author of "My Visit to the Sun." We have not found time to give this work a close examination, but we see the author opposes the theory of Darwin and Spencer. He is a deep thinker and a finished writer. His work will be found interesting to many. Price, $1.25.

UGHT CHRISTIANS TO DEBATE?—A lecture delivered by W. F. JAMIESON at Parker Fraternity Hall, Boston, Oct. 11th, 1874. Published in pamphlet form. It is a very sparkling, racy lecture in the author's best style. He hits the Church and the clergy some hard knocks, and decides the question in the affirmative. Price, 10 cents, and worth double the money.

"AROUND THE WORLD." We have just received a fine octavo volume by this title, by our friend, J. M. Peebles, and published by Colby & Rich, Boston. It is written in Mr. Peebles' usual interesting, racy style and contains full descriptions of his journey around the world, of the principal scenes he witnessed, and the interviews he had with prominent men in China, India, Polynesia, Arabia, Egypt, Syria, and other countries, with clear accounts of their religious beliefs and traditions, as well as the geographical, political and intellectual condition of the various countries he visited. He is a man of close observation and quick thought, and possesses a happy faculty of stating what he sees and hears in a most interesting and fascinating manner. There is a vast fund of useful information in this volume, and few books are more instructive and entertaining. Price of the volume, $2. We shall be glad to send it to such of our readers as may wish it.

Volume I.

We will furnish the First Volume entire, of THE TRUTH SEEKER bound in paper covers, postage paid, for $1.00.

The same minus one number	75 cts.
" " " two "	60 cts.
" " " three "	50 cts.
" " " four "	40 cts.
" " " five "	30 cts.

Single copies, of back numbers of Volume I, such as we have on hand, 3 cents each. Those who wish THE TRUTH SEEKER from the beginning and to have it convenient for reference and perusal will do well to avail themselves of this opportunity.

Conversation about Society and Churches.

BY G. L. HENDERSON.

(Continued from Number Eight.)

FATHER.—Suppose, then, I affirm as a self-evident truth, that every organ appearing in any plant or animal must, of necessity, be serviceable to it.

DAUGHTER.—Analogy again; I am afraid of them. We were talking about religion and the church, and here you confront me with plants and animals. But let me try your self-evident proposition. Some men have been born with an extra pair of fingers on each hand, and we fail to see what use they were to them, and occasionally a child has appeared with one head too many, and has died in consequence. Where then is your self-evident truth?

F.—Now I see, you are to admit nothing, not even propositions heretofore recognized as self-evident; not even if stated on the authority of recognized philosophy and religion. I must present such a case to your consciousness, that it shall have its basis therein, and not rest upon any authority, however ancient or imposing it may be. In this you are right, and I could wish that this intellectual condition prevailed over all the world. If it did, the worth of an opinion or doctrine would be valued in proportion to its reasonableness. But now, with many, the opposite idea prevails, for the value of an opinion or doctrine is too often estimated in proportion to its improbability and inconsistency with the ever recurring order of nature. I now find that my proposition does not contain the whole truth, and I find that language is often inadequate to express what we really wish to convey; nay, more, I think there is something in our consciousness that cannot be expressed in words, for when so expressed, there is either too much or too little, therefore absolute truth exists in the mind only, and whenever what exists in the consciousness is formulated in words, it is not altogether truth. I will restate my proposition, but you will bear in mind what I have just stated, that from the imperfection of human language, it will still contain either more or less than the truth. There is in nature the power to produce an infinite variety of plants and animals, each individual being slightly different from the other. Regular and continuous uniformity is from time to time changed by the appearance of new organs, as in the cases to which you refer, but if when the individual in whom the supernumerary organs appear, comes to struggle for existence against those possessed of the normal number of organs, and it is found not to be an advantage to it, either the individuals or the organs, or altogether disappear, so that nature (by what Darwin calls natural selection), preserves all her plants and animals which are the best adapted to the condition in which they are to continue to live, and if the new organ proves an advantage to its possessor then the old or normal type will become the abnormal, and must disappear.

D.—Now I remember, you once told me of a tribe of fishermen on the Mediterranean Sea, who laid their nets at a great depth to catch a particular variety of fish, and it became necessary for them to dive down and grasp their nets between the toes of their feet, and use their hands in swimming to the surface, and that, in the course of generations, individuals appeared who could grasp the nets firmly with their feet, as we grasp objects in our hands, so that the fishermen who attained this power most fully became the wealthiest, and the finest women desired them for their husbands. This preference on the part of the women resulted in thus reproducing this advantageous peculiarity in their offspring, and thereby giving them an immense advantage over those who differed less from the old normal type. So that in course of time, a foot would differentiate so far as to perform the duplex function of both walking and grasping. This explains the law of the survival of the fittest. Now let me see how you are to apply this law of nature to the necessity of a church and its continued existence as an organ of society.

F.—You stated clearly not only the law itself (but also) one of the many instances from which the law is deduced. To cover the naked feet, man has found it necessary to strip animals of their skins and make them into shoes. Hence shoemakers and shoe-factories. To cover the naked body, it became necessary to shear the sheep and cultivate cotton, hence wool and cotton spinners and factories for making garments. His body was liable to disease from exposure, excess or insufficient supply of food, improper in kind or quality. Hence surgeons, physicians and cures, with their surgeries, hospitals and asylums. His mind was subject to passions, sentiments and feelings, all of which were liable to misdirection through ignorance, either from inactivity or excess, resulting in sorrow, repentance and remorse, hence the priest, the teacher, the philosopher, with their churches, schools and laboratories. You may object to their value. You cannot deny their existence. The shoemaker, as among the Chinese, and even in America, may cripple the feet by making small shoes, rendering it almost impossible for men and women to walk. The tailor and the staymaker may crush the life out by narrow clothes or tight lacing. The physician may administer poison and aggravate instead of eradicate disease. The surgeon may set a bone wrong side to; the nurse may drive the patient mad instead of soothing to rest. The priest may stand between you and the light of heaven, drive you from sorrow to despair, urge you from repentance to torture, enforce restitution in the idea of utter and everlasting self-relinquishment in the gloom of eternal torture—a night without, followed by no rising sun. But there are good shoemakers who make comfortable shoes, protecting the feet from bruises and the bite of poisonous reptiles.

There are good weavers who have not spun in vain. There have been good tailors and dressmakers who have made comfortable garments, neither so tight as to dwarf the body, nor so loose as to hinder movement, protecting the body from the scorching sun, the biting wind and the venomous insect. Good physicians and surgeons have allayed fever, arrested delirium, found antidotes for poison, restored the sight, patched up broken bones, amputated limbs, which, if left, would have hurried the whole body to the grave. There have been good priests, too, who have aided man to subordinate passion to sentiment, and sentiment to reason; who, when death has seized his kin, and he is swallowed up in the passion of grief, has in turn lost his passion in compassion, forgetting his own grief while helping to diminish the sorrow of others.

Who has converted the vain passion of remorse into the nobler restoration, justice? Who have taught that he who lightens another's load, becomes stronger to carry his own; that he who loves most, is most beloved; that he who lights another's torch from his, adds to the volume of his own; that he who has done another a wrong, cannot, by increased kindness, change the previous fact, even if that wrong could be weighed in a balance, and the agony resulting therefrom could be expressed in terms of hundred weights and pounds. The infliction of an equivalent weight of agony on the guilty one, or on one million of innocent ones, or on angels, or on Gods, could not diminish by one fraction of a scruple the result of the first offense, if it could, then it would be conceivable that when one used a pound of lead to find an equivalent pound of some other substance, the first pound would have ceased to exist. Since mere subdivision of matter into equal parts, as in a pair of scales (the scales itself the emblem of justice), cannot diminish by the fraction of a scruple the integrity of the parts left, by adding an innumerable number of equal parts to the part taken. Neither is it conceivable that the suffering inflicted by one person on another, can be alleviated in the smallest degree by any suffering inflicted on any other being, either in the past, present or the future.

D.—I do recognize the existence of industrial and professional men. But your closing remark is really an admission of the weakness and worthlessness of a class who you still insist ought to continue in some form or other, as important and beneficent servants of man, or as important organs of the social body, whose function cannot be dispensed with.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Scientific Department.

On the Perception of the Invisible.

BY G. F. BODWELL.

With our organ of observation we might now visit those profound depths of the ocean, of which the Challenger is telling us so much; we might swim through a di-electric-subject to electrostatic induction; we might inhabit a Geissler's tube, or bury ourselves in a slice of tourmaline, about the time when a high-priest of Nature cries Fiat experimentum in the matter of polarized light. Let us rather visit with the oculus those obscure regions in which perception itself originates. Let us float with a sound wave in to the ear, and with an ether-wave enter the portals of the brain itself.

Behold, then, the oculus with the dim porches of the ear, tapping upon the tympanum, through which it passes and entangles itself among those complicated little bones which anatomists call malleus, the incus, and the stapes. The tympanum is quivering, and the little bones appear to accept its motion, and to transmit it. As the oculus passes on it sees beneath it what appears to be a deep, narrow well—the Eustachian tube; then it looks through the fenestra rotunda, and floats through the fenestra ovalis into the perilymph, a clear liquid mass agitated by waves; then it nearly loses itself in the labyrinth and cochlear, a sort of place like the maze at Hampton Court; escaping from this it swims through the endolymph; and finally comes in sight of the cortian fibres, scala media, and the ends of the auditory nerves. The oculus fails not to see how each particular fibre vibrates to one particular tone or semitone, and it hears the transmitted vibrations around it; as, standing in the belfry at Bruges, the dreaming listener hears about him, now one bell, now another, bursting into song, and at last a great symphony poured from fifty throats of bronze.

The oculus now returns to the outer world, and makes friends with an atom of luminiferous ether which is about to enter the eye. But before they can join company the oculus has to shrink to a smaller size than ever before. It has now to enter very microscopic channels, to which a particle the size of a grain of sand would be as a cricket-ball to the channel of a small straw. We next find it with the ether-wave dashing upon the outer surface of the eye. It enters the organism by a gate of horn, the cornea, and enters the brain itself by a gate of ivory, the optic foramen. We are a little reminded of Virgil's idea of the two gates:—

"Sunt geminae somni portae, quarum altera fertur Cornea, Alter a, candenti perfecta nitens elephanto."

Having passed the aqueous humor, the oculus perceives an increase of resistance as it encounters the lens, and on emerging enters a vaulted chamber filled with a substance as clear as crystal. Impulses are speeding through this with extreme velocity, and delivering their messages to the brain.

Of all the wonderful things that the oculus saw in that crystal chamber, with black walls, and a window, not yet darkened, which looked upon the external world, it would take us too long to tell. It saw the varied images reflected upon the walls, of things distant, and things near; it saw too the movements of the ciliary muscles which cause the front surface of the lens to change its curvature, and much more. It could have lingered there longer, but its guide, the ether-wave, hurried it on, till it reached the far end of the chamber, and saw the commencement of the optic nerve. The particles of the nerves were seen to be rapidly vibrating under the influence of the ether-waves, and to be finally yielding up the motion to the particles of the brain. The oculus floats between the nerve fibres into the brain itself. But there it sees no more. In vain it endeavors to comprehend how the delicate impulses of the ether become transmuted into the sensation of light; how the images of the external world are recognized by the centre of perception.

Although now within the most private chambers of the great domed palace, the oculus can understand but little of its inner life. It is reminded somewhat of a central telegraph office, where messages are perpetually being received, and as perpetually being sent; where sometimes a message is retained, carefully copied, and stored away in a safe; where again a message, as soon as received, is sent off by another line of wires; where sometimes the messages originate in the office itself, while at other times clerks rush in breathlessly with messages for instant despatch. The most distant nerves conveyed messages and received back answers, whereupon bodily motions resulted. Thus the will said, "I want to move the arm," and the necessary directions having been given, the arm moved. Or the stomach said, "I am hungry; there is food in the jaws, let them commence operations," and forthwith the jaws began to masticate, and all the auxiliary apparatus of deglutition was simultaneously set in motion. Or the mind said, "I send you these important facts; copy them carefully, and store them away in a chamber, until I want them." But some of these chambers appeared to have very defective locks, and sometimes broken doors.

Thus it was that messages continued to be received and transmitted by the brain. It was apparently a kind of head-quarters, to which every action was referred before being executed. No nerve or muscle ventured to act upon its own account without first obtaining leave from head-quarters, which leave, once given, was responded to by the whole mental and bodily system. The heart and the respiratory apparatus were frequent in their demands, and had a vast number of separate telegraph wires for their special use and behoof. Soon the will said, "I want to read aloud," and the brain at once commenced to receive communications, and to issue the necessary instructions. There were the muscles of the arm to be directed, in order that the book might be held at a proper distance from the eyes; and the muscles which cause the eyes to move horizontally from the beginning to the end of the line, and vertically from the top to the bottom of a page; and the vibrations of the particles of the optic nerve conveying the impression of the letters to be received, and then communicated, to the muscles of the larynx, and the muscles of the tongue, and the muscles of the lips, and the respiratory muscles, and their varied auxiliary apparatus: all these concurrent causes combined to one end, and thus the words seen by the eye came to be spoken by the mouth, and the organism performed the act of reading aloud. Now the passage which was read was this: "It was likewise certain that, when we approve of any reason which we do not apprehend, we are either deceived, or, if we stumble upon the truth, it is only by chance, and thus we can never possess the assurance that we are not in error. I confess it seldom happens that we judge of a thing when we have observed we do not apprehend it, because it is a dictate of the natural light, never to judge of what we do not know. But we most frequently err in this, that we presume upon a past knowledge of much to which we give our assent, as to something treasured up in the memory, and perfectly known to us; whereas, in truth, we have no such knowledge."*

Then the reading ceased, and the will somewhat peremptorily asked the brain the precise meaning of the passage. Whereupon the molecules of the brain—notably the corpuscles of the gray matter—became strangely agitated; they moved with wonderful motions in wonderful planes; they described in their motions spaces of four dimensions; they moved in vortices which rolled over each other; in a word, the whole organ was in a state of intense molecular activity. Was this Thought? At all events the will received no answer to its question, and having requested the brain to cudgel itself no more, the subject was dropped and the reading continued. The oculus was endeavoring to thread its way through the countless corridors and chambers which surrounded it, when it came upon a small cell, out of which came the Genius of the place, who conducted it safely to the frontier.

Our typical man, who says "I will believe it when I see it," has after all a good deal of reason on his side, for we cannot speak with any certainty of invisible things; we can only say what we believe them to be, or what they may be. It is thus that we must regard the revelations of the oculus.—Macmillan's Magazine.

Agassiz.

The grave has closed over the mortal remains of Louis Agassiz. Relieved from the self-imposed labors of a long and studious life, the man whose simple eloquence held us enthralled in the lecture-room, whose genius bound us as with a spell, while from the rich treasures of his mind he explained the secrets of that nature which his penetrative intellect had been so long engaged in exploring, like a morning cloud has melted into the infinite azure of the past. His name remains to us, and those works, the emanation of his genius and the fruit of his untiring industry which will give that name immortality. This celebrated naturalist was born May 28th, 1807, in the village of Mortier, Switzerland, canton of the Pays de Vaud, which lies north of the lake of Geneva, bordering on France, and has Lausanne for its capital. This canton is one of the largest and most populous of the confederacy, and the one in which the advantages of education are most generally enjoyed. The population of about 180,000 are almost all Protestants. His death and obsequies at Boston are too recent to have faded from the memory.

Toilers for self might take the fame
Waiting to crown their toilings so;
Careless of ease, or wealth, or name,
All that HE asked was leave to know.

Two great objects seemed to inspire Agassiz in life, and both illustrate the deep attachment he has formed for the country of his adoption—the collection of a museum that would be worthy of this great country, and the foundation of a school in which future generations might avail themselves of the specimens thus collected to open new channels of thought and knowledge. He was successful in laying the foundations of the first and inaugurating the second.

The position of Agassiz, and his connection with a New England college, was one which rendered it inexpedient as it would have been distasteful to him to have involved himself in theological controversies, and he probably never met any one indelicate enough to catechise him as to his religious belief or conceptions of the Deity, yet orthodox Christians would derive little comfort from searching his record. Older than the leading scientists of the day, like Faraday, he did not fall into the line with the most advanced thinkers on all subjects, but that he did not believe in Adam may be plainly seen from the following observation on the Unity of the race. "That the different types of the human family have an independent origin one from another, and are not descended from common ancestors, I still maintain. And this idea I do not apply to Negroes only, but to the Indians, the Chinese, the Hindoos, etc., as well. In fact, I believe that men were created in nations not in individuals."

In his address before the California Academy of Sciences, he says it will not do for the coming generations to say "I will accept this or that doctrine," because knowledge is presiding at your halls, and will say to you, "You must know it, and unless you are willing to learn it you may grope in ignorance and be the tool of a designing priesthood. That is the condition which stares us in the face for the future, and it becomes on that account the duty of every man to foster knowledge and to prepare the coming generation with all those appliances which lead to an independent opinion on these matters.

The most ardent evolutionist could desire no heartier indorsement of the importance of his theory than that accorded to it by Prof. Agassiz. The great naturalist never allowed an opportunity to slip of proclaiming his abhorrence of the whole scheme, and denounced the transmutation theory as a "mire of mere assertions." In this, his irritation at what he conceived to be a great scientific heresy, may have betrayed him into injustice to his contemporaries. All the leading German naturalists without exception, and very many of the English, ought not to be lightly charged with endeavoring to drag unsophisticated youth into a mire of mere assertions.

A great many worthy but narrow-minded people who are disposed to sneer at the development theory, have been in the habit of holding up Agassiz as an acknowledged authority who held opposite views. They probably do not know that Agassiz had been devoting the greater part of his spare time in what he hoped to be the crowning effort of his life, viz.: the overthrow of what is popularly known as the Darwinian theory, and that it was his complete inability and failure to do this, and the consequent chagrin and depression that so wrought upon him, in connection with hard work, that it broke down his physical powers and indirectly caused his death. There is now no leader of science in the civilized world who does not accept these theories and the consequent deductions from them. How extraordinary, then, is the real spectacle of theologians quarreling among themselves about the petty forms and ceremonies of religious belief, when the very ground they stand upon has been washed away by the flood of science and fact that has overwhelmed them in the last decade. How much better would it be for the clergy, who are now years behind their congregations, to accept the situation, take the lead, and instead of attempting to stifle knowledge to promote its diffusion, and standing on the basis of all that is good and pure in life, preach the doctrines of the love of man and the brotherhood of the race, the Religion of humanity and the God of Science.

"God of the granite and the rose!

God of the sparrow and the bee!

The mighty tide of being flows

Through countless channels, Lord, from Thee.

It leaps to life in grass and flowers,

Through every grade of being runs.

While from Creation's radiant towers

Its glory flames from stars and suns." P. R. J.

A Parody.

BY ANTI-BRIMSTONE.

I'm not a soldier of the cross,
A follower of the clan
Who have the parson for their boss,
Upon the gospel plan.

Must I be thrust in gospel-shops,
And there on bended knees
Be crammed and stuffed with gospel slops,
An unknown God to please?

Is there no way for me to shun
This blood-washed, pious crew?
I must decide to fight or run,
Else they will put me through.

Sure I must fight in self-defense,
'Gainst this religious mob,
And shell them out with common sense,
These Christians and their God.

We Infidels in this great strife
Will conquer by and by;
We would not change the present life
For one beyond the sky.

Soon mental liberty shall spread
Her blessings every-where,
Then parsons will not eat our bread
And pay us off in prayer.

We'll have no God in our laws,
No priestly institution;
We want no Christ to plead our cause,
NONE IN THE CONSTITUTION.

ANOTHER name has to be added to the list of clergymen who have been brought before the criminal courts to answer accusations of wrong doing—that of Father Forhan, a Roman Catholic priest in Chicago, who has been charged with embezzlement. His case is notable on account of the singular defense he urged. He was accused of retaining in his own possession funds intrusted to him by the managers of a church fair, amounting to several thousand dollars, of which the sum of $1,408 was the proceeds of a raffle for a watch. According to the report of the case in the Chicago Journal, the counsel of the accused took the ground that this money was received from a lottery scheme, and as gambling is unlawful, there could be no legal owner for it. The Judge before whom the preliminary examination of the priest was held, declined to take this point into consideration, but decided to hold him to bail in the sum of $5,000, to appear for trial before a higher court.

CHINESE MAXIMS.—1. Let every man sweep the snow from his own door, and not busy himself about the frosts on his neighbor's tiles.

2. Great wealth comes by destiny; moderate wealth by industry.

3. The ripest fruit will not drop into your mouth.

4. The pleasure of doing good is the only one that does not wear out.

5. Dig a well before you are thirsty.

6. Water does not remain in the mountains, nor vengeance in a great mind.

* Descartes, Principia Part, I., 44.

Elder Zebedee Harkins.

Sermon No. 3.

[Reported by THOMAS A. DIDYMUS.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington, D. C.

"And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and he became a living soul."

"And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it."

"And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat."

"But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat, for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

When a man builds a house, if he is a wise man, he digs down to the solid rock and lays a substantial foundation on it; then his house will stand. But a foolish man builds upon the sand and uses rotten wood instead of stone for foundation material, and though he may build a magnificent looking house it won't stand, but will come tumbling about his head ere long.

Now I want to say, my beloved brethren and friends, that many of the preachers of these modern times are building upon the sands of infidelity, and using the rotten rubbish of Pagan philosophy and modern science as their chief building material. And their work will not stand the test of fire, nor stand approved at the judgment seat of Christ. Brethren let us stick to the old-fashioned bible doctrines, for if we do we are sure to come out right in the end.

And the right place to begin is at the beginning; and the beginning of the gospel plan of salvation is the fall of man. Therefore it is of the greatest importance that we fully understand that subject. We learn from this holy book that the Lord God created the heavens and the earth and all things that are therein in six days, by the word of his power, which St. John tells us was none other than Jesus Christ, the eternal son of God. Thus we see that the blessed Savior is the visible word or power of God—God manifest in the flesh, as the Apostle hath it.

God the father is a spirit without body or parts, hence invisible, and when in his infinite wisdom he resolved to create this world, he did it through the son, "All things were made by him and without him was not anything made that is made," says St. John. To the true believer who studies this blessed book it is plain as can be that the Lord Jesus Christ was the creator of the world as well as the redeemer of man.

But what is it to create? Did the Lord God make the world out of nothing, or did he build it like a child builds a cob-house out of materials that he found to his hand?

This is an important question. The infidels and scientists all take one side, and the true believers the other, while a great many don't know which to believe, and are carried about by every wind of doctrine.

Now, the only scriptural and sensible definition of create is that found in Webster's dictionary. Create, to originate, to bring into existence. Now, my beloved brethren, if this world existed from all eternity in any form then the Lord God did not create it, and this bible is false, and God is a liar, and our faith is vain.

But I am for one ready to exclaim with the Apostle, "Let God be counted true, though all men are liars." No, my friends, we must stand by the word of God as found in this holy and blessed bible, though all the world should oppose it. And the preacher who will give up one such vital point as this about the creation has surrendered his strongest post to the enemy.

I have not time now to dwell on the period of creation, but if there is anything so plain that even a fool can't be mistaken about, it is the length of time required for the creation of the world. And it's astonishing to me that any Christian minister should surrender this point to the scientific infidels as some have done.

It just took six days to complete the job from the start, as you will all find by reading the first chapter of Genesis.

And after the earth and all the trees, and herbs and animals had been created, the Lord God wound up by creating man in his own image, on the sixth day.

This was the crowning work of creation, and like all the rest of God's works he was perfect. But the Lord God saw that it was not good for man to be alone, so he caused him to fall into a deep sleep, and then he opened his side and took out one of his ribs and formed a woman out of it.

Thus we see that woman was not created, but only formed out of a rib of the man, who had been created. This rib was taken out of Adam's left side, and men all have one rib less on that side to this day, which fact proves that this was the way woman was made.

And I want to call your attention to the fact that whosoever says woman is the equal of man is an infidel, for this bible shows as clearly as can be that she is inferior.

There are a great many schemes set on foot by the Devil in these later times to overturn the testimony of this book; and this woman's rights doctrine it clearly one of his schemes.

The Devil always took every opportunity to contradict the word of God.

And this brings me to the first time he did this. It was when he told Eve that the Lord God knew that they should not die if they partook of the forbidden fruit. But the Devil proved a lie that time, and he has been the father of lies and of liars from that day to this.

But did they die? That's the question! Yes, my friends, they did die on that very day. They died a moral death; from that day they were dead in sin. But this was not all. The effects of their sin rested upon all the rest of creation, for the Lord God cursed the very ground for man's sake, so that whereas before it produced only good fruits and pleasant flowers, immediately thorns and thistles sprang up and the land became barren. So much so that man had to get his bread in the sweat of his face from that day forth forever. But this is not all, still.

No, my friends, there was a tree called the "Tree of Life," that grew in the Garden of Eden, and the fruit of this tree had power to make any one who should partake of it live forever. And the Lord God drove the man and his wife out of the Garden, and placed a cherubim and a flaming sword at the gate lest he should eat of the fruit of the "Tree of Life," and live forever. And now he was subject to diseases, and old age, and all the other calamities by which he and his children are cut off from the earth. And the woman being the chief sinner was made the chief sufferer, for the Lord God said to the woman:

"I will greatly multiply thy sorrow; in sorrow shalt thou bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

The old serpent, the Devil, put the first woman up to disobeying the Lord's commandment. And now his trying to get the women into trouble again by telling them they are the equals of men, and ought to have as many rights as their husbands. I tell you, my beloved sisters, the Devil will make fools of you all as he did of old mother Eve if you listen to his cunning lies. And Elder Harkins warns you not to attempt to escape the penalty of original sin, or try to get out of the sphere in which you have been placed by the Lord God Almighty.

Don't try to unsex yourselves for you can't be men, if you try, and you will only make yourselves ridiculous, and bring down the vengeance of Almighty God upon your poor weak heads.

But I digress, and must hasten on to the more important points of my subject.

The chief effect of the fall was to banish man from the face of God, and put him under the dominion of the Devil. He was now totally depraved, and the frowns of an offended God hung over him, shutting out all hopes of heaven.

Ah, my friends, there was one hope—but Adam did not understand it. It was found in this passage:

"The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head."

The eternal son of God then and there promised to redeem the world in his own good time by being born of a woman, and taking upon himself the sins of the world, and dying to appease the wrath of God.

What a glorious plan! Infinite wisdom alone could have conceived it, and infinite mercy alone could have prompted the son of God to leave the shining courts of heaven and the royal palace of its glorious king, and come down and live among men, and suffer the ignominious and painful death of the cross.

But this was the only means whereby poor, fallen man could be redeemed, and the justice of God satisfied.

God is infinite in all his attributes; therefore it required an infinite sacrifice to satisfy his wrath and turn aside his vengeance.

The blood of bulls and goats failed to do it. These could only stay the judgments of heaven from year to year, till, in the fullness of time, the Lamb of God should descend out of heaven to be offered up on Calvary once for all. All the blood that had been shed from the righteous blood of Abel to the day that Zacharias stood by the altars of Jerusalem, as the morning stars sang together, and the angels proclaimed peace on earth and good will to man, had failed to blot out one single sin or restore poor, fallen humanity to the favor of God.

But Jesus Christ, the blessed Lamb of God, offered up his life as a willing sacrifice to appease the vengeance of Almighty God.

What a scene is here my friends! The glorious son of God dying like a malefactor between two thieves on a Roman cross to redeem a lost world.

Hear him in anguish cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Again he exclaims, "It is finished," and with a groan that rent the heavens and made the solid earth tremble, he gave up the ghost.

He dies; the friend of sinners dies.

Lo! Salem's daughters weep around;

A solemn darkness veils the skies,

A sudden trembling shakes the ground.

In conclusion, my dying friends, I want to impress upon your minds and hearts the important fact that although Jesus died to redeem the world, he has left each one free to choose whether they will accept his salvation, and reign with him in heaven, or reject it and sink in endless woe.

Brethren, sing

Alas! and did my Savior bleed

And did my Sovereign die;

Would he devote that sacred head

For such a worm as I?

The Elder's closing prayer and benediction followed upon the heels of the song, and the congregation broke up and entered upon a general hand-shaking and other expressions of brotherly and sisterly love.

The Elder was most heartily congratulated upon his success in overturning that outrageous idea that woman is the equal of man. And strange to say, these compliments came from the sisters exclusively.

"Why the idea," says sister Barnes, "of a woman's wearing the breeches, and votin', and fitin', and goin' to 'lections and a-gettin' drunk like a man. Don't talk to me, I tell yer the Elder's right in callin' this woman's rites business, the work of the Devil."

"That's so,"—responded sister Skinner—"I've got all the rites I want now, and if I hadn't I wouldn't set myself up to oppose the plan of the Almighty. We wimmin's got to suffer for Eve's sin, and for my part I'm willin' to stand it, for I hadn't got no rite to say anything about it."

Thus the course of comment ran, indicating that the Elder's reference to the one vital question had served to efface from the minds of his people, all thought of the chief points he had made. And thus it will be ever what concerns us here and now is of vastly more interest and importance to even the most superstitious as well as the thoughtful.

Materialization.

With modern facts, we have to deal—materialization must be something of a modern word—a new coinage—I don't find it in the dictionary. Materialization, in modern spirit manifestation parlance, means, or seems to mean, the taking out of a material body, by a soul—a man, woman, child, or Indian, who had left the mortal body, and gone to what is called the spirit world, or land.

Near eighty years ago, I underwent materialization—was rushed into a material body, without my consent—wasn't even consulted about it—a sorry blunder! I haven't got over it yet. Here I am, in this material body.

In the world I came from, all was harmony—calm sunshine and gentle breezes—perpetual verdure, and perpetual bloom. The change of worlds, when I had looked about here, I regarded as decidedly to my disadvantage. And that material body sticks to me yet.

Do I still regard materialization as a calamity? Not so much so as at first. I begin to see a use, in being inducted into this rough and tumble world. It is for educational purposes. The material body, with which I was clothed upon, had all the proclivities, common to animals in general. And like bogus politicians in general, the animal wanted to run the government machine.

Lawsuits, under most favorable auspices, are bad enough, in all conscience. To be driven to the extremity of taking issue with a party—going to law with a shyster—a "what is it," who values himself—on low, pettyfogging trickery—only think of it!

Edward S. Savage—law student, of Rahway, N. J.,—I met him at the Stark House, in Bennington—gave me his autograph, requesting my opinion of his intellectual status. I told the young gentleman he wouldn't make a shyster. The best use he could make of his law education, would be to avert lawsuits. His father, Hon. Geo. W. Savage, sagely replied—"That is the best use, any body can make of law education."

I never was plaintiff, nor for plaintiff, in any case. The best may be made defendant, nolens volens, as was this little sinner, in the case aforesaid.

In the high court of Chancery, the case has been tried. It has been the cause of the session—dragging its slow length along, through many years. But no "bill of particulars" has scotched the wheels of jurisprudence. Plaintiff being irresponsible, and having no indorser, I have had some heavy bills of cost to pay. He, she, or it, as the case may be, has entered—not willingly—by compulsion—has entered a nolle prosequi—leaving me master of the situation.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, if my opinion, of materialization, be of any service to you, you can have it for what it is worth.

When liberated, from this mortality—which I hope to be pretty soon now—not all the Holmes, Eddys, and other saints and sinners in this, or any other world, will ever drag me into another such a lawsuit. Amen.

PRENTISS.

A GENTLE, husbandless creature in Illinois writes to a lawyer who advertised that he would provide companions for unmarried persons: "My Dear Mr.: This is to certify that I am a widow with thirteen children born, and have had three husbands, each of whom died in peace in his own way. I have a small farm, and would take another husband yet, if I could find a young one; no old, bull-headed sardine need apply; he will not be taken in. Ten dollars will be given to you to produce the man."

[Translation from El Mundo Nuevo, a Spanish journal published in this city by F. Fesser.]

Tyndall's Address.

The address recently delivered at Belfast, by Mr. John Tyndall, to the British Association of which he is President, is an event too important that we should let it pass inadvertently. The celebrity attached to the eminent professor in Europe as well as in America, the transcendancy of the doctrines sustained by him and the respectability of the scientific body in whose bosom they were set forth, have all tended to make the eloquent address to which we refer produce an immense echo throughout the confines of the civilized world. It has met everywhere either with enthusiastic applause or severe censure, passionate commentaries or ferocious attacks on the illustrious naturalist, who while being looked upon by not a few of his admirers as one of the most notable geniuses of the present age, many of his adversaries attempt to discredit him by applying to him the epithet of Material Atheist.

Mr. Tyndall's address may be said to have as a principal object the asserting of the rights of science in scientific investigations, and on this point its extraordinary effect on the illustrious minds of the old and new continent is undoubtedly a very significant symptom of vitality and progress. It is known that what in bygone times was admitted as the result of philosophical conclusions, is to-day sought by means of the study of nature and that from its constant unprejudiced and true observation are expected resolutions of great importance to the existence and progress of nations both physically and morally.

This inductive method is indeed substituting more and more the ancient arguments from artificial superstitions and the labor that was then bestowed to the construing of a hypothesis is to-day applied in preference to the scrutiny of facts and the attainment as much as possible of exact causes. But we must acknowledge that the effect produced by the speech of Mr. Tyndall has revealed much greater progress in this sense than was generally supposed. If there have not been wanting those who would have liked to prevent the enunciation of modern doctrines, it is evidenced generally that these are considerably extended and what is more important is, that it is not thought best to reject them with contempt, but to discuss them by logical methods. Fortunately there are not many—and the number is steadily decreasing—who have with the editor of the New York Tribune that, "all sensible persons will consider the address of Prof. Tyndall as extremely impudent and absolutely unnecessary."

The majority on the contrary although not accepting the tendencies of the English naturalist have not questioned his right to study the problems of science and emit his idea sincerely and honestly according to his own judgement, however refutable it may be. The privileged patents for seeking the truth have passed away in the present age.

But what was it Tyndall said to create such commotion and occasion such contradictory appreciation? His address, magnificent in form, contains in the first place a most brilliant review of the history of the atomic doctrine in all its phases. Democritus, the laughing philosopher, profounder than Plato or Aristotle, according to Bacon's idea, and to whom the phenomena of nature could not depend on the caprices of the gods; Empedocles who explains the combinations and separation of atoms by the intervention of love and hatred and foreshadowed more than two thousand years ago the theory so accepted to-day of the "survival of the fittest." Epicurus his disciple and enthusiastic disciple of the sempiternal laws and Lucretius who in his great poem "De Rerum Natura" the indestructibility of atoms' "first beginnings," from which everything else originates and into which all things are dissolved in the world and one whose daring conception gave rise, centuries after, to the nebular hypothesis of Kant, are one by one brought to mind by Tyndall, and set forth briefly but with incomparable skill.

Next in turn comes in the review, the time just after the middle ages when Copernicus flourished as the discoverer of the paths of the heavenly bodies, Giordano Bruno victim of the Inquisition of Venice, Galileo (who in order to avoid the same fate had to abjure on his knees astronomical truths simply because they did not agree with the prevailing religious belief), and Kepler, forerunner of Newton.

But with regard to the atomic doctrine, Tyndall does not even find any traces of it for a great period of time until the seventeenth century when it was revived by Gassendi, contemporaneous with Hobbes and Descartes, since that time scientific progress has been wonderfully great, and such a fundamental revolution has been affected in ideas that the investigations of Darwin and the works of Herbert Spencer became possible.

The exposition which Tyndall makes of both principles is admirable. We should never have thought that doctrines so abstruse in themselves could have been condensed without becoming unintelligible, yet nothing is clearer than the formula laid out by the President of the British Association on the theory of "Natural Selection," and upon the generating system of the most eminent of contemporaneous sociologists. Tyndall devotes himself to his analysis not only with the interest of the critic but also with the vehemence of the partizan who if not wholly admitting the conclusions obtained by his predecessors, sympathizes heartily with their spirit and tendencies, and to this cause is undoubtedly to be attributed the impression produced by the address, because by inclining to the atomic doctrines, such as they are understood to-day, the English naturalist has given as much encouragement to the defenders of those doctrines as displeasure to their adversaries. Hence the applause and invectives that have been heard from all quarters. But the ones as well as the others have also originated on account of the energy and sincerity with which Tyndall has tried to emancipate science, so to speak, for, says he, "All religious theory and all systems which embrace notions of cosmogony or which otherwise reach into its domain, must, in so far as they do this, submit to the control of science and relinquish all thought of controlling it." For a long time it was imposed as an article of faith that the earth was the centre of the planetary system, notwithstanding the earth moves and has moved from the beginning of time. St. Augustine did not admit the possibility of the Antipodes, because scripture does not mention that race among the descendants from Adam, and yet the existence of the Antipodes has proved to be an incontrovertible fact. During some years it has been believed that the world is only a few thousand years since its creation and nevertheless day after day the opinion is becoming more general that not by six thousand, nor by sixty thousand, but by millions, this planet in which we live has been the theatre of life and death. With these data and many other analogous, Tyndall sets forth his thesis and demonstrates his deduction. "My object has been," says he, on conclusion, "to establish that concerning matters of this kind, science claims an unlimited right of investigation. The question is not to decide whether Lucretius and Bruno, or Darwin and Spencer are right or wrong. I do not doubt for a moment that their ideas are susceptible of correction, but what is of importance is that they may be discussed with perfect liberty and without any restrictions."

As mere expositors of the work to which these lines refer, it has not been our purpose to judge of its dogmatic doctrines when even its author did not pretend to give it such a character.

What Tyndall thinks of the atomic theory is rather inferred from his address than expressed in a definite manner and proof of it is the fact that not many days ago he has published a manifest in which he complains of not being rightly understood and rejects the epithet of "Material Atheist." Anyhow, whether reasonably applied or not, his address is a brilliant defence of the rights of human reason, inasmuch as it vindicates those of science in the study of nature, it is a most eloquent protest of the independence of thought, and a token of love for the truth as pure, noble and worthy of sympathy and respect.

In this sense we tribute him our applause, insignificant it is true, but sincere and enthusiastic.

Liberal Libraries.

[We are pleased to receive such letters as the following. It shows what may be accomplished in almost every community. Let friends in other places follow this good example. Every town in the land containing 3,000 inhabitants should have a Liberal Library.—ED. T. S.]

FREMONT, NEB., January, 1875.

Mr. Editor: About two years ago the Liberals of this city started a library, known as the Fremont Liberal Library Association. Z. Shed, Esq., after taking an active part for making a success of it, has been able to gather together one hundred and sixty-seven volumes, among which are Voltaire's works, fifteen volumes, Huxley, Darwin, Paine, Motley, Lecky and many other standard works, they all amounting to $470. The membership is $3, entitling the member to send for books to that amount, or giving the title of a book he wishes to read, and if there is money on hand to make up the price of the work, it is sent for; many members have made donations. Total number of members, sixty-seven.

This library improves slowly, but surely, and its success is due to Messrs. Shed and H. O. Paine, strong Liberals and earnest workers in our cause.

Respectfully, MEPHISTOPHELES.

MARK TWAIN, in his work, "The Innocents Abroad," in speaking of the discontent among the passengers of the excursion steamer, says: "There were even grumblers at the prayers." The executive officer said the Pilgrims had no charity: "There they are, down there every night at eight bells, praying for fair winds, when they know as well as I do, that this is the only ship going East this time of the year, but there are a thousand coming West—what's a fair wind for us is a head wind to them—the Almighty blowing a fair wind for a thousand vessels, and this tribe wants him to turn it clear around so as to accommodate one, and she a steamship at that! It aint good sense, it aint good reason, it aint good Christianity, it aint common human charity. Avast with such nonsense!"

Anti-Christianity.

Some of the reasons why we reject Christianity, as it is taught, by its votaries.

First.—It has never been defined, what Christianity is, practically. Theoretically it is, five hundred contradictory sects, each infallibly the true religion.

Second.—According to the account of the getting up of the Jesus, and the manner of getting the Christ into it, there is strong presumptive evidence, of forgery. A witness who uses no date, only "It came to pass," and who contradicts himself, in all parts of his statement, is not to be relied upon in all business transactions among men. Matthew, Mark and Luke's Jesus, are different from John's—talked differently. These four contradict each other—are different in detail. From Paul's Christ, 1. Cor. 15th, there is proof of forgery here. Dr. A. Clarke says, "Jesus was a title of dignity;" Yasha, Yehoshua, Joshua, all signified, Savior, if translated into English, Christ was Mashak, Hamashiac, Meshah, Christos, Greek, signifying, anointed in English, two titles of dignity personified. Note. Ex. xxix. 7, Matt. i: 16, Luke ii: 11; John i. 1, proof positive, that Jesus and Christ were a forgery. Christians were named from Hindoo Christna, our English priest-forged name.

God made man male and female, Gen. i: 27, gave them all the world, and every tree whose seed is in itself, for meat, 29: "Blessed them and rested." In chap. 2d, other forged names made it all over again, made man alone, made a garden of trees, and prohibited one. An irreconcilable absurdity. It were necessary, to forge, hell and damnation, and an immortal soul; and begin in our infancy, to scare us, make us say we believe the lie, to save our forged souls. In our bible the English name God, is declared to be the Creator—and no man or woman, ever knew anything about Creator, only a Priest-forged name. Christians have adopted the character, of the Jewish Yavee, Shadai and Elohim, (the gods) and forged the word God, to express that character—the worst character that was ever described by pen or pencil. And Christians are the most proud, pompous, lying hypocrites, the sun ever shone on. Their past and present history proves it, as sure as a tree is known by its fruit. If we had been trained to truth speaking, benevolent acting and just practice, instead of faith, great would have been our reward on earth. It costs two hundred millions a year to pay priests, for telling who created our earth and the heavens. All our Priests say God, made it. The last, forged name, it is highly important, that all in Christendom, should know, that all the names, that priests have ever forged—never created anything: or imparted one particle of information. Ghosts, Christs, spirits, Gods, Devils, and dogmas, of all superstitions, have only made men ignorant, and ugly.

Some books are lies from end to end,
But none too great, for priests to print;
A monstrous jargon they have pen'd,
And fastened to us without stint.

John Milton, with his art sublime,
Wrote many lines to help the Priests;
All in blank verse, without a rhyme,
Describing mighty, horrid beasts.

Except Dante, none else could tell,
What he saw, when in Tartarus;
And in the dark and burning hell,
To scare the world; yea, all of us.

He that believes, and is baptized,
Shall saved be, for Jesus' sake,
He that "believes" not, shall all alive,
Be damned in hell, chained to a stake.

Go, and of all sects, be thou a preacher,
Romish—Mormon—down to advent, screecher;
Your "isms," down the world's throat cram 'em,
And if they won't receive it, damn 'em.

Go preach my gospel, saith the Lord;
Bid the whole world your word receive;
He shall be saved, that trusts your word,
He shall be damn'd, that won't believe.

Go make men sick, go kill 'em dead,
And like the Satan in my name,
Amen to what John Calvin said,
Servetus died, in shocking pain.

It seems to me true, that not one in a thousand; nay, million; of professed disciples of the supposed dear Redeemer, knows anything about Christianity and its dogmas. Only names, mere sound. Or what is in our bible; and merely nothing of the crimes Christianity has perpetrated. They are afraid of hell, and Tophet, and have got hold of some priest's coat tail, is all they know of religion. Infallibly ignorant and sour, supporting their safety, depends on their bigotry; and priests keep them so. Proof overwhelming, that priests are, and always were a gang of knaves. A Realist,

JOSEPH NOYES.

New-York Liberal Club.

DECEMBER 18th, 1875.

MR. JOHN ELDERKIN delivered a cultured lecture upon the Drama. After alluding to the low estimation in which the art is held by some, he asserted it possesses the highest domain of art and yields in definitions, depth, subtlety, form, variety, and beauty to no other of the arts, and in its appeal to universal humanity exceeds them all.

Dramatic art was born in the service of religion, and so long as it was its exclusive servant there was no anathematization of it. Greek tragedy in the beginning was purely a religious worship and afterwards passed to the temples and theatres. The Hindoo drama was based on mythological narratives, and were acted only on solemn occasions. In China alone, of all nations possessing a national drama, the ancient civilization had been so overlapped and obliterated by the changes of succeeding ages, that it is impossible to trace an original of the drama with religious observance. The Roman drama and that of Europe were derived from Greece.

The early Christian Fathers, nourished on Greek learning, and witnessing the effects of the Greek drama upon the multitude, the Apollinaire, A. D. 370, turned particular histories and portions of the Old and New Testaments into comedies and tragedies, though previous to this they had stoutly denounced all heathen learning. Chrysostom, in his homilies, cried, "Shame that people should listen to a comedian with the same ears that they hear an evangelical preacher." About 378 Gregory Nazianzen, Archbishop of Constantinople, and one of the Fathers of the Church, composed plays from the Old and the New Testaments and substituted them from the Grecian plays of Sophocles and Euripides. It was in one of the tragedies of this Christian Father that the Virgin Mary was first introduced upon the stage.

Much of the rapidity with which Christianity supplanted the old faiths of Paganism was due to the facility with which it adapted itself to prevailing tastes and habits and during the Middle Ages the acting of mysteries or plays representing the miracles of saints and stories of the Bible formed an important part of every religious festival, and were often of a very questionable character.

In 1264 a company was instituted at Rome to represent the sufferings of Christ. In 1304 the creation of Adam and Eve was acted there, and afterwards introduced into France, and subsequently into England. In time by the employment of inferior actors and who by the introduction of additions and "gags" the drama fell into comparative disrepute for religious services and speedily became secularized, and the theatres drawing popular audiences more than churches the priests soon began to denounce the drama. An English divine in 1578 mournfully wrote: "Wyll not a fylthy play, wyth the blaste of a trumpet, sooner call thyther a thousande, than an hour's tolling of the bell bring to the sermon a hundred."

Some just criticisms were passed upon immoral features of the drama by pandering to sensual and depraved tastes by the introduction of such plays and representations as inflamed the passions; this, however, was an abuse, not an essential feature of the drama. Dr. Channing said, "Poetry has been made the instrument of vice, the pander of the passions, but when genius thus stoops it parts with half its power."

There is no degradation inherent in the stage, as there is none in poetry, of which the stage is the interpreter. For a long time it held the same relation to poetry that the printing press does to modern literature. It was through the instrumentality of the drama that the mass of people got their knowledge of the works of genius, of history as well. It is by the means of the stage that the mighty influence of Shakespeare has been exerted upon all English-speaking men and women, developing and modifying their intellectual structure. The drama is as old as the first story-teller who tried to make his listeners realize his narration by appropriate rhetoric and mimetic gestures.

The stage is not the only institution which reflects the infirmities of human kind, governments, politics, diplomacy, the press, the pulpit and society are all afflicted and its common origin forbid us to look at the stage for anomalous perfection. Pleasure is essential to human well being, and not even the religion which taught asceticism as the highest form of virtue was able to effect any important change in the conduct and opinion of the world. It is only by the resources and power of the stage that the masterpieces of dramatic literature can ever be adequately interpreted. It still remains the heritage of the stage to reproduce the noblest passions and heroic proportions of humanity.

The decline of the stage at the present time may be traced in a measure to the neglect of the primary purpose of the drama to represent character. The demand for dramatic entertainment has outrun the means of our dramatic artists. The number of actors capable of representing character is ridiculously small as compared with the number of theatres. To make up for this defect many devices have been seized upon, as dress, spectacle, grotesque contortion, slang, etc., which have signally failed to meet the public demand. There is a gulf between nature and art which cannot be bridged. The unmerited disrepute in which actors have been held has exercised an evil influence by habituating the public to regard in them with an indulgent eye offenses which have been severely reprehended in others. A prolific source of the discredit into which the drama has fallen arises from the want of proper training on the part of actors. There is no school of acting, and barely a tradition of the requirements of the histrionic art. Hence we have a class without the ability and training of actors who have managed to obtain a connection with the theatre to the incalculable detriment and disgrace of the drama and its genuine followers.

But when all that can be urged against the theatre has been weighed the sum of good which remains far overbalances the causes of censure. It must ever be remembered that it always is in the power of the public to restrain the license of the theatre and make it contribute its substance to the advancement of morality and the reformation of the age.

There has always existed a great affinity between authors and actors. Cicero was the friend of Roscius and modern instances suggest themselves to every mind. The poet is indebted to the stage for the best reading of his verses; the stage is indebted to the poet for the warp and woof of its productions. The literary knowledge of a well-informed actor is necessarily extensive, and his perception of ideal and verbal relationship quick and suggestive. It is in the intercourse of these co-workers that we get the best view of the social character of eminent actors.

MR. NASH opened the discussion, and viewed the moral aspects of the stage, commending it in its higher qualities, and deprecating the lower tendencies. Among the objectionable features he mentioned late hours, bad ventilation, immodest ballet dancing, undue exposure of person, etc. He admitted the great power for instruction the drama possesses. He thought Shakespeare had been over praised, and that other dramatic writers had been quite as moral and unexceptionable. He was more in favor of comedies and even farces than tragedies, deeming it better for people to be pleased and to laugh heartily than to view tragic representation of murder, bloodshed and death. In the dancing of the stage, he saw good and bad features; the poetry of motion, the grace and beauty of artistic, modest dancing was elevating and refining, while the immodest and low tended in a contrary direction. The partial nudity of the dancers he regarded not necessarily low and degrading.

MR. WILCOX thought in former times the drama was more essential than now, when by means of the printing press hundreds of thousands can be reached by the novel writers easier than three thousand could be by the drama, and that the novel writer supersedes the dramatist. If Shakespeare had lived in this day, he would have been a Dickens. He thought the drama was degenerating, and its tendency was to become lower and lower.

DR. HALLOCK took a different view; he thought there were bad novels as well as bad plays, and they possessed equally as objectionable qualities. The drama as holding the mirror up to nature, and representing the actual features of society, is productive of much good, and in discarding it we exclude much that is beautiful and grand. The presentation of the human form upon the stage is not low and degrading any more than painting and sculpture. He commended amusement and mirth; they have a salutary, hygienic influence upon mankind. The man that laughs is rarely a villain.

MR. DAWSON complimented the drama, and said the pulpit and the bar were greatly indebted to it. The greatest statesmen of England had drawn freely from dramatic literature. He made some comments upon our leading actors. J. B. Booth was the only one of that family who was really an actor, and he was truly great; Edwin Booth, though polished, is not a great actor. Charlotte Cushman as Meg Merrilles is grand, but when you see her in Lady Macbeth and other characters it is only Meg Merrilles over again.

The subject was further ably discussed by L. T. GARDNER, DR. LAMBERT, MRS. HALLOCK, DR. HOEBNER and T. B. WAKEMAN, but want of space compels us to pass over much that was said we would otherwise be pleased to lay before our readers.

On Dec. 25th and Jan. 1st, on account of the Holidays, the Club held no meetings. Jan. 8th, T. B. WAKEMAN delivered a very interesting lecture, entitled, The Harmony of the New Gospels; or, A Review of Prof. John Fiske's Cosmic Philosophy. For want of room our report must necessarily be brief. He drew attention to the advance made in science and knowledge, and of the gradual introduction of a New Faith—a new gospel of truths, through the teachings of Comte, Strauss, Lewis, Spencer, Mill, Draper, Fiske and others, and claimed the uncertain and conjectural theories of the past must give way to the positive and knowable truth of advancing science. The world now wants not apparent truth but scientific truth.

He entered extensively into the classification of sciences, which he illustrated by diagrams, making frequent reference to the philosophies of Comte, Spencer, and others, and contrasting the different schools of thought as represented by Descartes, Humboldt, Buechner, and numerous other writers. He differed from Spencer and Fiske in some points. He discarded the nebular theory of the formation of suns and stars, preferring that of Proctor, that the sun, the earth and other bodies grow by the accumulations of matter from surrounding space in the form of meteors, aerolites, etc. He placed evolution as the basic law of all laws, and regards Darwinism as being triumphantly sustained. He accorded Positivism a front rank in the new gospel of the religion of humanity.

He denied those holding to this faith were Atheists, and claimed their Deity to be humanity in the aggregate, in past, present and future, the Absolute—the Unknownable being beyond our reach or comprehension. His school does not deny the infinite, nor are they irreligious, but revere the God of Science, and the God of Humanity, with a devout reverence. He pronounced scientists really the most unblaspheinous of men. He claimed it was belittling the Infinite Power to give it the form and figure of a man, or a person, possessing passions, impulses and emotions. The God of Humanity he claimed as a being in the aggregate, but not a person.

He accorded to Sociology an important position among the sciences, and claimed much from it in the future happiness of the race, controlling as it does the relations of capital, labor and all the conditions of social life. He termed human society as the grand protoplasm which surrounds the earth, containing the elements which, with the aid of science, a better and happier condition can be evolved. He indulged in much hope for an improved state of society, in keeping with the advance of science and true knowledge.

He alluded to the representation that had been made of Death shown as a skeleton with a smiling babe within its ribs. The skeleton was the errors and superstitions of the past, while the smiling babe was the coming true faith of science and knowledge. He thought the world should reject the skeleton and cherish the babe.

He closed his lecture of one and a half hours with complimentary allusion to the able minds who have preceded us, and by their labors and efforts have thrown light upon the world. The lecture embraced a great range of subject, and evinced much close thought. It contained much wholly unnoticed here, but as it probably will hereafter be published, we will do it no further injustice now.

S. P. ANDREWS followed. He approved of much that had been said, and used, also, sharp criticism. He recognized in the lecture many of his own views as enumerated in his science of Universology. He evidently felt Mr. Wakeman had not done him full justice, and he defended himself eloquently, and was frequently applauded by the large audience present. He explained some of the principles of Universology and added a few remarks in favor of Metaphysics, asserting it was the foundation of all science and knowledge.

DR. LAMBERT spoke next and was very humorous. He made some excellent hits, which were highly appreciated by the audience.

DR. HALLOCK followed, criticising somewhat the lecturer of the evening. Could not see that his idea of Deity—merely power or a blind force—was anything better than Atheism; nor could he recognize in the new religion of humanity, a being capable of forming or creating anything that exists. He discarded a portion of the doctrine of Evolution; while he understood how the perfect plant could develop from a seed, he could not believe one species of existence could merge into another, that a pigeon could become a hawk or a puppy evolve into a bear.

REV. W. R. ALGER made a few remarks, and defended theology from some attacks that had been made upon it. His remarks were conciliatory and liberal.

T. B. WAKEMAN closed the speaking, by making replies to some of the criticisms that had been made upon him.

The hall was well filled, and great interest in the speaking manifested.

To Mr. Wm. Willicott.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Jan. 7th, 1875.

Dear Sir: Your open letter addressed to me in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 1st is at hand by to-day's mail. My self-respect will never permit me, in these columns, or elsewhere, to hold any discussion with one who stigmatizes me in advance as wanting in candor and honesty. This you have done in the letter referred to by a very broad insinuation, and by a positive but utterly baseless assertion.

Your language is (italicised by myself), "Shall I be deemed impertinent if I ask you to discuss this subject in a candid, honest manner? My past experience tells me this is very rarely done. The man of straw you generally attack is of your own creation."

Yours, without detraction,

S. H. PLATT.

Reply.

AN APOLOGY AND A JUSTIFICATION.—Last Sunday morning I attended the M. E. Church, De Kalb avenue, Brooklyn, for the purpose of hearing the first of a series of discourses on the "Christian God, the Christian Bible, the Christian Experience against the Assumption of Modern Skepticism and the Deduction of Modern Science."

It was evident the lecture had been prepared with great care. The Rev. gentleman gave good evidence that he had been sitting at the feet of the Great Gamaliels of science, viz: Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, etc., etc., and had been a careful reader.

The Rev. S. H. Platt may be classed among that advanced guard of Christian teachers, whose aim is to harmonize the Bible with the teachings of modern science. He made admissions last Sunday, which, if followed to their ultimate, would be fatal to present orthodox Christianity. He laid great stress on our emotional nature, which he said "religion alone could justify," ignoring the fact that this emotional nature is entirely the outgrowth of education. But as this lecture was only preliminary, I do not intend to be critical, but to correct a construction which he placed on my letter to him in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 1st.

He said he had received a challenge, but the language in which it was written was so impertinent he could take no notice of it; he was accused of being a hypocrite. Then he read from THE TRUTH SEEKER the following: "Shall I be deemed impertinent if I ask you to discuss the subject in a candid, honest manner? My past experience tells me this is very rarely done. The 'man of straw' you generally attack is of your own creation."

By what construction of language did he give a personal application to those words: "My past experience tells me this is very rarely done." I generally can find language to express the idea without appearing ambiguous, and if I meant to be personal, I should have written it thus: "My past experience tells me you very rarely do this." Surely this is a 'man of straw' he is attacking this time.

I did not mean anything personal; and questions of a personal nature, I would not discuss in a newspaper. But I do mean those words shall apply to clerical controversialists in general. It is the truth! The Rev. Dr. Carroll of Bedford Avenue Church is a representative man, is he not? Does he not stand officially in the very front rank of his denomination? The utterances of such a man must have weight, for from his commanding position he is enabled to compel attention, yet this man in his recent lecture on skepticism, uttered words that should have blistered his lips with burning shame, for he well knew they were not those of "truth and soberness." He said, "he regarded the skeptic as a man universally corrupt, of impure life, and the apostle of pollution. They call themselves Freethinkers; yes, they were free like the reptile, to crawl among the slime of pollution, corruption and decay,—free like the tiger to pounce on the lambs of the flock, to tear them away from the folds of the Church, and the halloing influence of the family altar, and suck from their hearts their very life blood; and if it were not for the restraining influences of Christian civilization these men and women would make the whole world a brothel, a pest-house, a den of pollution!"

Is this the teaching of Christianity or the courtesy of a gentleman? How often have I listened to the vile and false aspersions which Christian ministers have cast on the memory of that man to whom America owes more than all others, he to whom she will yet erect her grandest, her proudest monument, THOMAS PAINE!

"It is not ours to judge—far less condemn."

It is Byron the Infidel who writes those charitable words, he whom the refined, cultured Christian lady, "Mrs. Harriett Beecher Stowe" so cruelly slandered for the paltry sum of one hundred and fifty dollars.

I would tell the Rev. gentleman I can truly say my conscience does acquit me of meaning any discourtesy to himself. I then give this as my apology and vindication.

Yours with respect,

WM. WILLICOTT.

Brooklyn, January 12th, 1875.

We regret Mr. Platt understood Mr. Willicott as being personal in the expression used. We feel certain no offense was intended. We have heard Mr. W. speak highly of Mr. Platt, as an intelligent, fair-minded gentleman, and we cannot think he intended any personal offense. We will cheerfully give space for any remarks Mr. Platt may see fit to send us on the subject of Christianity or Infidelity, and hereby invite him to use our columns for the purpose. He shall have the same opportunity of being heard as his opponent; and that, perhaps, is quite as much as the Christian press would do by us.—[Ed. T. S.]

THE Mohammedans believe that old maids have no chance of heaven.

THE apple crop of Connecticut in 1874 was worth $2,000,000.

Friendly Correspondence.

MARY E. FISHER, Frederika, Iowa, writes: I read every week twenty papers or more and yours I like best of all.

E. F. FULLER, South Boston, writes: It is with much pleasure I greet THE TRUTH SEEKER. May its Editor live long and prosper.

J. A. RUTHERFORD, Fannin Co., Texas, a man of seventy-five years, writes: I think I shall read THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I am able to read anything, provided it lives that long.

JAMES H. LINDSAY, Scott River, Cal., writes: Put me down as a life subscriber, let it be monthly, weekly or daily. I would let all other papers go in preference to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It I must have.

WM. F. SUPPLE, Buffalo, N. Y., writes: I haven't been to church in eight years, and people call me a heathen. I find all the consolation I want in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your little paper just suits me.

THOMAS ROBINSON, Pawtucket, R. I., writes: You are engaged in a good work. The paper is well conducted and well printed. I am proud of its existence, and hope it may be a permanent success.

A. SWEET, P. M., False Cape, Cal., writes: Your valuable paper comes like a missionary of truth lighting this extreme western part of our continent. We hail it with delight, and pray for its success.

A. LARSEN, Morgan City, Utah, writes: Your valuable paper is all I can ask for; it is my best companion. I am living in a community of bigoted, ignorant, priest-ridden people, and it does me great good to receive and peruse the truth.

J. ELVERSON, Newark, N. J., writes: I would not do without one number of your paper for ten times its cost. I sometimes can scarcely wait till its arrival. My wife says she wishes THE TRUTH SEEKER was a daily paper; then she would be sure of having me home every night.

J. O. CUMMINGS, Murphysboro, Ill., writes: In this section we want THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am glad to see you intend to put in more Science and not so much Theology. Yet we want plenty of these eye-openers, that make old hell-fire and damnation to sigh for a lodge in some vast wilderness.

MRS. SARAH C. TODD, Forest Grove, Oregon, writes: Your valuable and daring Journal comes to us regularly. It won't do to let any Liberal paper go down for lack of support. So come, Liberals, let us consider this our home mission, and lend a helping hand. Your paper suits here exactly; so don't let me miss a copy. Yours in the Liberal cause.

W. I. HALDEMAN, Pine Grove, Pa., writes: In my opinion, THE TRUTH SEEKER is one of the soundest and richest papers printed, and I would be glad if every honest, truth seeking person in the land could read it. It is a glorious thing a man can enjoy the liberty of his own opinions on theological as well as other subjects, free from the fears of the torture of hell.

PETER BACON, Angola, Ind., writes: The world is getting tired of these old dogmas and frost-bitten creeds. I very well remember what the chairman of an ecclesiastical convention said in New York, thirty years ago. "That infernal thing, the Free Press, must be put down, or some day it will put us down. Thank God, they have done it. I am nearly seventy, and for forty years have been looking for light. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. With best wishes, yours, &c."

C. C. BURNS, Greensburg, Ind., writes: I cannot find words adequate to express my approbation of your paper and the many able articles it contains. It would certainly be impossible for me to be without THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. They are full of knowledge and common sense. That is the food we want. Infidels can't live on wind and water, if it is scented up with mustard seed faith, which I was once taught and actually believed could remove mountains. All hail to THE TRUTH SEEKER; may it continue to wave (like the Star Spangled Banner) over the land of the Free and the home of the brave.

WM. E. COLEMAN, Buffalo, N. Y., writes: I think THE TRUTH SEEKER in some respects the best of all the Liberal Journals. It is solid and substantial, able and interesting. Being a thorough Spiritualist I deprecate the ultra materialistic tenor of many of its articles, and am glad to see occasional gleams of Spiritual light in some of the contributions to its columns. In its onslaught upon Christianity, Bible-worship, superstition and bigotry of every name and hue, I am one with the Freethinkers, Materialists and Secularists. I wish THE TRUTH SEEKER abundant success.

W. E. ROBERTS, New Haven, Ct., writes: I believe I have read copies of most of the reform, religious and liberal papers for the last thirty years. Believing, as I do, that truth seeking is the way by which all reach brighter conditions of life, we should not forget that others are as earnest as we, and to be regarded charitably. This is the strong feature of your paper, that it aims to be just to all. One may think religion all moonshine; another, that it consists in reading prayers out of a gilt-edged prayer-book, and so on. To me, the best religion is that condition of mind that is the ultimate of a life of pure intentions. That alone brings "peace on earth, good will to men."

R. M. CASEY, Pendleton, S. C., writes: These lines leave me in a feeble state of health—barely able to sit up and walk about the house. I have been confined to close quarters over five weeks. The holiday season was passed with intense suffering and pain. I nevertheless had some real enjoyment for The Old Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER and Common Sense all came like ministering spirits to my relief, alleviating my sufferings to some extent and rendering it altogether unnecessary to call in the parson, or to have prayers in my room. I had previously intended to spend Christmas holidays in getting up some new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sending them to you for a Christmas present, but I was unable to do so, and you will have to take the will for the deed. I hope others more fortunate than myself have procured you many new subscribers, and that THE TRUTH SEEKER begins the new year under the most favorable auspices, and that you have been abundantly encouraged to go on in your noble efforts against the strongholds of bigotry and superstition. I hope in a few days to be well enough to go out and attend to business, a part of which shall be to work as heretofore for the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Liberal cause generally.

ISAAC SNYDER, M.D., Horton, Mich., writes: Permit me to congratulate you upon the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is doing mighty service for the right, as the wedges of science are being driven home by that mighty maul of truth and common sense. I hear the splinters of superstition and bigotry crack and snap, and soon the old, rotten, worthless log of religious error will come open, with a great noise, perhaps, but that will be all there is of it. The light of eternal Truth will ultimately shine upon and enlighten all the human race, and then people will look back with amazement upon these dark times, and wonder how any could be so ignorant in the nineteenth century. Stand stiff in the back, brother Bennett, and ultimately I hope, as I believe, THE TRUTH SEEKER will be as much of a pecuniary success as it deserves to be.

D. W. SMITH, Farmer City, Ill., writes: I herewith send you the names of nine new subscribers, which please accept as a New Year's present for the interest you take, and the time and labor you devote to the good work of disseminating solid and substantial facts in place of the old musty, superstitious dogmas of former ages. The churches have such immense power, through the instrumentality of the priesthood, and their wealth is so great it will take time and labor to compel them to release their hold upon the popular throat. Their struggle for the supremacy will be terrible, but gradually, and so surely as time rolls on, their power and life will ebb away. The Liberal press with such co-workers as Tyndall, Huxley, Bradlaugh, and others, all administering such doses of Free Thought and Liberalism, that that old serpent, the curse of mankind, the Church will ultimately succumb. Go on in the good work of liberating the public mind from mental slavery, and we will render you what assistance we can.

E. BOXLEY, Cardington O., writes: I am what is called an Atheist in the full sense of the word. I have heard so much about God, the Lord Jesus Christ and him crucified, the Holy Ghost, The Great I Am, religion, heaven, and hell, that I am sick and tired of such jargon. If David is in heaven I don't care to go there unless he has changed from the bloody brigand he was in this world. I can see nothing in existence but matter and force. Force changes the materiality and gives it a new name only. I expect to be as well off after I am dead as I was before I was born. I quite often read the bible, and in almost every chapter I find so much vulgarity, bloodshed, impossibilities, gasconade, a little mercy, and much jargon, that I wonder how sensible people can believe it is the word of God. In it God is accused of almost every crime known to man. I will tell you, I am a temperance man. I use no ardent spirits of any kind, not even beer or ale. I use no tobacco in any way, nor tea and coffee, and some other little mean tricks I don't do. I keep a clean skin, clean underclothes and a clear conscience. I take great delight in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and never call upon the name of the Lord. I sleep soundly in a well ventilated room, eat coarse, healthy food, work moderately, but never pray. I am in years, but am not too old, and never will be, to be fond of cheerful, lively people, and have them for neighbors. I seldom go to church, but am happy and enjoy the best of health.

JOHN W. POWER, Brighton, Mich., writes: Friend B.: It seems to me the cause of truth must be progressing to a greater extent than ever. The signs of the times are favorable, and my "depraved nature," is prone to believe that the world is in a better condition than it was six thousand years ago, when our first parents were skipping around in that beautiful garden in all their naked innocence, while yet the earth was young and fresh and damp from its maker's hands—like THE TRUTH SEEKER, just from the press. I notice that some religious people who acquire some knowledge of geology, are vainly trying to make their knowledge and their belief in superstition square with each other, by calling "days" those periods of many thousands of years. If you corner them on any of the many absurdities and contradictions of the Bible, and show them that their belief is founded upon evidence that would not convict a thief of petty larceny, or convince a single person blessed with a small portion of common sense, if it was not surrounded with a cloak of foggy obscurity of from two to six thousand years. Still superstition compels them to cling to their early teachings in direct opposition to what their good sense will tell them is false. Many, I think, are hoping for better things than "believe or be damned" doctrines, but fear will not let them go. We are going to have B. F. Underwood here to deliver two of his lectures. A few of us Freethinkers have circulated a subscription paper, and have the necessary amount of money about secured. We expect a stir among the dry bones. We intend making it a free lecture, and will feel ourselves well paid if the people come in and hear him. From what we know of Mr. U.'s reputation as a speaker, we believe he will send some of the creed-bound ones away with a flea in their ear, and perhaps start the wedge that will ultimately crack the shell of bigotry and superstition. May the New Year be happy with you, and may THE TRUTH SEEKER prosper.

CHAS. B. CHURCHILL, Canton, Ill., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is my Bible. I am pleased to see you laboring so earnestly in spreading truth and light before the rising generation. It does my old bones good, and if I can help you in the glorious work I wish to do so. I am an old man—was born in the State of Connecticut in Sept., 1785, thus you will see I am nearly ninety years of age. I have lived long enough to see superstition and fear give way to the bright rays of intelligence. I can write but little yet I contrive to read your valuable paper, and I want now that bright light may be placed in the hands of others, that it may lead them to the land of knowledge and truth. Your paper affords me a large field for thought. When I look back to the day those good old Puritans preached "infant damnation," "Seek and ye shall find, Knock and it shall be opened unto you," they awakened within me a hope that I might yet be saved from that fearful old hell. Alas! soon would this bright hope be driven from my mind by the shouting in my ears, that "hell was full of infants not a span long," that nine-tenths of the human family must take up their future abode with His Satanic Majesty in spite of all their prayers. I well remember how the old minister would question the little children in their Sabbath-school lesson, and tell us what a fearful place old hell was, and picture out the awful fate that awaited us, until I thought indeed there was no other hope for me. But, thanks to progressive thought, that terror has fled, and I now calmly abide my time, waiting, watching and listening for the voice of some sweet angel to call me home to that bright land where all are peaceful and blest. Friend, continue to let your light shine. Your paper is now the beacon light of thousands who are toiling on in life's dark and weary way. Go on with the good work; and though I am soon to strive for that peaceful land on the other side, I shall still strive to show others the way while I remain here. I wish you prosperity and success in the noble work you have undertaken.

CATALOGUE OF STANDARD AND POPULAR RADICAL AND SPIRITUALISTIC BOOKS.

FOR SALE BY D. M. BENNETT, Editor
"TRUTH SEEKER," 335 B'DWAY, NEW YORK.

All orders, with the price of books desired, and the additional amount mentioned for postage, will meet with prompt attention. Postage is free where no postage is mentioned.

Ancient Symbol Worship.....	$2.00
Antiquity of Man, by Lyell.....	3.00
Autobiography of J. S. Mill.....	2.50
Ancient Faiths, by Imman.....	27.00
Artificial Somnambulism, by Dr. Fahnestock.....	1.50 8
Alice Vale, by Lois Waisbrooker.....	1.25 8
American Crisis, by Warren Chase.....	.25 2
Answers to Questions, Practical and Spiritual, by A. J. Davis.....	1.50 10
Apocryphal New Testament.....	1.25 7
A Peep into Sacred Tradition, by Orin Abbot.....	.50 2
Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine. Cloth.....	.50 4
Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine, Paper.....	.25 3
Arcana of Nature, by Hudson Tut- tle. Vols. I and II.....	1.25 8
A B C of Life, by A. B. Child.....	.25 2
Arabula; or, The Divine Guest, by A. J. Davis.....	1.50 8
Approaching Crisis, by A. J. Davis.....	1.00 7
Apostles (translated from the French), by Renan.....	1.75 10
Astronomy and Worship of the An- cients, by G. Vale.....	.20 2
A Stellar Key to the Summer Land, by A. J. Davis. Paper Covers.....	.30 4
Astro-Theological Lectures, by Rev Robert Taylor.....	2.00 13
A Kiss for a Blow, a book for chil- dren, by H. C. Wright. Small Edition.....	.60 6
Large Edition.....	1.50 8
An Eye-opener, by Zepa. Paper Covers.....	.50 4
Bible in the Balance, by J. G. Fish. Blakeman's 200 Riddles.....	1.50 8 .20
Bible in India.....	2.00 10
Beliefs of the Unbelievers, by Frothingham.....	.20 2
Better Views of Living, by A. B. Child.....	1.00 6
Brotherhood of Man, and what Follows from It.....	.25
Book on the Microscope.....	.75
Book of Religions, by J. Hayward.....	2.00
Bible Chronology, by M. B. Craven.....	.10 2
Bailey's Festus.....	1.25
Buechner's Man. English Edition Boccaccio's Decameron.....	4.00 1.50
Bradlaugh's Is there a God?.....	.05
Buddhist Nihilism, by Max Muller.....	.10
Buechner's Materialism.....	.25
By-and-By, by E. Maitland.....	1.75
Buechner's Force and Matter.....	3.00
Bastian's Modes of Origin.....	1.25
Beginnings of Life, by Bastian.....	5.00
Buckle's History of Civilization.....	6.00
Birds and Reptiles, by Figuier.....	4.00
Body and Mind, by Maudsley.....	2.00
Babbitt's Health Guide.....	1.00 5
Burroughs' Notes on Walt Whitman Correlation of Forces, by Youmans.....	1.00 2.00
Cooper on the Soul.....	.90
Clodd's Childhood of the World.....	.50
Cranial Affinities of Man and the Ape, by Professor R. Virchow, of Berlin.....	.25
Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences Confucius and Chinese Classics.....	2.00 2.00
Confucius' Life and Teachings, by Legge.....	4.00
Child's Book of Religion, by Froth- ingham.....	1.00
Confessions of an Inquirer, by J. J. Jarvis. Very interesting.....	1.50
Curious Myths of the Middle Ages, by S. B. Gould.....	2.50
Clergy a Source of Danger, by Jamison.....	1.75
Christianity before Christ, by M. B. Craven.....	.25 2
Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in all Ages and Na- tions, by Wm. R. Alger.....	3.50 25
Contrast, Evangelism and Spiritu- alism Compared, by Moses Hull.....	1.50 8
Criticism on the Apostle Paul, in Defence of Woman's Rights, etc., by M. B. Craven.....	.25
Conjugal Sins against the Laws of Life and Health, by A. K. Gar- ner, A. M., M. D.....	1.50 8
Constitution of Man, by George Combe.....	1.75 8
Common-sense Thoughts on the Bible, by Wm. Denton.....	.10 2
Common Sense, by Thomas Paine Christ Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle.....	.20 2 1.00
Christ and the People, by A. B. Child, M. D.....	1.00 12
Christianity and Materialism Con- trasted, by B. F. Underwood.....	.15 2
Christian Amendment, by Abbot.....	.10
Christianity no Finality; or, Spiritu- alism Superior to Christianity, by Wm. Denton.....	.10 2
Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity, by B. M. Craven.....	1.00 8
Chapters from the Bible of the Ages, by G. B. Stebbins, Detroit, Mich., 400 pages, tinted paper.....	1.50 12
Christian Propagandism, by Abbot Claims of Spiritualism, embracing the Experience of an Investigator, by a Medical Man.....	.10 1 .25 2
Compulsory Education, by Abbot.....	.5 1
Christianity, by S. B. Gould.....	2.00
Dictionary (Webster's unabridged) Pocket, flexible cover.....	12.00 ex 1.00 10
Descent of Man, by Darwin, 2 vols. ($2 per vol.).....	4.00 24
Devil's Pulpit, by Robert Taylor.....	2.00 10
Deluge, by Wm. Denton.....	.10 2

Dawn, a Novel of intense interest. Death and the After-life, by A. J. Davis.....	1.75 12 .75 6
Debatable Land, by the Hon. R. D. Owen.....	2.00
Dr. Bartol's new book, the Rising Faith.....	2.00
Eating For Strength.....	1.00
Essay on Man, by Pope, cloth, gilt.....	1.00 4
Early Social Life of Man.....	.25 2
Errors of the Bible, demonstrated by the Truths of Nature, by Hen- ry C. Wright, paper.....	.25 4 2.00
English Life of Jesus, by Scott.....	2.00
Enigmas of Life, by Gregg.....	2.00
Exeter Hall, a Theological Ro- mance, paper.....	.60 5
Empire of the Mother over the Character and Destiny of the Race, by H. C. Wright.....	.50 4
Elective Affinities, by Goethe.....	1.25 8
Electrical Psychology, by Dods.....	1.50 8
Epidemic Delusions, Dr. Marvin.....	.25
Fear of the Living God, by Froth- ingham.....	.05 1
Footfalls on the Boundary of An- other World, by Robert Dale Owen.....	1.75 13
Free Thoughts concerning Religi- on; or Nature vs. Theology, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	.50 2
Faithful Guardian, an Inspira- l Story, by J. Wm. Van Namee.....	1.50 8
Fountain, by A. J. Davis.....	1.00 6
Fugitive Wife, by Warren Chase.....	.35 4
God in the Constitution, by Brad- ford.....	.10 1
Good Sense, by Baron D'Holbach.....	1.00
Gates Ajar, by Miss E. S. Phelps.....	1.50 8
Gates Wide Open, by Geo. Wood.....	1.50 10
Gist of Spiritualism, by Warren Chase.....	.50 4
Gospel of Good and Evil, by Sil- ver.....	1.50 10
Great Harmony, by A. J. Davis, 5 vols., viz. Vol. I, The Physician; Vol. II, The Teacher; Vol. III, The Seer; Vol. IV, The Reformer Vol. V, The Thinker, each.....	1.50 9 1.25 8
God Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle.....	1.25 8
Gibbon's History of Rome, 6 vols., sheep.....	10.00 ex
Geology of the Stars, by Winchell.....	.15
Genesis and Ethics of Conjugal Love, by A. J. Davis. 142 pp.....	.50
Greg's Creed of Christendom.....	2.50
Harbinger of Health, by Andrew J. Davis.....	1.50 10
Harmonial Man; or Thoughts for the Age.....	.50 4
History and Philosophy of Evil, paper.....	.50 3
Hayward's Book of all Religions. Helen Harlow's Vow, by Lois Waisbrooker.....	1.75 12 1.50 10
How to Bathe, by E. P. Miller, M. D., paper.....	.30 4
Hedged in, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.....	1.50 8
History of the Intellectual Devel- opment of Europe, by J. W. Dra- per, M. D., LL. D.....	5.00 30
History of the Conflict between Science and Religion. Draper.....	1.75
Human Physiology, Statistical and Dynamical; or, The Conditions and Course of Life of Man, by J. W. Draper, M. D., LL. D. 650 pp., cloth.....	5.00 30
Hobbes' Works. 16 Vols., Royal 8vo.....	25.00
History of European Morals, by Lecky.....	6.00
History of Rationalism in Europe, by Lecky.....	4.00
Higher Law, by Maitland.....	1.75
Hegel's Philosophy of History.....	2.00
Half-hours with Modern Scientists, cloth, 12mo., reduced to.....	1.50
History of American Socialism, by J. H. Noyes.....	3.00
Historic Americans, by Parker.....	1.50
His Marriage Vow, by Mrs. Cor- bin.....	1.50
Injurious Influences of Schools.....	.25
Influence of Christianity on Civil- ization by B. F. Underwood.....	.25
Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays, by Francis W. New- man and F. E. Abbot.....	.10
Is the Bible Divine? by S. J. Phin- ney, paper.....	.35
Is there a Devil? The argument pro and con.....	.25 2
Incidents in my Life, first series, by Cooper.....	1.00 8
Is it the Despair of Science? by W. D. Gunning.....	.15 2
Impressible Conflict and the Unity of God, by Emma Hardinge and T. G. Forster.....	.25 2
Ingersoll's Gods and other lec- tures, neatly bound.....	2.00 15
Is Spiritualism True? by William Denton.....	.15 2
Irreconcilable Records of Genesis and Genealogy, by Wm. Denton, paper.....	.25 4
Incidents of Life, second series Home.....	1.50
Junius Unmasked; or, Thomas Paine the author of the Letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence.....	1.50 8
Jehovah Unveiled; or, the Charac- ter of the Jewish Deity Delineat- ed.....	.35 4
Joan of Arc, a biography.....	1.00 6
Kant's Critique of Pure Reason.....	2.00
King David and his Times.....	1.50 10
Key to Political Science, by John Senff.....	1.25
Koran, with explanatory notes, by George Sale, 8vo., 670 pp. Best edition yet published.....	2.75 20
Law of Marriage, by C. L. James.....	.25 2
Looking Beyond, by Barrett.....	.75 6
Life Line of the Lone One, by Warren Chase.....	1.00 1

Life of Thomas Paine, with criti- cal and explanatory observations of his writings, by G. Vale.....	1.00- 8 1.75 10
Life of Jesus, by Renan.....	1.50 8
Love and its Hidden History, by P. B. Randolph.....	1.50 8
Legalized Prostitution, or Mar- riage as it is and as it should be, by C. S. Woodruff, M. D.....	1.00 8
Letters to Elder Miles Grant, by Moses Hull.....	.25 2
Living Present-Dead Past, by H. C. Wright.....	.50 4
Les Miserables, by Victor Hugo.....	2.50
Library of Mesmerism, by Wells.....	4.00
Love, from Michelet.....	1.50
Life of Fourier, by Shaw.....	1.50
Life of Parker, by Weiss, 2 Vols.....	6.00
Lessons for Children about Them- selves, by A. E. Newton, cloth.....	.50
Lectures on the Bible, by Voysey.....	.10 1
Modern Thinker, Nos. 1 and 2, each.....	1.00
Mental Medicine, by Evans.....	1.25 7
Ministry of Angels Realized, by A. E. Newton.....	.20 2
Manual for Children (for Lyce- ums), by A. J. Davis, cloth.....	.70 8
My Affinity, and other Stories, by Lizzie Doten.....	1.50 10
Mediumship, its Laws and Condi- tions, with brief instructions for the formation of Spirit Circles, by J. H. Powell.....	.25
Moravia, Eleven Days at, by T. R. Hazard.....	.10
Married Woman; Biographies of Good Wives, by L. Maria Child.....	1.25 8
Modern American Spiritualism, 1848-1868, by Emma Hardinge.....	2.75 16
Moral Physiology, by R. D. Owen.....	.65
Myths and Myth-makers, by John Fiske.....	2.00
Mystery of Matter, by Picton.....	3.50
Morning Lectures (twenty dis- courses), by A. J. Davis.....	1.50 9
Mediums and Mediumship, by T. R. Hazard.....	.10
Mental Cure.....	1.50 9
Martyrdom of Man, by Reade.....	3.00
Man in the Past, Present, and Fu- ture, by Dr. L. Buechner, elegant English Edition.....	4.00 2.50
Mill's Autobiography.....	2.50
Masculine Cross, or Sex Worship, illustrated, paper, 50c., cloth.....	1.00
New Physiognomy, by Wells, gilt.....	5.00
Nebulae, Meteoric Showers and Comets.....	.25
Nature's Laws in Human Life; an Exposition of Spiritualism.....	1.50 10
New Testament Miracles and Mod- ern Miracles.....	.60 4
Nature's Divine Revelations, by A. J. Davis.....	3.50 24
Night Side of Nature, by Crowe.....	1.25 10
Oriental Religions, by Johnson.....	5.00
Origin and Development of Reli- gious Belief, Heathenism and Mosaism, by S. B. Gould.....	2.00
Old Theology Turned Upside Down, by T. B. Taylor, A. M., pa- per.....	.75
On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. Newman.....	.10 2
Orthodoxy False since Spiritual- ism is True, by Wm. Denton.....	.10 2
Origin of Species, by Darwin.....	2.00 12
Origin of Civilization and Primi- tive Condition of Man, by Sir J. Lubbock.....	3.00 17
One Religion, Many Creeds, by Winans.....	1.50 16
Papa's Own Girl, Marie Howland, Pilgrim and Shrine, by Maitland.....	1.75 13 1.50
Paine's Political Works, 2 Vols., of about 500 pages each.....	5.00 50
Philosophical Dictionary by Vol- taire.....	5.00 30
Persons and Events, by A. J. Da- vis.....	1.50 9
Planchett—the Despair of Science, by Epes Sargent.....	1.25 8
Penetralia, by A. J. Davis.....	1.75 12
Philosophy of Spiritual Inter- course, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	.60
Positive Primer, being a series of familiar conversations on the Religion of Humanity. Reduced price.....	.75
Plato's Phædo on Immortality.....	1.25
Plato's Divine and Moral Works.....	2.00
Plutarch's Morals, 5 Vols.....	15.00
Prosimos's Religious Experience, by R. D. Owen.....	.05
Poems from the Inner Life, by Lizzie Doten.....	1.50 10
Philosophy of Creation, by Thos. Paine, through Horace Wood, medium, paper.....	.35 4
Poems of Progress, by Lizzie Do- ten.....	1.50 10
Parturition without Pain, by M. L. Holbrook, M. D.....	1.00
Pentateuch—Abstract of Colenso.....	.25 2
Progress of Religious Ideas through Successive Ages, by L. Maria Child, 3 Vols.....	6.75 36
Physical Man, his Origin and An- tiquity, by Hudson Tuttle.....	1.50 10
Plain Home Talk and Medical Com- mon Sense, by E. B. Foot, M. D. 1000 pp., 200 illustrations. Price, with a fine chromo.....	3.25 1.00
Question of Hell, by a Puritan.....	1.50 8
Radical Discourses, by Denton.....	1.50 8
Ravalette, and the Rosicrucian's Story, 2 Vols. in one, by P. B. Ran- dolph.....	1.50 8
Radical Rhymes, by William Den- ton.....	1.25 6
Rabelais' Works, 2 Vols.....	3.00
Religion of Humanity, by Froth- ingham.....	1.50
Religion of Inhumanity, by Harri- son.....	.20
Religious Ideas and Beliefs, origin and development of, by Morris Einstein.....	1.50 13
Religious Demands of the Age, by Miss Frances Power Cobb. 12mo., paper.....	.50

Radical Problems, by Bartol.....	2.00
Strauss' The Old Faith and the New, preceded by the author's Prefatory Postscript. 12mo.....	2.00
Songs of the Sun-lands, by Miller.....	1.50
Supernatural, History of the, by Wm. Howitt, 2 Vols.....	3.00 20
Spirit Works; Real, but not Mirac- ulous, by Allen Putnam.....	.35 3
Soul Affinity, by A. B. Child.....	.30 2
Satan, Biography of, by A. K. Graves.....	.60 3
Sermon from Shakespeare's Text, by Denton.....	.10 2
Sacred Gospels of Arabula, by A. J. Davis, cloth.....	.60 19
Sunday not the Sabbath.....	.25 2
Sexual Physiology, by R. T. Trall, M. D.....	2.00
Self-Abnegationists; or, The True King and Queen.....	.50
Soul of Things, by Elizabeth and Wm. Denton.....	1.50
Social Evils, by Mrs. M. M. King.....	.25
Spiritual Philosophy vs. Diabol- ism, by Mrs. King.....	.25
Spiritual Delusions, by D. D. Lum.....	1.50
Strauss' Life of Jesus. Very rare. Science of Thought, by Prof. C. C. Everett.....	12.00 2.00
Secret History of the French Court.....	1.25
Sartor Resartus, by Carlyle.....	.75
Songs of Life, by S. W. Tucker.....	.20 2
Science of Evil, by Joel Moody.....	1.75 10
Spirit Manifestations, by Rymer.....	.10 2
Syntagma. Taylor.....	1.00 6
System of Nature; D'Holbach.....	3.00 24
Startling Ghost Stories, from au- thentic sources.....	.50 4
Self-Contradictions of the Bible.....	.25 2
Sefena; or, The Mental Constitu- tion, by Merton.....	1.00
Science of Knowledge, by Fichte.....	3.00
Science of Rights, by Fichte.....	2.00
Strange Discoveries respecting the Aurora and recent Solar Re- searches, by Richard A. Proctor. F. R. A. S.....	.25 .25
Spectrum Analysis Explained.....	.25
Spectrum Analysis Discoveries, Symbolism, Ancient Pagan and Modern Christian, exposed and explained, 16 plates, 172 cuts.....	3.00
Safest Creed and other Subjects, by O. B. Frothingham.....	1.50 19
Startling Disclosures in Spiritu- alism, by N. B. Wolfe.....	1.50 13
The Truth about Love.....	1.50
The Past and Future of our Planet, by Wm. Denton.....	1.50
Transformations of Insects, by P. H. Duncan, F. R. S. elegant il- lustrated, Extra gilted.....	7.50
The Sun, by Guillemin, illustrat- ed.....	1.50
Treatise on the Intellectual, Moral and Social Man, a valuable work, by H. Powell.....	1.25
Tale of a Physician, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	.75 5
The Heathens of the Heath; a Thrilling, Radical Romance, by Wm. McDonnell, Esq., author of "Exeter Hall," &c. 500 pages. 12mo. Paper covers, $1; in cloth, neatly bound.....	1.50 1.50
The Essence of Religion, by Feu- erbach.....	.50 3
The Relation of Witchcraft to Re- ligion.....	.15
The Essence of Christianity.....	3.00
The Patriarchs, by Frothingham.....	1.00
The Parables, by Frothingham.....	1.00
Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius.....	1.00
Tyndall's Fragments of Science.....	2.00
Tyndall's Light and Electricity.....	1.25
Tyndall's Great Inaugural Speech Tyndall's Forms of Water.....	.25 1.50
Tyndall's Heat as a Mode of Mo- tion.....	2.00
Tyndall On Sound.....	2.00
Tyndall On Radiation.....	.50
Tyndall's Six Lectures on Light. The Safest Creed, and twelve other discourses, by O. B. Frothingham The God of Science, by Abbot.....	1.00 1.50 .10 1
The Present Heaven, by Frothing- ham.....	.05 1
The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury Truths for the Times, by Abbot.....	.10 1 .10 1
The Inner Mystery, an inspira- tional Poem by Lizzie Doten.....	.20 2
The Voices, by Warren Sumner Barlow.....	1.25 10
Theological and Miscellaneous Writings of Thomas Paine.....	2.50 12
Thomas Paine's Pilgrimage to the Spirit World.....	.75 6
Tobacco and its Effects, by H. Gib- bons, M. D.....	.20 2
The Temple; or, Diseases of the Brain and Nerves, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	1.00 8
To-morrow of Death, by Figuier.....	1.75 7
Three Plans of Salvation.....	.10 2
The Hereafter, by Hull. Paper.....	.55 4
Testament, New, shown in its true light, by J. P. Whipple.....	.50 2
Universology Basic Outline of, by Stephen Pearl Andrews.....	5.00 39
Unwelcome Child, by Henry C. Wright. Paper.....	.30 4
Unconscious Action of the Brain, Unity of Natural Phenomena, by Sagey.....	.25 1.50
Voices of Prayer, by Barlow.....	.25 2
Vestiges of Creation.....	.75 8
Volney's Researches in Ancient History. Very rare.....	1.50
Volney's Ruins.....	1.00 6
Vivid Truths, by A. B. Church.....	.50 2

All books not mentioned in this list to be had in this city will be sent postpaid, at the Publishers' prices. Address,

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

A Grand Combination! RARE OFFERS!$10.00 for $4.00.

We offer a sample of

The Ladies' Own Magazine,

a sample of its premium Chromo, and choice of the following popular books, all for 50 cents: Victor Hugo's BELLINGER OF NOTRE DAME, Goldsmith's VICAR OF WAKEFIELD, Lamb's ES-SAYS, Defoe's ROBINSON CRUSOE, Gerald Griffin's COLLEEN BAWN. OBJECT, to introduce our superb Magazine and get agents for it. It is the best LITERARY, HOUSEHOLD and FASHION Monthly published. SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED. Bound in ILLUMINATED COVERS. Over 40 first-class writers. ROMANCE, BIOGRAPHY, HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY, POETRY, PHILOSOPHY, HEALTH, SCIENCE, FASHION.

$2.00 A YEAR, postpaid, with a sample of its premium Chromo, in 16 Oil Colors. LARGE CASH PAY, or Splendid Premiums for Clubs.

AGENTS make $50 a week. Now is the time to Subscribe, and make up Clubs.

T. A. BLAND, Publisher,
11 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK.

Has great MAGNIFYING power, used for detecting Counterfeit Money, Shoddy in cloth foreign substances in the Eye, in wounds, etc., and to examine Insects, Flowers and Plants, to detect flaws in Metals, fineness of wood-grain; to decipher writing otherwise illegible; and for the inspection of grain, minerals, etc. Useful for everybody. Double Convex Lens, 1 1/2 inches in diameter. Mounted in Leather, and carried in the vest pocket. Price 60 cents, two for $1, free by mail. Agents Wanted. Illustrated circulars and terms free. Address

M. L. BYRN,

P. O. Box 4,669, New York. Office, No. 49 Nassau Street.

BEST AND CHEAPESTSEEDS*In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free. R. H. SHUMWAY, Rockford, Ill. till Apr. 15.

No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Freethought and Miscellaneous Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty. Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole,
6ts Bronson, Mich.

Eating For Strength.A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'SHISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN*Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Sexual Physiology.BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. With eighty fine engravings. AGENTS WANTED.

SYNOPSIS OF TABLE OF CONTENTS.

The Male Organs of Generation.
The Female Organs of Generation.
The Origin of Life.
Sexual Generation.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Impregnation.
Pregnancy.
Embryology.
Parturition.
Lactation.
The Law of Sex.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Theory of Population.
The Law of Sexual Intercourse.
Hereditary Transmission.
Philosophy of Marriage.

This work has rapidly passed through twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Prof. Wilder, of Cornell University, says it is the best work of its kind published.

Price, by mail, $2.00. Sold by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Parturition without Pain.EDITED BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.Editor of the *Herald of Health.CONTENTS:

1. Healthfulness of Child-Bearing.
2. Dangers of Preventions.
3. Medical Opinions as to escaping Pain.
4. Preparation for Maternity.
5. Exercise during Pregnancy.
6. The Sitz Bathing and Bathing generally.
7. What Food to Eat and what to Avoid.
8. The Mind during Pregnancy.
9. The Ailments of Pregnancy and their Remedies.
10. Female Physicians, Anæsthetics.

To which are added:

1. The Husband's Duty to his Wife.
2. Best Age for Rearing Children.
3. Shall sickly people become Parents?
4. Small Families.
5. Importance of Physiological Adaptation of Husband and Wife.
6. Celibacy.
7. Effects of Tobacco on Offspring.
8. Latest Discoveries as to the determining sex of Offspring.
9. Father's vs. Mother's Influence on the Child.
10. Shall Pregnant Women Work?
11. Effects of Intellectual Activity on number of Offspring.
12. Size of Pelvis, and its relation to healthful Parturition, etc., etc.

What is said about "Parturition without Pain."

Godley's Lady's Book says: "We give our cordial approbation to this work, and would like to see it in the hands of every mother in the land. The information it contains is most important, and, we are fully convinced, reliable."

Price, by mail, $1.00. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

D. M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED, DESCRIPTIVE AND PRICED SEED ANNUAL
1875. Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.
Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

"Common Sense."A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.*A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM. SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE. ETC., ETC.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors.

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions.

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per Annum, Post-paid. Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,
236 Montgomery St.,
San Francisco, Cal.

500,000 Freethinkers WANTED

To subscribe for the second volume of
THE LYCEUM.

A Monthly Illustrated Liberal Paper for the Young, designed to teach them "Religion without Superstition." Its writers are amongst the ablest in the Liberal ranks, and, as it occupies an exclusive field—the education of the young in the principles of Freethought—it appeals to every liberal and non-church member for support.

The publisher, determined to offer every possible inducement to subscribe, makes the following very liberal

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Two dozen steel pens, or the excellent little book, "Stories for Our Children," and THE LYCEUM three months for twenty-five cents and a 3 cent stamp for postage.

Two dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or four dozen steel pens and THE LYCEUM six months for fifty cts. and two 3 cent stamps for postage.

For seventy-five cents THE LYCEUM will be sent one year and "One pack of Arithmetical Cards and Games," or four dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or "The Lyceum Stage."

For one dollar THE LYCEUM will be sent one year, with one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games and four dozen steel pens; or one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games," and the "Stories for our Children," and two dozen steel pens.

When requested we will substitute other books of equal value for any of the above.

The above liberal rates are made to secure the patronage of every one not in sympathy with the churches. Please forward the amount of at least one subscription to

P. H. BATESON,

Publisher of THE LYCEUM,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

These Advertising Contracts can be made

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE FOR 1875,
THE HERALD OF HEALTH FOR 1875,
THE TRUTH SEEKER FOR 1875.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE, in one volume of over 1000 pages and 36 illustrations, and that charming Chromo.

"JUST ONE,"

all sent, post-paid, for only Four Dollars.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

Scottish Western Loan Co.,G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,*Bankers,*Le Roy, Minnesota,

BRANCH OFFICE, 332 East 13th St., N. Y.

MONEY INVESTEDIN FIRST MORTGAGES*On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner.

10 per cent. paid on receipt of money at the Bank, or in New York until invested.

For full particulars, send for Circular.

To Jan. 1, 1875.

SPIRITUALISM.

The recent extraordinary attention the subject is attracting, and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless, and widely-circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

Religio-Philosophical Journal

3 MONTHS for 30 CENTS.

POSTAGE FREE AFTER JANUARY 1st.

The JOURNAL is a large 8-page weekly paper, regular price $3 per year, now in its Ninth Year. Address S. S. JONES, EDITOR, 180 E. Adam St., Chicago.

N. B.—State where you saw this advertisement.

J. M. FOLLETT.E. B. HILL.*SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid:

Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz.
Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz.
All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL,Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles, Oils, etc., etc.,

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.A Valuable Home Book for Women.*Talks to my Patients*HINTS ON GETTING WELL AND KEEPING WELL.BY MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.*Table of Contents:

Growing Girls; Menstruation; Amenorrhoea; Menorrhagia; Dysmenorrhoea; Prolapsus Uteri; Leucorrhoea; Pregnancy; Approaching Confinement; Delivery; After Delivery; Care of the Breasts; After Confinement; Bathing of Babies; Dress of Infants; Nursing; Weaning; Feeding of Infants; Infantile Diseases; Diseases of Children; Children's Dress; Confidential to Mothers; Intentional Abortion; Accidental Abortion; Sterility; Nervous Derangements; Sleep; Indigestion; Constipation; Menopause, or Change of Life.

It is a most Valuable Work, and should be in the hands of every Lady.

Price, $1.50 by mail. Sold by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Odds and Ends.

WHAT comes once in a minute, twice in a moment, and once in a man's life? The letter M.

A DARKEY arrested with chickens in his sack, declared, "De man dat put 'em dar was no fren' of mine."

"THE one thing needful for the perfect enjoyment of love is confidence." Same with hash and sausages.

WHAT is the difference between fixed stars and shooting stars? The first are "suns," the second, "darters."

"C-C-C-CAN that p-p-parrot talk?" asked a stuttering man of a German. "Ven he don't talk so gooter as you, I schop, by dam, his head off."

"JOHNNY, what do you expect to do for a living when you get to be a man?" "Well, I reckon I'll get married, and board with my wife's father."

A MERCHANT not over conversant with geography, on hearing that one of his vessels was in jeopardy, exclaimed, 'jeopardy, jeopardy,' where's that?"

SALLIE MORRIS, a pretty Newark girl, is a "mind reader." She said to a bashful beau the other night, "La! I believe you are going to kiss." She was right.

A WAG, in "what he knows about farming," gives a very good plan to remove widow's weeds. He says a good looking man has only to say "wilt thou," and they wilt.

"I AM a son of Mars," proudly exclaimed a West Point cadet at an evening party. "Does your ma know you're out?" asked a young lady to whom he had just been introduced.

"I AM afraid, my dear, that while I am gone absence will conquer love." "Oh, you needn't fear for me," said his wife, "the longer you shall stay away the better I shall like you."

A MINISTER, who came into church during a sudden shower, requested another to preach for him, as he was very wet. "No," said the other, "preach yourself; you will be dry enough in the pulpit."

AN experienced Sunday-school teacher says that it is impossible for a scholar with a boil, to satisfactorily fasten his mind down even upon the simplest exposition of the scheme of salvation.

A YOUNG gentleman remarked to his companion, "Ah, the most beautiful evening in my recollection. Luna looks peculiarly beautiful." "Was that her just went by?" quickly asked the lady.

"FOAH God, he's a niggah," exclaimed an old black man in the crowd as King Kalakaua alighted from the cars at Washington. "And now who will be able to live with the 'cullud folks' at the Capitol?"

"WHAT is fashion, Annie?" "Fashion is something that causes Betsey, who goes bareheaded all the week, when the sun is shining, to wear gloves and carry a parasol on Sunday, when it is cloudy."

A GENTLEMAN was examining an umbrella, and commenting upon the fine quality. "Yes," said a person present, "he fancies everything he sees." "And," added a third party, "is inclined to seize every thing he fancies."

A FEMALE lady in Washington advertised that her infant child, whose father was a Congressman, was ill, and that if $10 was not at once sent to an assumed address, she would call in person to see its father. The result was thirty-four letters, each enclosing a ten dollar William, without comment.

A DETROIT father purchased a tool-chest for his son, a lad of eight, who seemed to have considerable mechanical genius. Up to latest accounts the boy had sawed off but two table legs, six knobs from the bureau, bored seven holes through the doors, and three through the piano case, and by the aid of the glue pot stuck the family supply of napkins firmly to the parlor carpet.

WHILE on her way to leap into the river, a Minneapolis girl met a man, who proposed marriage, and she turned back and was happy. Almost any day now one can count four or five Minneapolis girls wandering along the river banks.

JUDGE JEFFRIES when on the bench, told an old fellow with a long beard that he supposed he had a conscience as long as his beard. "Does your lordship," replied the old man, "measure consciences by beards? If so, your lordship has none at all."

"STEP in," said a cheap clothier to a countryman; "the cheapest goods in the market." "Have you any fine shirts?" "A splendid assortment, sir." "Are they clean?" "Of course, sir—clean, to be sure." "Then," said the countryman gravely, "you had better put one on."

A FRENCHMAN, exhibiting some sacred relics and other curiosities, produced a sword which he assured his visitor was "de sword that Balaam had wen he would kill de ass." A spectator remarked that Balaam had no sword, but only wished for one. "Ver well! dis is de one he wish for."

"JACOB KISSED RACHEL."—The following are the "Opinions of the English Press" upon the subject of the text which tells you that Jacob kissed Rachel and lifted up his voice and wept:

Because there was no time for another.—Express.

He thought she might have a big brother.—Sporting Chronicle.

He wept for joy because it tasted so good.—Jewish Chronicle.

He wept because there was only one Rachel to kiss.—Clerkenwell News.

The fellow wept because the girl did not kiss him.—Pall Mall Gazette.

A mistake—not his eyes but his mouth watered.—Ladies' Chronicle.

Jacob wept because Rachel threatened to tell her mamma.—Sunday Gazette.

How do you know but that she slapped his face for him?—Ladies' Treasury.

We reckon Jacob cried because Rachel had been eating onions.—British Standard.

He thought it was a fast color, but wept to find the paint came off.—Fine Art Gazette.

He remembered he was her uncle, and recollected what the prayer book says.—Church Journal.

He knew there was a time to weep—it had come, and he dare not put it off.—Methodist News.

He was a fool and did not know what was good for him.—Englishwoman's Advertiser.

He tried to impose on her feelings because he wanted her to lend him five shillings.—Baptist Guide.

When he lifted up his voice he found it was heavy, and could not get it so high as he expected.—Musical Notes.

The cause of Jacob's weeping was the refusal of Rachel to allow him to kiss her again.—Nonconformist.

It is our opinion that Jacob had not kissed Rachel before, and we wept for the time he had lost.—City Press.

Jacob wept because Rachel told him "to do it twice more," and he was afraid to.—Methodist Recorder.

If Rachel was a pretty girl, and kept her face clean, we can't see what Jacob had to cry about.—Daily Telegraph.

Our own opinion is, that Jacob wept because he found after all "it was not what it was cracked up to be."—New Zealand Examiner.

Weeping is not unfrequently produced by extreme pleasure, joy and happiness; it may have been so in Jacob's case.—Hardwick's Science Gossip.

A truce to all! Beneath the starry vault or golden sun is there aught in nature or in art equal to the rapture and intense deliciousness of the first kiss? I answer verily, no. Jacob had never kissed first maiden before, and the first realizations of "crowding a life's deliciousness in these moments," overcame him, and he wept for joy.—Hornsey Hornet.

G. L. Henderson & Co.,

BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Will on receipt of P. O. Order, Draft, or Registered Letter for any amount, send goods as per following list to any address in the United States.

Care must be had to send Accurate Measurements and description of Goods wanted, as no article can be returned except for defect in the goods, which are warranted to be as represented. We have arrangements with the manufacturer to furnish us out of their entire stock which is equal to custom made, and at lower prices than is usually charged for very much inferior goods.

Grey Union Sack Overcoats, Wool Lining,	$5 50 to $6 50
Black Union Sack Overcoats, Wool and Italian Lining,	8 00 to 10 00
Blue Chinchilla ditto,	9 00 to 11 00
Mixed Fur Beaver Overcoat, Italian Lining,	14 00 to 16 00
Velvet Binding ditto,	13 00 to 15 00
Worsted ditto,	19 00
Blue, Dahlia, Brown and Olive Heavy Beaver,	16 00 to 21 00
Grey Reefing Jackets, Wool Lining,	3 50 to 4 75
Black and Grey Union Sack Coats, wool lining, quilted, extra long,	4 75 to 7 00
Black All Wool Cloth Sack Coats,	8 00 to 9 50
Black Union Cloth Frock Coats,	6 50 to 8 50
Black All Wool ditto,	8 50 to 15 50
Black Union Cloth Pants,	3 00 to 4 50
Black all wool Doeskin ditto,	5 00 to 7 00
Black Union Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 2 50
Black All Wool ditto,	2 50 to 4 00
Union Cassimere Sack Coats,	4 00 to 5 50
All Wool ditto,	6 00 to 8 00
Walking	6 50 to 8 75
Union Cassimere Suits, Sack and Walking Coats,	7 00 to 10 00
All Wool Cassimere Suits,	13 00 to 17 00
Union Cassimere Pants,	2 00 to 4 00
All Wool ditto,	5 00 to 7 00
Union Cassimere Pants and Vest,	7 00 to 9 00

Our Overcoats and long Sack Coats are quilted all through and superior in make to any other house in our business.

Measurements for clothing should include length of limbs, circumference of body over chest and stomach.

ORDERS FOR GROCERIES

Will be promptly filled at wholesale prices, adding 5 per cent. on sums over $20 and 10 per cent. on sums less than $20. We can supply Ground Spices, Sugars of all grades, Syrups, Dried Fruits, Raisins, Currants, Citrons, Prunes, Figs, Peaches, and all kinds of canned fruits at lowest prices.

COFFEE.

Green, No. 1, 35 cts., No. 2, 30 cts.
Roasted, No. 1, 37 cts., No. 2, 33 cts.

TEAS.

Oolong, 25 to 60 cents per pound.
Japan, 45 to 95 " "
Young Hyson, 35 to 1.15 " "
Imperial, 40 to 90 " "
Twa Kay, 25 to 40 " "
Eng. Breakfast, 40 to 90 " "

All Orders for Millinery

And DRESS GOODS for Ladies' wear will be carefully filled by NELLIE HENDERSON, who will give this department special attention.

We will issue soon a more extended Price List, including many additional branches of business, with full particulars of our New Enterprise.

THE GODS, And Other Lectures.

BY COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

A new edition, containing "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies," all newly revised and corrected by the author. The volume is handsomely printed, on tinted paper, and elegantly bound.

Among all the works from the Liberal Press, in force, clearness, and incisiveness none equal these admirable lectures. The work ought to be in the library of every Liberal and every skeptic, and every enquirer. Price $2; postage 20 cents. For sale, wholesale and retail, by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Science in Story,

A NOVELTY IN LITERATURE.

EDUCATION AND ROMANCE BLENDED

Adapted to Children and Youth.

Imparts more valuable information than any other book.

SAMMY TUBBS, The Boy Doctor,

AND

SPONSIE, the Troublesome Monkey.

BY E. B. FOOHE, M.D.,

Author of "Plain Home Talk," "Medical Common Sense," etc.

The entire series comprises five volumes, though the first four are perfect in themselves, and may be purchased with or without the fifth. Each volume contains over sixty illustrations, and is neatly bound in uniform style.

SAMMY TUBBS is an intelligent colored boy, who becomes a Doctor. SPONSIE is a very mischievous and interesting monkey. The story is so blended with physiological and anatomical science, as to make it not only interesting to the young mind, but very instructive.

The work is giving extraordinary satisfaction wherever introduced.

Sent by mail, post-paid, for $1 per Vol.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

For Children and Youth.

Amusement and Instruction.

BLAKE MAN'S

TWO HUNDRED

Poetical Riddles,

ON A GREAT VARIETY OF SUBJECTS.

INTERESTING AND NEW!

PUBLISHED BY

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sent postpaid on receipt of Price—20 cents.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE

Heathens of the Heath,

A ROMANCE,

Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH

PRIESTCRAFT, THE MISSION-

ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shown up.

A perusal of it will open

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your

Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will Regret the Investment.

It contains nearly 450 pages. 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper, and gotten up in excellent style. Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00

In Cloth, neatly bound.....1.50

Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,

335 BROADWAY,

New York.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION, FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 11. { D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. } NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 1, 1875. { 335 BROADWAY, SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker,

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

THE REV. WILLIAM M. PARRY, pastor of the Tabernacle Church of Worcester, Mass., was recently unfortunately deprived of his horse by the Sheriff, who took it for debt. It is suggested the pastor's next text be,

"The rich may ride in chaises,
But the poor must walk by Jases."

THE GREAT BEECHER TRIAL, which bids fair to be the longest, the most thoroughly reported and read, of any trial that has ever been known, is still in progress. At this writing over three weeks of the trial have passed. The jury has been selected, the opening speech made and one witness examined. Many other witnesses are to testify, many other elaborate addresses are to be made, and it is probable the blue-birds and martins, the daffodils and tulips will come again before this interminable case is ended. Intense interest is manifested by the crowds who try daily to gain admittance to the court-room. If the room was as large as the Hall of Representatives at Washington, with the Senate Chamber added, it would be "packed and crammed" every day. Hundreds of thousands of the daily papers leave the city every morning for all parts of the country, containing verbatim reports of the trial, to be repeated more or less by the country press, and to be read by millions. Great is Beecher!

THE REVEREND CHICKEN THIEF.—J. W. H. Johnson, mentioned recently, has been tried in the Court of Special Sessions, in Elizabeth, N. J., and found guilty of the charges brought against him. He, of course, as his brothers "of the cloth" do, when charged with criminal conduct, stoutly denied the charge and asserted his innocence. But the proof against him was too positive to be ignored. It was shown conclusively, he had stolen chickens, turkeys and geese. Several fowls found in his possession were identified by their owners. Feathers in abundance were found in his room, and parties were produced to whom he had sold fowls. He claimed he had innocently bought them of another party, but as he could not tell who it was, the court readily pronounced him guilty and he was sentenced to imprisonment. For a while the good man will be kept where the temptation to steal chickens will not again lead him into trouble.

THE PLYMOUTH PASTOR very blandly imparted to one of his Friday evening audiences, that his mind goes out in love to everybody—in short that he is sweet upon his enemies and sweet upon all mankind. No doubt the man has been sweet upon many occasions, and if he had been less so to certain individuals he would not now be under the necessity of being arraigned before a court of justice. Sweetness may all be very well in bounds of discretion and moderation, but if a man has too much of it, with deficient principle and caution, we see it leads him into grievous troubles. Possibly if he had not been so sweet on Elizabeth, he would now feel sweeter on Theodore and Francis D. Verily, such men as overflow with sweetness should also aim to keep it well directed and if they must sometimes give it full vent they should try and arrange their little plans so discreetly that there will be none of these troublesome "after-claps." Henry Ward, let us hope, will learn by what he suffers.

ANOTHER CLERGYMAN IN TROUBLE.—Rev. John Hobart a Methodist clergyman, was recently brought before the District Court in Malden, Mass., to answer a complaint made by Mrs. Anna L. Lundleery, charging this reverend gentleman with being the father of her unborn babe. From facts that have been gleaned from the parties, it appears that Hobart hails from the green hills of Vermont, and is at present over sixty years of age. He graduated at Wesleyan Seminary, in Middletown, Ct., as a minister, having preached in Fall River for the space of two years. He served during the war of the Rebellion as chaplain in the Eighth Wisconsin Regiment. At the close of the war he settled down with his family in Framingham, Mass. In April last he removed to the town of Medford, where he resided till July, though not as pastor. Mrs. Lundleery, then a single woman, was hired by the Rev. John, at the former place, to work as a domestic, and performed her household duties in an excellent manner for a year or more. About the first of May, Mr. Lundleery was employed to attend to the outdoor work, and as matters began to develop themselves, the reverend clergyman married the domestic girl to the man servant, performing the ceremony himself. Mr. Lundleery afterward implored his wife to make a complaint against his employer, which has been done. The case has been continued, when further developments will be made.—Sunday Mercury.

IT IS EXTREMELY GRATIFYING that the good Henry Ward Beecher, notwithstanding his hanging so long upon "the ragged edge of remorse and despair;" notwithstanding the thousands of dollars he has been compelled to part with; notwithstanding twenty-five millions of the American people believe him guilty of adultery, falsehood and perjury; notwithstanding his dark deeds and dark sayings are daily repeated in court and daily spread broadcast over the land; notwithstanding himself, his wife and children have to sit day after day and listen to the recital of his deeds that seem enough to make a coal-scuttle blush with shame; notwithstanding all this, and much more, it is truly gratifying he is able to assure his admiring flock that he is the "happiest man alive." What a happy temperament the man must have. How fortunate for him that he is so able to turn all these annoyances, that would worry a common man almost to death, to his complete happiness. He looks to his flock for approval and support. So long as Plymouth Church sustains him, he cares for little else. This they assuredly will do. Many of them have said they would stick to him, though he were proved ever so guilty. Why not? An adulterer and perjurer if he only has "gush," will answer their purpose perfectly well.

INTENSE cold weather has recently prevailed over the whole country, carrying death to man and animals, and great suffering to thousands. In some places the mercury settled to 40 degrees below zero—an additional instance where the "Divine Being," the "Special Providence," the "Beneficent Father," the "Supreme Power," the "Forces of Nature," or whatever it may be called, seems not to be governed by a feeling of compassion to man or brutes. In view of the great suffering that now and at other times exists among the poor, the sick and unfortunate, we see but little evidence of the superintendence of a kind, watchful, over ruling Providence. Wishing not the slightest disrespect to the "powers that be," we have often thought, had we the control of all things, with "power equal to our will," there would be far less suffering in this world than now, and that it would be vastly better and happier. We would not cause pestilence, famine, drouth, floods, sickness, suffering, wretchedness, and lingering death that so generally prevail. If our power and will were supreme, we think we would speak these evils out of existence. Grasshoppers, locusts, chinch bugs, rattlesnakes, copper-heads, vipers, tarantulas, scorpions, mosquitoes, bed-bugs, roaches, flies, fleas, spiders, wood ticks, sand-ticks, diptheria, small-pox, the itch, croup, consumption, fevers, dyspepsia, headache, heartache, and a long train of similar ills, would be rendered obsolete. The mercury should not go down to 40° below in winter, nor 120° above in summer, if we could prevent it,

The "Special Providence" so long believed in, will have to give place to the conception of a "Human Providence" in which the whole human intellect must combine to work out the problem of human benefit and progress.

MR. BEECHER assures his faithful lambs that he has all confidence in God and that God will bring him safely through the troubles he has brought upon Plymouth Church and its pastor. He fully believes the hand of God is in all this business, and that he will so direct the events of the case as to redound to his own glory. We believe in this case, as in thousands of others, vry much is laid to God that he is not guilty of. If Henry and Elizabeth were too "sweet" on each other, and if they were guilty of some "youthful indiscretions," better omitted than performed, we think it hardly the fair thing to lay it to God and say he directed the affair. God may have a great partiality for Henry Ward and Plymouth Church, but we insist it is unfair to hold him responsible for all they may do. Besides, if he pays too much attention to Plymouth Church and the great "sweetness" which abounds in it, is it not barely possible that some other portion of the Universe may be slightly neglected? We expect Plymouth Church and its "sweet" pastor to come in for a large share of "divine favor" and attention; but we protest against their monopolizing the whole of it. Give us a little show, we entreat you.

TASTES DIFFER.—Mrs. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton are day after day paraded in the Brooklyn clerical scandal court room to listen to the sickening details of the case, under the eye-shot and ear-shot of the crowding multitude; while good taste would seem to advise their remaining at home. It is said to be done to produce a theatrical effect upon the jury. It is quite possible the game may be overplayed. The ordeal seems to be wearing on the ladies, and we predict they will tire of it before the trial is ended. The flower display was also a "big thing" for a wintry day. Beecher's admirers bountifully supplied the court-room with magnificent bouquets; but Tilton's friends, not to be outdone in this way, soon sent in larger and more magnificent flowers for his table; so, in the floral contest, as in other features of this remarkable trial victory seemed to perch on the banners of the plaintiff. The flowers, however, were deemed by the court and the legal gentlemen to be in bad taste and out of place, and they have gone to the rear.

FEW WITNESSES have ever been subjected to such a protracted and trying ordeal as F. D. Moulton in the Beecher trial. For ten days he has been under sharp fire and cross-fire. His statements have been clear, coherent and direct. His cross-examination of five days by the most able lawyers, has failed to embarrass him, or cause him to contradict himself. He states emphatically that the Rev. Mr. Beecher, on several occasions, confessed the adultery verbally and in writing, and this is in keeping with Mr. Beecher's numerous letters by his own hand which have been presented in evidence. Mr. Moulton's statements will be corroborated by Mr. Tilton, Mr. Carpenter, Mrs. Moulton, Mrs. Bradshaw and others. To break down this crushing testimony, and to explain away Mr. Beecher's unfortunate letters, will be a hard task for the defense. Plymouth Church, however, is very wealthy. Its members are worth many millions, and they are determined to sustain their pastor, whether innocent or guilty. Mr. Tilton, on the other hand, is a poor man, a persecuted and a vilified; his home devastated, his happiness destroyed, his money gone and his prospects for life blasted. In these respects the conflict is unequal. As a witness, and as a "heathen," we have no occasion however, to be ashamed of "the mutual friend."

Since this was written, and on the tenth day of Mr. Moulton's examination, it was announced to him that his mother had just died. It of course was a severe blow to him, and the tears rushed to his eyes. In view of the bereavement, the court proffered to relieve him for a few days from farther duty; but after a few minutes, in which to compose his mind, he said firmly, he proposed to have his examination finished then, and it was at once resumed.

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER X.

Christian writers, who are so fond of ringing their changes upon "the dark ages," seldom pause to consider that long after the revival of letters, and up to the very threshold of the last century, our boasted civilization, in the so-called light of the gospel, presented features more repulsive than any that had previously characterized its history on either side of the Atlantic.

Although from the seventh to the thirteenth century the Church was all-powerful in England, and ignorance and superstition consequently filled the land, the forms and fruits of this mental and moral degradation were infinitely less disgusting and appalling than those which distinguished the Puritan element of Massachusetts from sixteen hundred and thirty to sixteen hundred and ninety.

The correctness of this observation will be perceived at once, when we come to consider that whatever intolerance and blindness may have marked the career of Catholic superstition in the other hemisphere in days gone by, it had its great pageants, and was always well fed. It had its Saint Days, its jolly pilgrimages, and its "Friar of Orders Gray," who, according to the old song, loved "fat pullets and clouted cream." There was some humanity in this at least, and although the rope and the fagot did their terrible work from time to time, it was done on an infinitely more respectable basis than that which signalized the operations of these two gentle Christian agencies in the days of John Endicot of New England, when the gaunt and gloomy spectre of the Church looked at all things beautiful through smoked glass, and robbed the human soul of every generous impulse.

Yes, for more than half a century, the lean, lank, hollow-eyed superstition of Puritanism ate into the very vitals of the land, and sat a nightmare upon the hopes and the progress of the people. Repudiating the proud, clean-cut, up-and-down Devil of Milton and of aristocratic Christendom, that was, to some extent, a gentlemanly and fascinating fellow, it made its own foul fiend to meet the necessities of its damnable essence, and, of course, found no difficulty in producing a supreme scoundrel to trump him with, which it dared to liken to the beneficent ruler of the Universe.

And now, beneath the dark shadows of night, we find in continuation of our story, the accursed agents of this system of intensified Christianity out on their way once more, with murder and lust in their hearts, in the hopes of being able to lay their blood-stained hands unexpectedly upon two unoffending women who were as innocent of any offense against them or against heaven as the child unborn.

When it was observed some time back, that Red Wing had received from Titmouse the information he required, it was in relation to the case of Alice only; for the dwarf was not able to enlighten him, to any great extent, respecting the plans of the Government with reference to his tribe. Therefore the Indian, as remarked at the close of the last chapter and previously, was anxious to see old Giles, and to learn from him at once all that was known to him upon the subject; for, notwithstanding the idea of the ferryman, that the Governor, Sir William Phipps, was now well disposed toward some of the red men, he was himself surrounded by difficulties that embarrassed all his views in this and other relations, and even threatened his own household.

About half-past eight o'clock, then, as Red Wing and his two companions were conversing at the mouth of the ravine already alluded to, they were joined by a third Indian, who had evidently something of importance to communicate, as he sprang up to the chief, who had just answered his low signal cry, and informed him that a body of men were cautiously stealing upon him, led by Sloucher and Huskins, and that the daughter of the ferryman was approaching about a quarter of a mile in advance of the party.

With the quick perception of his race, Red Wing instantly came to the conclusion that the presence of Martha in the vicinity of the ravine at such an hour, and the proximity of the Fanatic and the witchfinder, were in some way connected with the case of Miss Ravenswood.

Quick as thought he sprang forward into the path in which the ferryman's daughter was advancing, and in the course of a few moments was by her side; having first used some expressions well known to her, and adroitly given his name, just as he joined her, so that she, although surprised at his sudden appearance, was not alarmed in any degree.

"Where white squaw Ravenswood?" he exclaimed in her ear, presuming there was not a moment to be lost, "bad Christian mans close by to catch and kill 'um. Some one tell where 'um hide."

Martha, who was quick of apprehension also, seemed to divine instantly that Alice had been betrayed, and replied promptly:

"She is in a cave a short distance from this, but how do you know that she is pursued?"

"Come!" said Red Wing, without answering her question, "white mans close now! Red Wing too quick for 'um. Me know cave. Come!"

In the space of a very few minutes Martha, the chief and his three followers were in the cave, where they found Alice seated upon some furs beside a few embers, that threw a feeble, fitful light around her.

She bounded to her feet on becoming aware of the presence of some one, but perceiving Martha and Red Wing she knew she was still safe.

In the twinkling of an eye, and while Martha whispered a few words to the poor fugitive, Red Wing had the furs packed up and in the hands of his followers. The next instant the fire was extinguished, and before she had time to collect herself perfectly, Alice was hurried out of the cave and found herself standing in the midst of the little group on an elevated spot directly above its entrance, where she now began to comprehend more fully the danger with which she was threatened more immediately.

They had not been standing here many minutes, when the sound of approaching footsteps mingled with voices in low conversation reached their ears. Alice trembled as she caught the well-known accents of the Fanatic, while Martha became excited and angry on recognizing the voice of Nat the Noose. Neither Alice nor she, however, was alarmed at the closeness of the sleuth hounds, well knowing that Red Wing and his companions were now quite competent to baffle all pursuit.

The party now arrived at the mouth of the cave, and within twenty yards of their intended victims who were concealed from observation among some rocks and underwood. Sloucher was the first to produce a lantern, which he speedily lighted. A similar one was quickly glowing in the hands of Huskins, and in those of the Noose also. It was sometime, however, before the entrance to the cave was discovered, for although the party had halted within a few feet of it, owing to the masses of vines and creeping plants that concealed it, there was some difficulty experienced in striking the opening itself.

At last it was found, however, when Nat, Huskins and Sloucher entered—all three confident that they had entrapped their victims, and had now only to bear them off to a dungeon already thronged with the doomed of both sexes.

When the three conspirators had disappeared, leaving the others on watch outside, Red Wing pointed to a gleam of light that shot up through a deep fissure in the rocks and brushwood at his feet. Immediately afterward, Sloucher and his two companions were observed through the aperture hurrying wildly to and fro and searching every nook. In the space of a few seconds, the Fanatic was heard to exclaim in a voice of thunder to Nat the Noose:

"Thou hast lied, child of the Evil One! the witches Ravenswood and Giles have never been here, else where are the traces of them?"

"I am no more a child of the Evil One than you are," growled the Noose, who was completely bewildered when he found the cave empty and both the birds flown. "And as for there being no traces of the witches, Martha Giles and Alice Ravenswood, about here, I should like to know what this means"—stooping down at the same time and directing attention to the smoke which was struggling through the clay and dust that had been hurriedly thrown on the fire.

"Yes," replied Huskins eagerly, "they have been here, and have fled, doubtless some time ago, for the furs of which you spoke have disappeared also, indicating that they have had warning and assistance from some quarter."

"I cannot comprehend it," hissed the Noose between his teeth, "unless the Foul Fiend himself came to their aid. But," he continued, "we shall yet lay our hands on them; and then," he whispered into Sloucher's ear while Huskins was prying about at some distance, "we shan't mind what the law says on the subject, but divide the spoils; for you understand me, and I understand you! I am tired of the settlement."

On hearing this, Sloucher fastened a meaning look upon his companion, and immediately the devil danced once more in his small, green eyes, and his lower jaw fell in a sort of silent, demoniacal chuckle. Soon, however, a sense of his present dire disappointment returned to him, and he ground his huge heel into the solid rock as he exclaimed:

"Yea, verily thou hast told the truth. They have been here, but they are gone, and who shall say whither, unless to keep their midnight orgies among their familiars. But, after all, it cannot have been so long since they departed, else this fire would have been completely extinguished."

"True," observed Huskins, who now rejoined them, "but as we have been foiled this time also, there is no use in remaining longer here. So let us return to town by the house of the ferryman, who has had his finger in this pie from first to last."

When the party outside had been informed of this second failure, they were filled with pious indignation. They saw the hand of the devil in it, inasmuch as Miss Ravenswood and Martha had just escaped the cruel and merciless grasp that would have consigned them to the rope—although they were not aware that a fate more terrible was intended for them, so far as Sloucher and Nat the Noose could influence their destiny.

Now the murderous gang and their principals moved away from the cave by the path which had brought them to it, while Alice and Martha under the guidance of Red Wing and his companions cautiously descended the rocks to the right in the direction of the ravine.

Martha was paralyzed to learn from the observations of Sloucher and the Noose that she, too, had been denounced; and almost sank under the terrible consciousness that it would now be as much as her life was worth to approach her father's house.

These thoughts pressed heavily upon her as she slowly wended her way, by the side of her fair companion, in the footsteps of the chief who from time to time ejaculated, as if to himself:

"White man's Great Spirit like much kill and trouble! 'Um a squaw! 'Um no brave! 'Um make bad mans!"

And no wonder that the untutored child of the forest should arrive at a conclusion like this, seeing that those who professed to be doing the work of the Lord were steeped, body, soul, and spirit in infamy, so hopelessly saturated with all that was ignoble, bloody and cruel as to efface from the record of their being everything that bore the slightest semblance to humanity.

When John Langton and Robert Miles left the villa they turned their steps, as we have already seen, towards the dwelling of the ferryman.

Old Giles who had much to think of and had no easy card to play in relation to Sloucher and Huskins, in expectancy of a visit from the latter, had procured a substitute to attend the ferry for the afternoon and night of the day succeeding the flight of Alice. To this person, who had previously been his proxy on many occasions, he resigned his oars, after he had brought over the Fanatic and his crew from The Heights, so that now when the two men from the villa entered his house, they found him seated in his accustomed arm chair and apparently wrapped in profound thought.

"Are you alone?" he observed on perceiving them standing in the door which they had opened, he not having heard their knock, or perhaps not having thought proper to notice it.

"Yes," replied Langton, "we are alone; and you know what has brought us here."

"I can give a pretty good guess at it," returned the ferryman, "but these are times for great caution and a close mouth."

"True," said Robert, "but is she safe, and have you seen her since last night?"

"She is safe for the present," he rejoined, "but I have not seen her to-day, as it would be dangerous to approach her hiding place while people might be passing to and fro. Martha," he continued, "is now with her and will remain by her side until morning. When she returns we shall learn how the poor, young creature bears it. She left here about half an hour ago."

"I must see her to-night, and bring intelligence from her own lips to her mother," said Robert, "else the good lady will expire before morning."

"It was very venturesome of Martha to trust herself out at this time of night, and when Indians are said to be close at hand; I hope no ill will come of it," observed John Langton.

"She would go," said the ferryman. "But as you say, Robert, that it will be necessary for you to see Miss Ravenswood for the poor old lady's sake, if you can manage to reach her hiding place without betraying it, I'll give you the clew to it, as it is not over a mile from this."

"As you have, I hear, a substitute at the ferry," chimed in John Langton, who was anxious enough to be assured of Martha's safety as well as that of Alice, "can you not come with us yourself, for without you we shall scarcely be able to make out the place where Miss Alice is hid; and, moreover, Martha may not have found it so easily as you suppose."

This latter remark seemed to strike old Giles forcibly; so without another word he arose from his chair and in the course of a few minutes he and his two visitors were wending their way in the direction of the cave, and along the very road that had been taken but a short time previously by Martha. As they neared the mouth of the ravine, however, they heard the voices of some persons approaching them, and not wishing to be recognized, they stepped aside from the track and pursued their course along the very edge of the river, until they came to a point directly opposite the entrance of the cave, when they struck in from the water and quickly stood before the masses of foliage that concealed the opening.

Although the night had been dark enough when the three friends started from the house, by the time the cave was reached their eyes had become sufficiently accustomed to the gloom to be able to discover objects in their immediate vicinity. Hence the ferryman soon managed to draw aside the clustering masses of evergreens at the right point, and immediately the three men stood within the gloomy retreat. That there was no voice in recognition of their entrance did not surprise Giles, as he supposed that the inmates were waiting to discover who had arrived before they made their presence known. When, however, the ferryman had lit his lantern, which he had brought with him, and flashed it upon all the corners and spaces about him, he uttered an exclamation of surprise and horror, and stammered out:

"They have disappeared! They are gone! They have been betrayed! They have been captured by the persons whose voices we have just heard! Let us pursue them! It is Sloucher and his bloodhounds!"

Instantly the little party were out on the path taken by the persons alluded to, and hastening their steps, they were soon within hearing of them once more. Sloucher's voice was plainly recognizable among them, and this led the ferryman to believe that not only Miss Ravenswood, but his daughter, had been arrested in the cave. In a short time, however, he became satisfied that neither Alice nor Martha was of the party; but learning from the conversation that the infamous gang were on their way to his house, and supposing that the prisoners had been already hurried off to the town and thrust into a dungeon, he whispered to his companions, who were hanging with him close on the footsteps of the party, and all three shot off through the woods, reaching the house they had left but a short time previously, fifteen or twenty minutes before Sloucher and his crew stood at the door.

It had been decided on the part of old Dick and his friends, not to give even the slightest intimation of the knowledge they had acquired to the ruffians who now entered the building; so the instant the ferryman perceived them he exclaimed in a voice of feigned surprise and with seeming annoyance:

"Well! Is there no one to take you across the ferry if you want to try it again? I left a substitute there this afternoon."

"We don't want your services in that direction," replied the witchfinder, "but would like you to assist us in finding the witch that you conducted last night to the cave near the ravine, after you lied to us at the ferry, and that your daughter went to visit this evening."

If the house had fallen about old Giles' ears, he could not have been more thunderstruck; but being brave and cool, he evinced no trepidation or knowledge of the circumstance alluded to. He, therefore, replied deliberately:

"As you appear to know so much about the case, you better endeavor to master it altogether without consulting me, as you say I'm a party concerned."

"Yes," drawled out Sloucher, as he fastened his small, devilish eyes on Robert Miles, "I see thou hast one of thy familiars here, who has doubtless assisted thee again to make away with the witch Ravenswood, while this other child of perdition, from the opposite side of the river, has no doubt aided and abetted in frustrating the law and the aims of the Lord, in affording shelter to thy daughter, who is now known to be as great a witch as the woman Ravenswood, as Nat the Noose here can bear witness!"

"Yes," said the Noose, seeing that he was surrounded by his fellow-conspirators, "I can say, before the Lord that, if anything, she is a greater witch than the other, and worthy to die the death!"

There was a slight movement in the corner where John Langton was seated, and the next moment the Noose was felled senseless to the floor by a swift and fearful blow from the powerful arm of the faithful servitor from The Heights.

When Martha and Alice descended from among the rocks, they were at once conducted into the depths of the ravine, and directly to the wigwam of the chief where they met once more his beautiful wife, who was greatly moved and delighted when she kissed Alice and welcomed her old friend, Martha.

In a few words Red Wing explained all; and, having placed the two fugitives in charge of the lovely squaw, at the instance of Martha, he set out with the other three Indians to bear the intelligence of what had occurred to old Giles, who, in turn, was to communicate with the villa in relation to the place where Alice was now secreted.

He and his companions being swift of foot, arrived at a point close to the ferryman's a very few moments after Sloucher and his gang had entered the dwelling, but hearing voices in angry altercation as he presumed, he crept close to the building, which he just reached at the very moment when the Noose was knocked senseless by Langton.

Immediately afterward there was a cry for help, for half a dozen ruffians had set upon the fearless lover of Martha, who now with Robert and the ferryman were engaged defending themselves against fearful odds.

In a single bound the chief reached the door with his followers armed with knife and tomahawk, and as it was ajar, he at once perceived how the case stood. The three men were defending themselves bravely, and Sloucher had just made a deadly blow at Miles with his heavy staff, which, fortunately, was caught by one of the rafters ere it crushed his skull.

There was not a moment to lose, so with a fierce war-whoop, while their knives and tomahawks glittered in the air above their heads, the four Indians sprang in among the combatants, the majority of whom fled swift as lightning from the scene in the utmost consternation, satisfied that a whole tribe of the red men was upon them.

The Noose who had recovered his feet and his senses, was the first to disappear, although Sloucher and Huskins were not far behind him. On seeing how the case stood, the remainder of the gang took flight also, leaving the four red men, who had not struck a single blow, and their three friends masters of the field and without a scratch worth speaking of.

It was now, only, that old Dick recognized the chief whom he warmly greeted, as did John and Robert who had known and esteemed him previously and who now dropped a word in his ear regarding the intention of the authorities towards his people. Sloucher and Huskins's fiends fled in every direction, not sure of their scalps for a single moment, while the two leaders and the Noose parted company the instant they had regained the open air—each taking whatever direction his legs could be most freely used in, and all believing that the scalps of the old ferryman and his two companions were already dangling at the belts of the Indians.

In a few brief sentences Red Wing recounted the adventures and circumstances of the evening, and relieved the terrible anxiety of the three whites in relation to the safety of Martha and Alice; advising, at the same time, that they should be permitted to remain unvisited by their friends or relatives in the impenetrable recesses of the ravine, until some project was devised tending to their ultimate safety.

Hearty thanks and congratulations having passed between both parties, the chief and his companions prepared to withdraw and turn their face toward their wigwams. Before going, however, Red Wing expressed a fear that his presence on the scene of action would probably lead to his quitting the ravine shortly, as it being once understood that there were red men hanging about the settlement, pursuit would be speedily set on foot by the authorities. He promised, however, to afford an asylum in the meantime to the fugitives, and not to remove from the ravine for a few days, unless there was absolute necessity for doing so.

Well knowing that Alice and Martha were in safe hands while under his protection, Giles and Robert declared themselves amazed at the fortunate turn affairs had taken through his promptness and tact; and congratulating themselves that the two persecuted women were now with the kind and beautiful Firefly, they all shook hands with their benefactors, who, on informing them that they should be kept apprised, for some time to come, of the whereabouts of the fugitives, disappeared once more in the gloom.

Among the numerous scoundrels known to Sloucher was a half-breed who, like all mongrels, hated a pure-blooded anything. This wretch, who was called Lightfoot, was a special favorite with the Fanatic, from the fact that he shared his implacable enmity to the red man, and had always been used by the authorities as a spy upon his movements. By mere accident this treacherous villain, who was one of the most ardent cowards living, was passing the house of the ferryman just as Langton had knocked down the Noose; but comprehending that there was danger, and not caring to tempt it in any way, he stepped aside to listen and watch, in the hope of turning whatever was occurring to good account.

He was thus honorably engaged when the Indians stepped in on the scene, and decided the encounter in favor of the whites. He saw the Fanatic and the rest of them fly from the house, and perceiving, through the half-open door, that the red man had remained and entered into friendly converse with the ferryman and his two white companions, he crept cautiously around the building, and through the very same aperture at which Titmouse had been snatched up on the previous night, heard all that transpired between them.

His eyes dilated with fiendish pleasure as he learned that the two fugitives were concealed in the ravine in the wigwam of the chief; for in this discovery he felt that he had not only something to enlist the attention of his friend Sloucher, but to command instant action on the part of the authorities in relation to the proximity of the Indians, which action he felt assured would result in a golden harvest to him, who alone knew of the precise spot where the red man was to be found.

He had heard it whispered that the Fanatic was smitten with the charms of Miss Ravenswood, and that he had denounced her simply because she had driven him from the villa. These two strings to his bow, then, were most important ones, and the more so as he heard Red Wing, whom he now dogged into the woods, tell his companions that he should be obliged to be absent from the ravine on the morrow and all the succeeding night, having received some information which constrained him to visit a chief who was encamped some miles deeper in the forest.

Understanding perfectly the language in which the Indians were speaking, he became aware that only one or two of their number should remain about the ravine, as the other eight or ten were to go on a brief hunting expedition, as their stock of venison had got very low, and as it would be dangerous to attempt to renew it in the immediate vicinity of the settlement.

By the time the conversation began to flag between the chief and his companions, they had gained the edge of the ravine, and Lightfoot perceiving a twinkling beam among the dense and tangled brushwood in the deep, narrow glen at his feet, continued to creep cautiously after the party until he saw the chief enter his wigwam, and the others pass on as they bade him good night at its door.

Soon, prompted by the devil within him, he was creeping close to the spacious and comfortable lodge, when he heard the words of welcome and enquiry uttered by the two fugitives, as well as by the beautiful wife of the chief. Alice and Martha he had seen frequently, but to assure himself of their presence, he now crawled on his hands and knees toward the entrance of the frail abode, when through a chink in the birch bark of which it was mainly formed, he perceived them both seated with Firefly on the deer-skins and costly furs that were spread upon the floor.

This was sufficient; so creeping cautiously toward the side of the ravine, which he had but just descended, he bounded to his feet, and was soon in town knocking at the door of the Fanatic, who had just recovered from the fright he had received an hour previously, and who, as his eyes rested on the half-breed, felt satisfied that he had come to inform him of the murder of the ferryman and his two companions by the Indians.

In the meantime, Robert Miles and John Langton hastened to the villa with the intelligence of the further providential escape of Alice, and also with the news that the ferryman's daughter had been denounced, and was now a fugitive in the same place of refuge with Miss Ravenswood.

The invalid was greatly excited by what she heard, but appeared to experience some relief from the fact that her daughter had now a companion to share her solitude and trials—such is the reasonable selfishness of the world. There is no denying it, Misery likes company, at the expense of even the dearest friend.

The Noose was terribly mortified at the manner in which he had been disposed of by his successful rival; and now that he had leisure to recall the whole circumstance, he almost hoped that he had not fallen a victim to the Indians, so that he might one day have an opportunity and the fiendish pleasure of deliberately plunging a knife into his heart. As for Huskins, he simply looked upon the whole affair as another failure, that was only to be remedied at the earliest possible moment; and cheered himself with the conviction that the two witches would turn up before they were much older. He was, however, a little afraid that, unless the Indians were driven from the settlement, his midnight adventures would be embarrassed to some extent, inasmuch as there was no saying at what moment his scalp might fall into their hands. Like Sloucher, he was determined to call the attention of the authorities to this at once; but first, as the flight of their party was somewhat ignominious, he must consult with the Fanatic, although he felt satisfied that it would be utterly impossible to hush up the fact of their having been scattered to the winds at the first onset of the enemy.

As to John Langton, his heart almost died within him when he thought of how terribly his beloved Martha was exposed to peril on all sides. He was, of course, determined to find his way to her, come what might; but then he must first obtain the permission of Red Wing, to whom they had tacitly pledged themselves not to approach the ravine until they had his consent to do so.

But what of poor Alice and of Maurice Fitz Raymond, who ought really to be the central figures of this strange drama? The one was in utter blindness as to the difficulties and dangers that had beset the other. And now, as the body of volunteers, reduced in numbers, approached the town, disheartened and anticipating no very warm reception, the brave young officer began to console himself with the conviction that the failure of the expedition could not be in any way attributed to him, and that, at all events, he should be blest with the society of his beloved Alice for a few days longer, or until the ranks of the party were sufficiently recruited to warrant his taking the field once more.

STARTLING.—The N. Y. World publishes a special cable dispatch from London, giving the computations of the savans of Greenwich Observatory, from the data obtained from the recent observations of the transit of Venus. Its gives the sun's parallax as 9.24 seconds. By this it is decided that the sun is 88,000,000 miles from the earth. By the observations made by Eneke, 105 years ago, at the transit of 1761 and 1769, the distance of the sun was decided to be 95,000,000 miles. If these two computations are correct, it follows, the earth is nearing the sun at the rate of 7,000,000 miles in one hundred years, and that in 1,400 years the earth will fall into the sun and cease to exist as a separate planet.

It is more likely these measurements and computations are imperfect than that the distance between the sun and earth is materially changing. A learned friend of ours in this city, [DR. WINTERBURN,] holds that the calculations of astronomers as to the distance and size of the sun, moon and planets are entirely wrong. He claims the moon to be 2,000 miles away, only, and 300 miles in diameter. The sun, 5,000,000 miles away and 5,000 miles in diameter, and that it revolves around the earth instead of the earth revolving around it. We hope at no distant day to present to our readers his views, backed by his arguments, which, to say the least, appear plausible.

The Truth Seeker,
A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.
D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.
No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XX.

In passing along with the Bible narrative, we find many wonderful stories, if true, and many instances where the Lord became very angry and committed great slaughter and devastation among his chosen people. We will here instance the one of the insurrection of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, who, tiring of the protracted journey through the wilderness and at the dictatorial and imperious rule of Moses, incited a mutiny in the camp and induced some two hundred and fifty others to join them in demonstrations of opposition to the tyranny of Moses. When Moses learned this he became very much excited and fell in anger to the earth. He appointed a meeting on the following day. When it occurred, Moses again became very angry and filled with wrath. He held a short conversation with the Lord, in which he enjoined that Kind Being to respect not the offering of the mutineers.

After separating the faithful from the unfaithful and after the amiable Moses had spoken a few words to the assembly, the "ground clave assunder that was under them, and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up, and their houses and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods." They all went down into the pit together when the earth closed again over them, and, as a matter of course, they "utterly perished." "And there," also, it is said, "came out a fire from the Lord and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense."

These were heroic measures, truly. The offense in the eyes of Moses and the Lord (they seemed, indeed, to have a good understanding in the matter) was of an alarming character, and they seemed to be very angry about it. That probably explains the terrible character of the punishment inflicted. This must have been an aggravated case, for Moses and the Lord were both angry. It was customary for Moses to hold his temper when the Lord became angry, and often when the latter had it in his heart to destroy his people utterly, and to wipe them from the face of the earth, Moses by his persuasive style of reasoning showed the Lord the foolishness of such conduct, and how the surrounding nations would laugh at him; how, after he had put himself to so much trouble to bring his people out of Egypt, and through the Red Sea on dry land, and keep them so many years alive with manna sent daily from heaven, it would be rash and foolish on God's part to thus destroy them, and the book tells us, "Moses would not let the Lord destroy Israel."

It was truly fortunate for the Israelites and their posterity that on most occasions Moses was able to hold his temper and remain placid when the Lord became so enraged with anger or wrath, and thus hold a check upon the Lord and prevent him on many occasions from playing "general smash" with his people. But in the case under consideration, when his rule and authority were opposed, his wrath, also, waxed extremely hot; he was not disposed to hold the Lord back at all, and the only wonder is that a few hundred only were destroyed, when the aid both of earthquakes and heavenly fire was invoked. If the earth opened its mouth and took that number in, why not open it wider, while about it, and take a larger mouthful? When this fire from the Lord was loose among the congregation and consumed them, why stop at two hundred and fifty? It must be attributed to the possibility that on this occasion the Lord was—fortunately—not so angry as Moses was; the revolt was more particularly against Moses than against God, hence, perhaps, the comparative small destruction of life.

"But on the morrow, all the congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, ye have killed the people of the Lord. And it came to pass when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron, that they looked toward the tabernacle of the congregation, and behold, the cloud covered it, and the glory of the Lord appeared." This appearance of God's glory portended mischief, and it is to be inferred he was much more angry than on the previous day, for the destruction of life was immensely greater. The Lord spoke to Moses and notified him to get out from among the congregation, that he might consume them all in a moment. This time his anger was doubtless raised to fever heat, for a fire or plague, (the account is not very clear in stating which it was), went out from the Lord, and slew immediately fourteen thousand and seven hundred persons.

The destruction of life on this occasion, would, in all probability, have been much greater had not Moses been a little cooler-headed than on the previous day. He saw in a moment that the Lord meant business, and by a simple device—the sending of Aaron with a censor containing incense and fire, to go out among the congregation and make atonement for the people, great destruction was averted. The inference is, when the fumes or odor of this burning incense reached the olfactories of the Lord it immediately pacified his anger and checked the destruction of life; for when Aaron thus "stood between the dead and living, the plague was stayed." But for this timely device of Moses, there is no telling to what extent the work of destruction might have gone. It might have reached the number of fifty thousand, or seventy thousand as it did on other occasions when the Lord became enraged and no one stepped in to hold him back. As it was, the people, doubtless, could not feel very grateful for his visit; and if the "glory" which was seen at that time over the tabernacle portended the destruction of near fifteen thousand people, they doubtless wished it would not present itself there very often. A funeral of fifteen thousand, at one time, was probably more extensive than agreeable.

These stories of the Lord's becoming angry and slaying his people in this wholesale manner, is very derogatory to the character of a first-class deity, and belittles and vilifies the Supreme Power that pervades the Universe. It seems almost blasphemous and sacrilegious to charge a God of love—a beneficent Providence with such extreme cruelty, malice and vindictiveness. It is more fitted to the character of a demon; and no devil or demon is known at the present time who would be guilty of such conduct. The usual argument that "God made the people, and had a right to do what he pleased with them," fails to rationalize such conduct. No reasonable God would allow himself to fly into fits of rage and anger and slay indiscriminately fifteen to seventy thousand persons at one time for the offense of an individual and who was permitted to go without punishment.

These stories about God's getting angry and becoming so malicious, so blood-thirsty and destructive; that he caused the earth to open its mouth, swallow up a body of its people and then close its mouth again, partakes so much of the character of the fables, exaggerations and fictions of a barbarous age that we cannot accept them as truth, for less as having been written or dictated by God. In fact, we cannot believe them at all. We see nothing of this kind occurring now. We sometimes have shocks of an earthquake, houses are thrown down, and, in some instances, cracks or fissures occur, but we understand now that these are all the result of natural causes and conditions, and that the earth never opens its mouth like a huge beast and closes it again, taking in at a gulp large numbers of people. The same ever-pervading laws that govern the Universe to-day governed it four thousand years ago, and four hundred thousand years as well, and these laws, or this Supreme Power if you choose to so denominate it, is unchangeable in character; it does not "get mad," it does not fly into a rage; it is not malicious; it is not vindictive; it is not destructive, and all stories and fables accusing it of these monstrosities are utterly unworthy of belief.

ELDER HARKINS.—We are unable, in this issue, to lay one of the Elder's sermons before our readers. It did not arrive in time.

Christianity Examined.

NO. V.

While giving brief extracts from the sacred writings of ancient nations, we will quote a few passages from Plato, the deepest and most learned of the Grecian Philosophers, and one of the soundest and wisest men that ever lived. Though he did not claim to be the son of God, nor to be inspired directly by him, his teachings were of a very elevated character, and have been called "divine" by his followers and admirers. Had his teachings and morals been adopted in Europe in place of Christianity, it would have had a religion quite as rational, quite as moral, quite as divine, and attended with far less of wars, persecutions and bloodshed. He was born four hundred and twenty-nine years before the Christian era. He thus discoursed:

"My friends, you cannot easily convince mankind that they should pursue virtue or avoid vice, not for the reasons which the many give, in order forsooth that a man may seem to be good."

"This is what they are always repeating; and this, in my judgment, is an old wives' fable."

"Let them have the truth. In God is no unrighteousness at all; he is altogether righteous; and there is nothing more like him, than he of us who is most righteous."

"And the true wisdom of men and their nothingness and cowardice are nearly concerned with this."

"For to know this is true wisdom and manhood, and the ignorance of this is too plainly folly and vice."

"All other kinds of wisdom and cunning, which seem only, such as the wisdom of politicians or the wisdom of the arts, are coarse and vulgar."

"The unrighteous man, or the sayer and doer of unholy things, had far better not yield to the illusion that his roguery is cleverness."

"For men glory in their shame—they fancy they hear others saying of them, 'these are not mere good-for-nothing persons, burdens on the earth, but such as men should be who mean to dwell safely in a state.'"

"Let us tell them that they are all the more truly what they do not know that they are; for they do not know the penalty of injustice; which, above all things, they ought to know."

"Nor stripes and death, as they suppose which evil doers often escape, but a penalty which cannot be escaped."

"There are two patterns set before them in nature; the one blessed and divine, the other godless and wretched."

"And they do not see in their utter folly and infatuation, that they are growing like the one and unlike the other, by reason of their evil deeds; and the penalty is that they lead a life answering to the pattern which they resemble."

"And if we tell them that unless they depart from their cunning, the place of innocence will not receive them after death; and that here on earth they will live ever in the likeness of their own evil selves and with evil friends."

"When they hear this, they in their superior cunning will seem to be listening to fools."

THE DIVINE LAW.

"God, as the old tradition declares, holding in his hand the beginning, middle and end of all that is, moves according to his nature in a straight line toward the accomplishment of his end."

"Justice always follows him, and is the punisher of those who fall short of the divine law."

"To that law, he who would be happy holds fast and follows it in all humility and order."

"But he who is lifted up with pride, or money, or honor, or beauty, who has a soul hot with folly and youth and insolence, and thinks he has no need of a guide or ruler, but is himself to be the guide of others;—"

"He, I say, is left deserted of God; and being thus deserted, he takes to him others who are like himself, and dances about in wild confusion, and many think he is a great man;

"But in a short time he pays a penalty which justice cannot but approve, and is utterly destroyed, and his family and city with him."

THE SOUL.

"Of all things which a man has, next to the gods, his soul is divine and most truly his own."

"Wherefore I am right in bidding every one next to the gods, who are our masters, and those who in order follow them, to honor his own soul, which every one seems to honor, but no one honors as he ought."

"For honor is a divine good; and no evil thing is honorable."

"And he who thinks he can honor the soul by word or gift, or any sort of compliance, not making her in any way better, seems to honor her, but honors her not at all."

"For example, every man, in his very boyhood, fancies he is able to know everything, and thinks he honors his soul by praising her, and he is very ready to let her do whatever she may like."

"But I mean to say in acting thus, he only injures his soul, and does not honor her; whereas in our opinion, he ought to honor her as second only to the gods."

"Again, when a man thinks others are to be blamed, and not himself, for the errors he has committed, and the many and great evils which befel him in consequence, and is always fancying himself to be exempt and innocent; he is under the idea that he is honoring his soul, whereas the very reverse is the fact, for he is really injuring her.

"Again, when one prefers beauty to virtue, what is this but the real and utter dishonor of the soul?

"For such a preference implies that the body is more honorable than the soul; and this is false, for there is nothing of earthly birth which is more honorable than the heavenly, and he who thinks otherwise of the soul, has no idea how he undervalues this possession.

"Nor again, when a person is willing, or not unwilling to acquire dishonest gains, does he then honor his soul with gifts?

"Far otherwise; he sells her glory and honor for a small piece of gold; but all the gold which is under or upon the earth is not to be given in exchange for virtue.

THE DIVINE NATURE.

"Whatever is beautiful, is so merely by participation of the Supreme Beauty.

"All other beauty may increase, decay, change or perish, but this is the same through all time.

"By raising our thoughts above all inferior beauties, we at length reach the Supreme Beauty, which is simple, pure and immortal, without form, color, or human qualities.

"It is the Splendor of the Divine image, it is Deity himself.

"Love of the Supreme Beauty renders a man divine.

"God provides for other things, the least as well as the greatest.

"He is the original life and force of all things, in the ethereal regions, upon the earth, and under the earth.

"He is the Being, the Unity, the Good—the same in the world of Intelligence that the sun is in the visible world.

"God is Truth, and Light is his shadow.

"What light and sight are to this visible world, truth and intelligence are in the real unchangeable world.

"The end and aim of all things should be to attain to the First Good, of which the sun is the type, and the material world, with its host of ministering spirits, is but the manifestation and shadow.

"The perfectly just man is he who loves justice for its own sake; not for the honors and advantages that attend; and is willing to pass for unjust while he practices the most exact justice; who will not suffer himself to be moved by disgrace or distress, but will continue steadfast in the love of justice, not because it is pleasant, but because it is right."

The writings of Plato are quite voluminous and might be profitably quoted at length, would space allow, but we must pass on. It will be easy for the reader to see his teachings are eminently moral and elevated, and that they have not been surpassed in any other direction. He taught his disciples to aspire to virtue and purity for the advantages they yield and not to escape the damnation and vengeance of an angry Deity. His philosophy has had a great influence in the world, and it is greatly to be regretted that it was not more generally adopted, rather than the relics of a cruder paganism; had this been so, it would have been happier for mankind.

We will next give a few quotations from the writings of MARCUS AURELIUS ANTONIUS, a Pagan Roman Emperor who lived in the second century. He had no connection with Christianity, and the force of his moral inculcations cannot be credited to that source.

"From my grandfather Verus I learned good morals and the government of my temper.

"From the reputation and remembrance of my father, modesty and manly character.

"From my mother, pity and beneficence, and abstinence, not only from evil deeds, but from evil thoughts; and further, simplicity in my way of living, far removed from the habits of the rich.

"From Diogenes, not to busy myself about trifling things, and not to give credit to what was said by miracle-workers and jugglers about incantations and the driving away of demons and such things.

"From Appolinus I learned freedom of will and undeviating steadiness of purpose; and to look to nothing else, not even for a moment, except to reason; and to be always the same, in sharp pains, on the occasion of the loss of a child, or in long illness. And from him I learned how to receive from friends what are esteemed favors, without being humbled by them, or letting them pass unnoticed.

"Labor not unwillingly, nor without regard to the common interest, nor without due consideration, nor with distraction; nor let studded ornament set off thy thoughts, and be not either a man of many words, or busy about too many things.

"And further, let the Deity which is in thee be the guardian of a living being, manly and of ripe age, who has taken his post, like a man waiting for a signal which summons him from life, and ready to go, having neither need of oath nor any man's testimony.

"Be cheerful, also, and seek not external help, nor the tranquility which others give. A man must stand erect, not be kept erect by others.

"Never value anything as profitable to thyself which shall compel thee to break thy promise, to lose thy self-respect, to hate any man, to suspect, to curse, to act the hypocrite, to desire anything which needs walls and curtains;

"For he who has preferred to everything else his own intelligence and the demon within him, and the worship of its excellence acts no tragic part, does not groan, will not need much solitude or much company, and, what is chief of all, he will live without either pursuing, or flying from life;

"But whether for a longer or shorter time he shall have the soul enclosed in the body, he cares not at all;

"For even if he must depart immediately, he will go as readily as if he were going to do anything else which can be done with decency and order, taking care of this only all through life, that his thoughts turn not away from anything which belongs to an intelligent animal, and a member of a civil community.

"If thou workest at that which is before thee, following right reason seriously, vigorously, calmly, without allowing anything else to distract thee, but keeping thy divine part pure, as if thou shouldst be bound to give it back immediately.

"If thou holdest to this, expecting nothing, fearing nothing, but satisfied with thy present activity according to nature, with heroic truth in every word and sound which thou utterest, thou wilt live happy, and there is no man able to prevent this."

For want of room, we will have to omit for the present the moral teachings of EPICETUS, SENECA and other Romans, and conclude by giving a few extracts from the Arabian prophet MAHOMET, who claimed to write by divine dictation. We quote from the Koran:

"The pious is he who believeth in God, and who giveth his money to the needy.

"Those who perform their covenant with men in adversity (or excessive poverty) and affliction and disease, and do what is right, shall have their reward.

"A kind speech and forgiveness are better than alms, which harm and reproach followeth.

"Give the orphans when they come of age their substance, and render them not in exchange bad for good, and devour not their substance by adding it to your own; for this a great sin.

"Those who do evil ignorantly, and then repent speedily, to them will God be turned, for God is knowing and wise.

"Those who believe and do that which is right, we will bring into gardens watered by rivers; therein shall they remain forever.

"Show kindness unto your parents, whether the one or both of them attain to old age with thee; speak respectfully unto them, and submit to behave humbly toward them, out of tender affection.

"Meddle not with the substance of the orphan, unless it be to improve it. Perform your covenant, and give full measure, when you measure ought, and weigh with a just balance.

"Walk not proudly in the land.

"He who forgiveth, and is reconciled unto his enemy, shall receive his reward.

"Let not men laugh each other to scorn who peradventure may be better than themselves; neither let women laugh other women to scorn, who may possibly be better than themselves.

"Neither defame one another; nor call one another by opprobrious epithets.

"Consume not your wealth among yourselves in vain, nor present it to judges that ye may devour part of man's substance unjustly."

These quotations, from what are claimed to be "sacred writings" of various nations, could be continued indefinitely, but further room can hardly be spared. We think the reader will admit that in the extracts given, excellent moral sentiments are inculcated; that no immorality or vindictiveness, at all events, is manifested therein, and that in these respects they compare very favorably with the Christian Bible, which abounds with vengeance and terrible denunciations.

In the teachings of Jesus, even, which are claimed to be mildness and love par excellence, we find not a little of this denunciatory and vindictive character; witness such passages as the following, taken from what are said to be his words:

"He that believeth, and is baptized, shall be saved; he that believeth not shall be damned."

"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels."

"But those mine enemies which would not that I reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me."

"I come not to bring peace, but a sword."

There are others of a similar character, but we will not quote farther now. It is, however, the spirit of such inculcations as these that gave authority for the persecutions, tortures, wars and bloodshed which the Christian Church has employed. If its master declared those should be damned who do not believe, it of course deemed it had the right to persecute, to torture and to kill by the hundreds of thousands and millions; yes, hundreds of millions, and for the same reason.

We find none of this spirit of unreasonable cruelty, arbitrary demands, or vindictive threats in the teachings of any of the Pagan Sages and Philosophers from whom we have quoted, but instead, a spirit of kindness, justice and sympathy for the human race, and well would it have been for humanity had these superior teachings prevailed in the world in place of the cruel, blood-thirsty rule of the Christian Church.

Uncomplimentary Letter.

Among the many friendly and appreciative letters we receive from all parts of the country, we occasionally get one of an opposite character, and as we are rather fond of publishing those of the first class it is perhaps only just to occasionally give one of the latter. The following is one of these, and not to do our ex-patron injustice we will give his letter verbatim et literatim.

BELOIT, OHIO, Jan. 16th, 1875.

Mr. Bennett Dear Sir: Please Stop Your Truth Seeker. I do not See what good you Expect to Derive from Publishing such Nonsense and foolishness as is Printed in What you call the T. S. It most certainly mistakes its name and elings to Things and Doctrine That you and your Coajutors in spreading such pernicious Doctrine Poisoning the minds of the rising Generation; Desecrating everything that tends to Enoble man and tends to make home enjoyable. You Disrobe man of all; you Draw the Centre Bolt that Keeps Nations Governments and Hearthstones together: Send men and nations on the Ocean of Distrust and Unbelief like a clock without its Weights; all Confusion and Disorder.

Yours in the Hope of reform,

GEORGE SNODE.

REPLY.—We are of course sorry to lose a single patron, but more sorry that reading THE TRUTH SEEKER a year and a half has done Mr. Snode no more good. He seems to be as much in the dark as though he had never seen a Liberal paper. He appears to regard Free Thought and Free Speech with great disfavor. We, of course, regret to fail to meet his approbation in the course we are earnestly pursuing, but we cannot see that he has anything better to offer than the hireling priests have been dealing out for hundreds of years. Their fables and fallacies will not satisfy the enquiring, scientific minds of today. The thoughtful are reaching for a higher phase of truth than the superstitions of the past. We think we shall be content to pursue the highest truth we can find, in company with such men as Humboldt, Spencer, Huxley, Darwin, Mill, Crookes, Wallace, Draper, and other scientific men of that class, rather than to pick up the dry husks of error that old theology has to present, though we have to part company with Mr. George Snode.

We are also sorry that our friend in ordering THE TRUTH SEEKER stopped, did not deem it a matter of right and justice to pay for the time he has been served with it. He paid last year for Vol. I, but for the ten numbers of Vol. II which have been sent him not a cent has he paid. Among publishers it is usually considered honorable for a man, when he stops his paper, to pay up for the time he has had it. The law also declares a man bound to pay for a paper so long as he takes it from the post-office whether he ordered it or not. It is a very small matter to notify a publisher to discontinue his paper, or request his postmaster to do so, and to remit the amount in arrears. We hope none of our readers wish us to furnish the paper for nothing. Had Mr. Snode paid the seventy-five cents due us, we should think more of his religion, more of his honor, and part with him in friendship. We hope, too, he will some day obtain a better view of that which is true, and be less swayed by prejudice and early education.

We regret to learn in a letter from our patron, James Daniels, Ossian, Iowa, that Mr. Rosa, senior, a first-class Liberal and a generous-hearted man, has been badly gored by a furious bull. We hope to soon learn of the old gentleman's complete recovery—and we trust that bull won't do so any more.

Scientific Department.

On Tyndall's Materialism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER :

Though Tyndall, in his Manchester lecture, delivered since his address to the British Association, declined to give an opinion, then, on what he calls "the question of questions," as to whether all phenomena are the result of an organic growth, a single natural process from the beginning, or whether the passage from the inorganic to the organic forms, requires for their introduction special creative acts, he certainly, in the address, rejected the latter, or "clock-maker" conception of the origin of things; and declared that whenever theological influences are introduced into science they always produce delusions; and that, but for these influences, scientific men would never have accepted the idea of a detached Creator and have regarded him as using each successive geological stratum as a kind of bench for the manufacture of new species of plants and animals.

In criticising the address, the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, (Smalley) says, that Tyndall did not shrink from "the terrible question of the origin of life;" that "abandoning all disguise," he took a "new departure," and proclaimed the doctrine of Materialism, but a different Materialism from that which his hearers supposed. But, says Smalley, whether this recognizing "in matter the promise and potency of every form of life" will, or will not, be repudiated by the Association, "it expresses so nearly the convictions of the greatest of its members" that he does "not know that any dissent by a numerical majority would be of much moment."

Abbot (Index, Sept. 17,) says, that he cannot see what "disguise" Tyndall has abandoned, or what "new departure" he has taken. Abbot says Tyndall explicitly said as much in 1868, and quotes: "You see I am not mincing matters, but avowing nakedly what many scientific thinkers more or less distinctly believe. The formation of a crystal, a plant, or an animal is, in their eyes, a purely mechanical problem." Tyndall includes in these thinkers the Evolutionists and Materialists who see the gradual production of all organic life out of inorganic matter. He says of the Materialist that, "I do not think that he is entitled to say that his molecular groupings and his molecular motions explain everything. In reality they explain nothing. The utmost he can affirm is the associations" of the phenomena of body and soul; but the problem of their connection "is as insoluble in its modern form as it was in the pre-scientific ages."

Abbot says that, "neither of Tyndall's addresses [those of 1868 and 1874,] if carefully analyzed, will be found to state anything more pronounced in the direction of Materialism," than what Abbot stated two years earlier. Abbot does not "at all object to Tyndall's discernment in matter of 'the promise and potency of all terrestrial life;'" what he objects to is Tyndall's hesitation to accept a doctrine which Abbot does, "unqualifiedly accept, . . . the doctrine of 'spontaneous generation,' or the origination of life out of inorganic matter," which is "implied in the very idea of Evolution." (Index, Oct. 29.)

Tyndall, like Spencer, for reasons given, disbelieves in the evolution of life under experiments like those of Bastian; Abbot does believe in them, and affirms that Tyndall explicitly accepted, in 1868, the doctrine that physics alone [that is, the molecular groupings or inorganic matter] will account for the brain and all its motions of sensation, emotion and thought. But there is this important difference that whatever Tyndall thought, in 1868, he has now for the first time, declared that though he believes in the potency of matter, it is not such matter as modern Materialists postulate; he says, "we naturally and rightfully reject the monstrous notion that out of such matter any form of life could possibly arise."

Tyndall must have known that the above utterance carries the implication that the notions of such Evolutionists as Spencer and Abbot, and the notions of such Materialists as Buechner, Bradlaugh, and Underwood, are monstrous notions, since they all conceive that all the forms of life, with their correlated phenomena of sensation, emotion, and thought, have been evolved from dead matter, or atoms that never had life. Tyndall makes Bishop Butler the exponent of his own ideas as to the impotency of dead atoms to produce life, thought, etc., and Tyndall expresses, as his own idea, that which is expressed by Bayle, who said, that he had often wondered "why Leucippus and his atomic followers had not accepted the doctrine of an inherent vital principle in each atom, for which there is as much foundation as for the eternal inherent motion which they attribute to their individual atoms. It would, he said, have delivered them from much of their perplexity; from 'the thundering objection' of Plutarch and Galen; and from difficulties which can never be resolved by 'stretching our wits' as Lucretius and Gassendus have done." Galen asked, "if any one could picture or imagine how any combination of separate, sensationless, and individually dead atoms could run together and form sensation, emotion and thought." Boyle said, "such an hypothesis is as confused as that of Hesiod's chaos; but by the means of the doctrine of eternally living atoms we may, he said, conceive that in their varied combinations, divers species of animals, modes of sensation, and varieties of thought, may arise. Tyndall represents the Bishop as using precisely the same argument that Galen used in the second century; and as reminding his "Lucretian" opponent that "the demand of the understanding for logical continuity between molecular process and the phenomena of consciousness . . . is a rock on which Materialism must inevitably split, whenever it pretends to be a complete philosophy of life;" and that it was "to get rid of this monstrous deduction of life from death . . . that the great Liebnitz displaced the dead hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, nitrogen, phosphorous, and all the other atoms, dead as grains of shot, of which the brain is formed, . . . by his living monads."

Tyndall says, it is "indeed certain that these views [Darwin's and Spencer's] will undergo modification;" and that we must "open our doors freely to the conception of creative acts, or, abandoning them, radically change our notions of matter . . . as defined for generations in our scientific text books;" and that he now, abandoning all disguise, proclaims his belief in eternally living matter; and says that he sees that "all the phenomena of physical nature, as well as those of the human mind, have their unsearchable roots in a cosmical life."

This is a "new departure," Mr. Abbot to the contrary notwithstanding. Tyndall says, that the question raised is inevitable, and is approaching us with accelerated speed. It is a terrible question for the theologian, far more so than the other Materialistic hypothesis of the origin of life from dead atoms. Conflicting opinions are held respecting Tyndall's idea of eternally living matter. Mr. Weiss says the idea is new; but the fact is that it was held by Grecian philosophers 600 years before Christ, who saw

"Through this air, this ocean, and this earth,
All matter quick and bursting into birth."

I endeavored more than four years ago, to introduce the discussion of the question in the Index, and earlier in the Investigator. Mr. Abbot derided the idea, said that the question could not be discussed, except at a considerable length; and that it was not true unless the geologists had blundered.

JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.

New Harmony, Ind., Jan. 4th, 1875.

On the Nature of Time and Space.

BY A. O. GENUNG.

That marvelous factor in nature, the human mind, although approximating so near perfection in its several concomitants and belongings, as well as in its general mode of action, is subjected at times to erroneous impressions. The intellectual powers are not able to apprehend in their entirety the innumerable facts embraced in the material and moral world, that crowd for recognition, and it not unfrequently occurs that the most promising fabric reared in the understanding, after exercising a long and tenacious hold on the mind, has to be abandoned as unstable and worthless. Opinions which, in early life, appear incapable of change—so firmly fixed as to escape all the vicissitudes incident to time and experience—in maturer years lose their original significance, and are finally lost sight of and supplanted by others more in accordance with truth and accuracy.

The mind, like its adjunct, the organ of vision, is not without its mirage, inasmuch that it possesses the unhappy tendency to mirror facts in nature the reverse of that in which they really present themselves. And to extend the simile, the effects of the diverse phenomena of the external world on the mind, are not unlike that of the aurora on the retina; as the optic nerve no sooner becomes sensitive to the peaks and pinnacles of polar light, than through the sorcery of some occult law, they fade and are transfigured into other forms, so does the mind, after apparently solving some problem of the universe, find it necessary to reconsider the premises involved, and rear its superstructure on a more enduring foundation. The Athenian bard and philosopher, Euripides, had something akin to this in mind when he penned this aphorism: "There is nothing in the world, no glory, no prosperity. The gods toss all into confusion, mix everything with its reverse, that all of us, in our ignorance and uncertainty, may pay them the more worship and reverence."

The student of philosophy has earned his greatest meed of praise, and has accomplished his greatest victory when, untrammelled by the tyranny of preconceived ideas, he has learnt to unlearn, in that such a course will enable him to arrive at a still greater degree of accuracy in his deductions through repeated and successive efforts.

Among the diverse conceptions with which the human mind is accustomed at times to indulge, is that comprehending the character and signification of the conditions in nature designated by those seemingly simple, but intrinsically abstruse terms, Time and Space. Were we to vouchsafe the subject only casual or passing thought, these appellations would convey ideas of tangible realities, as much so when applied to things included in the province of physics, as right and wrong signify forces which exist inherent in that of ethics. The belief appears to be general, even among the educated, and the idea is not without encouragement in our standard lexicons—that the correct and legitimate rendition of these words implies states which exist in and through themselves; that is, principles that occur in nature apart from, and independent of, a material universe. The average observer encounters a thousand examples in nature, that seem to corroborate such an assumption, every one of which appears so superlatively self-evident as to preclude the necessity for controversy. To one disposed to give the subject studious attention, however, it will readily appear that such a view is untenable and erroneous, that neither of these terms express ideas of physical conditions which may be properly regarded as absolute entities.

It is, perhaps, safe to assume that no principle embraced in the universe, possesses the attribute of making itself known to the senses, as existing separate and distinct from matter, not forging the several incidental forces which exist in nature, including indeed the human mind. It follows, then, as a legitimate and self-evident sequence, that both the principles, time and space, are not only inseparable from, but are also identical with, a material world, as much so as those properties of matter known as impenetrability, or the attraction of gravitation.

For convenience of illustration, we will examine the several data bearing on the two diverse shades of meaning of these terms in consecutive order, giving precedence to those relating to time. That a principle exists in nature which may be expressed by such colloquial terms as years, decades, centuries and cycles, is beyond dispute. From our earliest infancy we have this fact continually before us; still, it is readily ascertained that these words merely express to the judgment the idea of motion, as inherent in, and inseparable from, every phrase of material organization. Let us consider, for example, the space of time known as the civil year. This interval of duration embraces in whole numbers, twelve calendar months, or three hundred and sixty-five solar days, of sidereal computation. It will then appear evident to most persons, bearing in mind the fact that the year is capable of being divided into fractional parts termed months, and that each of these months is in its turn divisible into days, and remembering further that transactions that occur in January are certainly not enacted in May, that these facts must furnish conclusive evidence that time may exist in the character of an entity. But to arrive at accuracy in our estimates, it is only necessary to revert to the primal conditions which render the astronomical year, together with its concurrent factors, possible; and it will be seen that these conditions obtain, first, through the revolution of the earth around its primary orb, the sun; and second, through the revolutions of the moon around its primary, the earth; and third, through the earth's revolution on its own axis.

And another familiar example of the seeming passage of time, is that of a man engaged in walking, say from one street crossing to another. To the casual observer, this act appears to prove that a certain amount of "time" is necessary in accomplishing the journey, and that every object he encounters on the way, and every sound of his foot-fall, necessarily affords evidences of duration. But to elucidate the true aspect of such a circumstance, we will merely point out the fact that were it not for the principle of motion as manifested in a physical animal organization, viewed in relation to such material objects as may be encountered, the interval of duration occupied in making the passage, could not be conceived by the mind.

But the example which furnishes, perhaps, the most indubitable proof of all, in this connection, is the following: When we attempt to convey ideas of the fractional parts of a day, it is necessary to call into requisition some method of artificial measurement of duration, which can only be accomplished by employing artificial motion. This is exemplified in the origin, and in the universal use and application of the several terms hour, minute and second.

If we except the method of ascertaining the hour practiced by the Ancients, through the shadow cast by the gnomon in the sun-dial, which method was only applicable during a moiety of the interval occupied in the earth's diurnal revolution, no mode of determining the fractions of a day, other than that through arbitrary motion, has obtained in practice, from the primitive hour-glass used by our ancestors, to the complicated French clock resting on the mantel in the modern dwelling. We will take as a familiar example in illustration a common pocket chronometer. How every component part of this intricate piece of mechanism is calculated to subserve the purpose of causing its indicators or hands to move uniformly over a dial marked with intelligible characters, whose use is to designate the fractional parts of a day. This instrument, on first thought, appears to point out and record intervals of duration, and practically it accomplishes such an end; still, the actual result is merely to register the degree of force stored up in the springs of the instrument. Destroy the ingenious contrivance that records the fractions of a day, and the fractions themselves no longer exist. And through the same methods of reasoning, destroy the orbs involved in recording the fractions of a year, and these fractions are also destroyed. Annihilate the physical Universe, and time itself is annihilated.

And the superficial observer is equally unfortunate in his estimate of the physical conditions implied by the term space. To most minds this word signifies a principle, which like time may exist in the character of an objective entity; but again we find such an assumption to be altogether wrong. It is indeed impossible for the mind to conceive of extension existing separate and apart from a material world, albeit an authority in lexicography defines space as being "extension considered independently of anything which it may contain; that which makes extended objects conceivable and possible." It may seem little less than pedantism to oppose the professed interpreters of a language, and in doing so to ignore the expositor of abstruse, physical phenomena, who through their writings have permitted such interpretations to obtain, yet we find it impossible to accept these definitions, as they appear only capable of leading to anarchy and confusion in the understanding. So far as respects the former of these definitions, it certainly can be demonstrated that the mind is unable to entertain an idea of extension considered apart from contents; and in relation to the latter, the conditions necessary for the existence of extended objects is, not the presence of extension or space, but the absence of alien matter.

To disabuse ourselves of erroneous impressions in this field of inquiry, it may be found profitable to examine the condition in nature designated by the term space, in connection with familiar surrounding objects. Let us consider as an example present to all, the principle believed to occupy the interval between two hills. Now, although the existence of this interval is sufficiently apparent to admit of measurement, and the fact being conceded that the distance may be rendered either greater or less by changing the relative position of the hills, still it is nevertheless true that to annihilate from the mind all ideas of this interval of extension it is only necessary to remove the objects. This idea will be made still clearer to the mind by the following illustration: It is apparent that should we gaze into the atmosphere which surrounds us, and endeavor to establish definite limitations in space, unaided by the presence of material objects, the act would simply end in failure.

Another circumstance encountered in common life which must be accounted for, is the fact that standards of measurement are common and indispensable in the arts and sciences. The workmen in wood and in the metals have their rules and scales; the surveyor can accomplish nothing without his "Gunter's" chain; and the mariner recognizes in every mark on his sounding-line on index to the character of suspicious waters. It would seem to follow that, such being the case, absolute space or extension is indispensable for the very existence of these several standards of measurement, in that they imply extension to be measured; and moreover, that the media themselves could not exist isolated from such a principle. But it will again be seen that, so far from such a solution being a correct one, a medium of measurement can only be applied to extended objects in nature, or in their relation one to another; and that the numerical characters themselves could not be expressed were it not for the material substance which either forms their essence, (as in the example of the surveyor's chain) or with which they are connected. And again, the same mode of ratiocination is applicable to purely arbitrary methods of measurement. An instance in point is that of an astronomer calculating by parallax the distance of a fixed star, from two opposite points in the earth's orbit. Destroy the conditions that render such a computation possible, and the interval of space supposed to occur between the earth and the star, no longer exists. And strike out and annihilate from the mind that infinite Universe which is ever manifesting itself through the countless multitudes of astral worlds that scintillate and blaze in their respective paths throughout the firmament, and there is no longer a possibility of, nor a necessity for, conceiving a principle of absolute space.

Still every observer of psychological phenomena is aware that the mind reverts, and postulates a primordial time when the Universe did not exist,—even in the form of an ethereal nebulous mass. We are apt to believe that under such circumstances, the mind still retains the impression of space as existing apart from limits; and we are all familiar with the fact that when we attempt to grasp the startling conception of unlimited space, the mind reels from its own insufficiency, and recoils upon itself powerless and abashed! But it is only in the effort of the intellect to unite the several intervals of extension which subsequent stellar and planetary organization has called into being, into a grand integral whole, that such a circumstance occurs.

It is not remarkable, however, that the common mind should regard the conception of space as being able to survive in consciousness when all contents are expelled, when acute metaphysicians have suffered the same misapprehension. A question so occult in its character as to employ the attention—for illustrious examples—of such thinkers as Emanuel Kant, and Herbert Spencer, is well calculated to confound minds of average capacity.

The popular idea that there is no end to time, and no limit to space, is, however, in a sense correct, in that the universal, which gives occasion for these terms, is itself probably endless in duration and unlimited in extent. Infinite ages anterior to the time when man first left the impress of his foot on the soil of earth, did the world in some form exist; and other countless ages after we shall have passed away, will planets, suns, and constellations move on in their majestic courses through the azure vault above? And sweets of space so vast and unfathomable as to be expressed only by "distances that are counted only in heaven," stretch out from centre to circumference, till they multiply themselves into a fearful and unutterable product!

It is, however, quite apparent, that both the terms, time and space, considered as implying states which exist as absolute and objective entities, are misleading in their tendency. The true solution to the difficulty of their comprehension lies in regarding them as strictly relative terms, and it is indeed, only in this sense that they can convey to the mind any meaning whatever.

The Bible and Science.

[This letter is the last of a series, and therefore will not be so fully understood.]

To the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., Chancellor of New York University:

MY DEAR FRIEND: You preface your last night's Lecture, "the Bible on the side of Science," by admitting, by asserting, the conflict between "Religion and Science," but denying any inharmoniousness between the "Bible and Science." Pray, why has Religion ever opposed Science? Simply because Science contradicts the Bible! For no other reason on earth has there ever been a conflict between "Religion and Science," than because there has been one between the "Bible and Science." The conflict between "Religion and Science" has been an effect, of which the conflict between the "Bible and Science" has been the cause! Merely stating this is forcing you and everybody else to see it! And then you have annihilated your whole Lecture, even before you have begun. Shall I quote to you, that "a short horse is soon curried"? I will not, but proceed.

If you say it is not the Bible, but only a wrong interpretation of that book, that has hitherto led men to oppose Science, then you say that up to this time, men have either had a false Bible, or they have had no Bible. They have had what they got out of the Bible, what it revealed—and it revealed that or it revealed nothing! Take either horn!

And you can put your finger on the very passage where Timothy Dwight, D.D., LL.D., President of Yale College, and the greatest divine New England ever produced, says in his System of Christian Theology, that we have just as much reason to believe Creation took place in the precise manner narrated in the first chapter of Genesis, involving the six days of twenty-four hours each, as we have to believe it took place at all!

So, you yourself and all the rest have given up Genesis as it plainly reads and teaches—you are Infidel to it, Dwight himself being judge!

And you are all giving up everything as fast as Science drives you to—but still you will have it that it is the same old jackknife!

But what also kills you before you start, and what you have got to meet if you talk about Science, is that your infinite Universe makes impossible the very God who is to give you Bible! And that infinite Universe is the very foundation of Science! Here you are again!

But passing this, your whole Lecture, instead of manfully grappling with the difficulties confronting you, is a pusillanimous running off after false issues, a pitiful begging the question:

1. Your first argument to show the Bible on the side of Science is, that "Bible men" founded the Colleges and Universities, both in Europe and this country, which have educated the Scientists! Only the same "Bible men" who were all the time giving up the Bible, and becoming Infidels, but still dreamed the book good as new!

2. Your second argument is that "the very first Scientists are Bible men"! Only as they have given up almost the whole Bible, but still don't know but it's the same old jackknife! And yet are persecuted in one way or another for doing it, even to Newton himself! And in so far as they stuck to the Bible, made such mistakes (Newton's Gravity, Kepler's Laws and the like,) as Science now has to repudiate! And how about many of those who like Halley, Laplace and Humboldt, were Atheists? And how about Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, Wallace, Lyell, Helmholtz, and Youmans now?

3. Your third and fourth arguments directly assert and overwhelmingly prove, the Bible opposed to Science, thus: You make it teach that the Jewish Jehovah sent "hailstones" to help General Joshua rout his enemies in battle! And that he rained aerolites to help Colonel Deborah and Corporal Barak destroy the army of Sisera! And I understood you to vouch for the Sun and Moon standing still, on a similar august occasion and for a like end! And you say that Evolution is as utterly foreign to Science as the South Sea

Bubble! And you reveal your caliber and animus, in calling Spencer, Darwin, Wallace, Huxley, and Tyndall, "clever wags"! And yet you say "no such strong evidence for any fact cognizable to man can be gathered, as the evidences for the divine authorship of the Bible" which tells all these monstrous falsehoods, ten-fold more falsehoods than any other book in the English language, since it is the oldest book in the language, and so must tell most that is false! And you say that all our Civilization rests on the Bible, when for hundreds of years we have been having to outgrow the Bible, in order to reach our present Civilization—outgrow Slavery, and Witchcraft, and the Puritan Blue Laws, and Persecution (and we haven't got beyond it yet), and the four hundred mortal sins the Bible required to be punished with death, and the superstition that taught that a supernatural God did everything, and that made men look to him to do everything for them, and the religion that commanded to let all go but taking care of the soul and preparing for another world, and the awful holiness that solemnly warned against Science, and human, "carnal" Reason!—yes, the Bible had its origin in the absolute heathenism of a Baby-World, and you tell us it is the source of Civilization! And then you end all with preaching to us! It is your right, and we accept it, but the whole will go down to history as a most astounding marvel, the unapproachable miracle of the Nineteenth Century! That Chancellor Crosby, of the New York University, representing the Science of the world, speaking from the stand-point of the Advanced Knowledge of to-day, in one instant should shrivel and shrink to rehabilitating Balaam's ass, Jonah and the whale, Noah's flood, rams' horns, quails three feet deep, and all the rest, even to the jaw-bone of an ass! Who ever heard of such a fall before—to the insane drivels of Cotton Mather, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and the very depths of the Dark Ages!

At least I am kind, and also the Scientists will forgive you, though they will protest that they will hereafter choose their own bedfellows! But you ought to know that everybody is Infidel to the Bible; nobody believes it; the book is so outrageous and outlandish, nobody can believe it; there is not a page nor at last a single chapter, which is not full of the ignorance, superstition, absurdities and falsehoods of the dark age in which it was written: the whole account of Creation, in Genesis, means all those ridiculous and contemptible lies it tells—everything manufactured out of nothing; light three days before there was any Sun; all the rest of the heavenly bodies for the Earth; down to a man rolled out of clay, and then galvanized into life by breathing into his nostrils, and a woman made as an after-thought, out of one of his ribs; and all the plants and herbs of the field improvised before they grew, because it had not rained yet—created first, and stuck into the ground afterward [Gen. ii. 5.]; and even, the herbs and trees bringing forth and ripening their seeds and fruits, before there was any Sunlight [Gen. i. 11, 12.]; and God so utterly exhausted by his tremendous job, that he had to rest and "refresh" himself (the only reason for our holy Sabbath!)—besides the Bible asserting in one place that a certain king began to reign when he was two-and-twenty years old, but in another, when he was forty-two, and this last making a boy two years older than his father! [2 Kings viii, 16, 17, 25, 26: 2 Chron. xxi, 20: xxii, 2, 2.] Even you do not believe that, and then you are an Infidel! And all this time, the greatest falsehood in the whole, and running through the whole, that there was ever any more any being, to create, make Bible, and do all this, than there is to-day—but that their mere ignorance, which we have outgrown!

And so the only reason people think they believe such a book, is that they have explained it all away and made another out of it: to that first, old, real Bible they are Infidel, but they have put a new meaning into it and that they accept: they have corrected "Almighty God," just as the Foreign Bible Society corrected the mistake which makes the boy two years older than his father, but the American Bible Society has not! What fools, ever to have dreamed that there could be such a thing as an infallible book! Or then a Bible! So infinitely ridiculous that one day they will say that any man who ever thought so was a heathen, and tell the truth!

Chancellor Crosby, you are immortal! You have illustriously put your foot in it. People now will know the worth of all these Universities you extol, by the head of one of them believing in a snake talking to a woman, and universal Nature changed from the eating of an apple! No wonder it takes a University to write underneath that, "This is Science!"

But you dare not discuss. We defy you. There are a thousand persons in this city who would meet you to-morrow night! They would answer the affirmations you put in your third and fourth arguments, which I have not had time to. Believe me your brother for something better than heathenism can give us, as also, your friend willing to take as hard blows on Gravity or anything else, as I have given you on the Bible,

Dec. 8, 1874.

JOSEPH TREAT, M.D.

"SINCE the murder of Hypatia in the fifth century, when the polished blade of Greek philosophy was broken by the club of ignorant Catholic Christianity, Until to-day, superstition has detested every effort of reason"

Editors' Notes.

ENQUIRIES have sometimes been made of us whether Volume II of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be bound when completed. We have to reply that a limited number will be bound. We are saving numbers for the purpose. Those who wish a bound copy of the Second Volume will do well to send in their names before the expiration of the term. Orders filled as received—first come, first served.

Persons to whom sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER are sent, are requested, if they approve of the objects and aims of the paper, to give it their encouragement by allowing us to add their names to our list of patrons. There are thousands of Liberals in the country whose names should be on our list but are not.

OBITUARY NOTICES of the deaths of Liberals and friends of Free Thought will be inserted in our columns if the same are sent us by surviving friends.

Renewed Offers.

We are anxious to extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER so far as possible, and are disposed to give all the encouragement we can to the movement.

For $1.75 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER post-paid for one year, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For $2 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles," and either of the following works: "Lamb's Essays of Elia," Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," "Sentimental Journal," "Colleen Bawn," "Robinson Crusoe," "Gulliver's Travels," "Arabian Nights," "Burns' Poems," "Moore's Poems," "Milton's Poems," "Vicar of Wakefield," "Bell-ringer of Notre Dame," "Scottish Chiefs," or either of Marryat's Novels.

For $2.25 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Riddles," and Byron's complete works.

For $2.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Riddles," Shakespeare's complete works, and either of the works named in the paragraph above.

For $2.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," paper.

For $3.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," cloth.

For $3.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, Shakespeare's, Byron's, Goldsmith's and Milton's complete works.

For $3.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER and a set of Roger's best silver-plated Tea-spoons, which retail at $3.50.

For $3.75 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a set of Rogers' best silver-plated table-spoons, which sell at $5.00.

For $4.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Ladies' Own Magazine, a fine oil chromo in sixteen colors, and a set of Rogers' silver-plated tea-spoons.

For $5.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and one of "Calkin's Champion Washing Machines," which the Company invariably sell at $7.50. They are decidedly one of the best washing machines in use. Over 60,000 have been sold within two years—more than have been sold of any other washer in the same time. For representation and description see 14th page. The papers and premiums sent to one or more parties as desired. The papers and books always sent post-paid by mail; the washer and spoons by express.

Here, friends, are liberal offers. Those who accept them will obtain more than their money's worth in every instance. We hope every friend of the cause will take interest enough in THE TRUTH SEEKER to send us a few names, at least, upon some of the above propositions.

TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS.

We will still send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to trial subscribers for 25 cents.

For 35 cents the Paper three months, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For 50 cents the Paper three months, and either of the works mentioned in paragraph third, up above.

For 65 cents the Paper three months, and Goldsmith's Works, complete, illustrated, 375 pages.

For 75 cents the Paper three months, and either

Byron's complete works, 650 pages, and 21 illustrations, or Shakespeare's complete works, 1000 pages and 36 illustrations.

All postage prepaid.

Here is a fine opportunity to obtain standard works at half price, and THE TRUTH SEEKER three months included. The names of many trial subscribers have been received, and we are anxious for thousands more. Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, please make a little effort to send us all the trial subscribers you can. The outlay is very small, and the good resulting from it may be considerable. Let us hear from you.

True, "the times are hard;" we are in a position to realize it. While all are struggling to get through "the pinch," let THE TRUTH SEEKER not be forgotten.

PATENT BINDERS FOR THE TRUTH SEEKER.—Let us again call the attention of our readers to this convenient article. We now have a supply of them on hand. They hold the papers firmly, and are easily adjusted. The name, Truth Seeker, is in gold letters on the front cover. They are neatly made and give good satisfaction. Price, $1.10.

E. B. CAMPBELL, Armstrong Grove, Iowa, acknowledges the receipt of a large package of clothing, etc., from G. L. Henderson and J. L. Hamilton of this city, sent out for the benefit of the sufferers in "the grasshopper region." We hope many poor sufferers in that locality are kept from freezing by the clothing thus generously contributed.

In our last issue we called the attention of our readers to the advertisement of our friends and co-workers in the Liberal cause, G. L. Henderson and H. B. Brown. We again call attention to a fuller statement of their New Enterprise contained in the Supplement accompanying this number. We recommend them as entirely reliable.

ANTIQUITY OF CHRISTIANITY.—A pamphlet of 60 pages, by John Alberger, of Baltimore, published by Charles P. Somerby, 36 Dey street, New York. A concise examination and review of the origin and character of Christianity. The author has made thorough research in ancient church history. Quotations are made from the Christian fathers and early writers. He shows conclusively that the Christian fables were not original in Judea or Jerusalem, and that other nations hundreds of years before the Christian era had their saviors and that all the dogmas and ceremonies of the Christian Church were borrowed from the older heathen nations. As a text-book for authorities, for the information it imparts, it possesses much value. Price 35 cents. We will cheerfully mail it to any address.

CULTIVATION OF ART, and its relation to Religious Puritanism. A pamphlet of 48 pages, published by Chas. P. Somerby. An able treatise on the rise, progress and cultivation of art in different nations and its connection with religion in the past and present. Price 25 cents.

D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill. This staunch, sterling Liberal has just spent a few days in our city, on his way to the Paine Hall dedication in Boston, and we had an opportunity of making his acquaintance, and we found him one of the most agreeable, genial, intelligent persons we ever met. He is seventy years of age but seems as active and vigorous as a man of fifty. He has been an active business man for half a century, and has accumulated a comfortable competence. He is firm and unshaken in Liberalism and has been for many years. As the evening of his life approaches, he feels no lessening in the force of his life-time convictions, and appears to be more and more convinced of the correctness of the truths he in early life espoused. It does one good to meet such a hearty, happy person, and to feel the peaceful, inspiring influence he imparts.

As we write, Thomas Paine's birthday is drawing near, when the fine Hall which has this season been erected in Boston will be dedicated. We hope to be able to be present.

In the last Investigator we find the following kind notice of us.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER looks well, reads well, and we hope is well supported. Its Editor understands the rare art of making a good paper."

We thank our kind friends of The Investigator for their friendly words. We certainly wish them the prosperity and patronage commensurate with their earnest, efficient and long continued efforts in the cause of truth.

To show the potency and deadliness of some poisons, we call attention to experiments recently made by a French scientist and microscopist who took one drop of blood from a putrid animal and diluted it with a thousand drops of water and injected one drop of this into a live pig, which soon died from the effects of the poison. One drop of the blood from the dead pig was then blended with a thousand drops of water as before, and one drop of this was injected into another healthy pig which also died. Then a drop of the blood from the second dead pig was diluted with one thousand drops of water, and that injected into the third pig, and produced death as before. This operation was faithfully repeated—taking one drop of blood and adding to it a thousand drops of water and injecting a minute quantity of this into another pig until the fourteenth pig died from the poison. The last pig could not have received one-billionth part of the first drop of poisoned blood. It must, indeed, have been a virulent poison.

Conversation about Society and Churches.

BY G. L. HENDERSON.

DAUGHTER.—I do recognize the existence of industrial and professional men. But your closing remark is really an exposition of the weakness and worthlessness of a class who you still insist ought to continue in some form or other, as important and beneficent servants of man, or as important organs of the social body, whose function cannot be dispensed with.

FATHER.—Indeed I do insist that a specialized organ and its function become indispensable so long as the conditions remain under which their existence began. I freely admit the relative imperfection of all who have served the human race in the past, and you must bear in mind that where ignorance barred the way to progress and happiness it affected all alike. The shoemaker, in order to have the neat foot, tortured himself as well as his customer. The tailor, the dress-maker, while making garments for others on the plan of separating the abdominal from the thoracic viscera, had themselves to become models of the beauty which their art was supposed to create. The physician swallowed his own poison when sick as freely as he would order his patient to do so. So with the priest, who has led, as well as the devotee, who has followed. They have scourged themselves, starved themselves, imprisoned themselves, mutilated themselves in order that self-indulgence should not only cease, but that it might be impossible. Denying themselves every luxury attainable through the senses, in order that they might compel and enforce some degree of self-denial on others. All this resting upon the idea that piled up agony was the stepping-stone to bliss, the ladder by which to ascend to heaven, had not this idea taken root in the mind and found in the priest one who was not only willing to preach it, but also willing to practice it, man would to-day be still a naked savage, seeking shelter among rocks and dens like a wild beast, subsisting on human flesh, and at each meal devouring his last mouthful, to be again impelled by famine to seek for food, his life being a mere succession of hunger, apprehension and of terror. His wife a slave, his child a wolf's cub, a commodity both to be killed and sold as caprice or necessity might direct.

A time came when the priest—man's first philosopher—taught him to eat less to-day in order that he might have something to eat to-morrow. This taught him to live beyond the present hour, an accident then as now revealed to the wise man of the tribe, the fact that salt prevented the decay of flesh, and that food plenty to-day could be saved to supply the deficiency of to-morrow. Hence a surplus. That surplus gradually increasing, rendered it possible for this wise man to withdraw from the industrial to the contemplative life. Even his withdrawal from the love of woman, home, society, intensified his contemplative powers, and bore a rich harvest to society, in creating a class, from whom have sprung the arts of sculpture, architecture, painting and music. The first enabled man to transform the rock into an object of beauty, an ideal form. The second enabled him to rear dwellings and temples. The first became the home of his person and its adjuncts; the latter, the home of his gods, angels and saints—his ideals. At first he is content to live himself in a hovel in order that his ideals might live in a palace. His own dwelling interested himself alone, it being the product of his solitary toil. While the temple, the home of the gods, angels and saints interested all, and was therefore the product of all, and in grandeur, beauty and solidity, as much excelled the individual home as the aggregate wealth exceeds the individual wealth.

In painting, man seeks pleasure in the sense of beauty. Through this art mortality puts on immortality. The great masters have transferred to canvas the transcendent beauty of women, her tapering limbs, on whose transparent surface are seen the blue veins like streams of unsurpassed beauty winding around the voluptuous form now like a great river, now like a thread of azure, seeking inaccessible recesses as a little stream hides among the beautiful hills. The lips rioting in all the heart's wealth of blood as ripe fruit has stolen the sunlight, so beautiful indeed that we dare not touch it lest it vanish from sight; and the eye, mysterious orb, "inaccessible to itself," as it is indistinguishable by us, the dumb exponent of the soul within. It speaks without a voice, it pleads without a tongue, its beauty feeds you, but the sense of hunger remains. The painter trembles as he attempts, through you, to lift the veil that hides the soul within. When he can make the eye tell its tale of sorrow, grief or love, as did the artist who painted the sister of Garibaldi's priest in the act of interposing her own beautiful form between her brother and death from a dozen muskets leveled at his breast.

Here the eye told of fear, but it was not the fear of death to her. It told of love so deep, so all-absorbing, that had she possessed a thousand lives, she would have given them all away for his, as "frankly as a pin." It told of pity for the poor soldiers who were compelled to put to death their own best friend. In this Italian maid divinity stood revealed, with her crown of black hair floating in the wind. Her upraised hand, so fair, so spiritual that the sunbeams played through it. Her parted lips, and heaving breast; her eye, in which fear, pity, reverence, love all found utterance.

The brother trembles lest she whom he adores should even be touched by the rude winds of heaven. The soldiers drop their muskets in terror, and shut their eyes in horror to even conceive it possible that their hands should commit the sacrilege of wounding or even frightening a vision so fair. Thousands have gazed and wondered and worshiped at the shrine of this divine product of art. Though those beautiful forms must go back to dust in the earth, iron in the mine, and lime in the rock. The subjective, the ideal becomes immortal and transfers itself to succeeding forms through infinite time. The thinker evolves them in his inmost thoughts, crystalizes them in words and leaves them as a legacy to his race. The painter in a moment of inspiration transfers them to the canvas, and thus defies the grave to entomb the beautiful.

D.—I can hardly realize that in the short space of a thousand years a savage could, through any agency, be transformed from the beast, impelled by hunger and governed only by desire, eating human flesh, and ready to push into the grave wife or child, in order to prolong his own miserable existence, a century of which would now be deemed a poor exchange for one moment of life such as the beautiful Italian maid felt when she pushed her good brother—the true priest—back from the grave, and begged his life in exchange for her own.

I see everything in a new light now. The wisdom of the past may indeed become the folly of to-day. The stern, self-abnegation of the father which, in this wild search after justice, could be satisfied only with the death of God or the eternal torture of men, offering heaven and immortality to him who had crucified the flesh, and had scorned the pleasures of sense. And this crown of immortal glory was after all to be the offering of grace, and not the reward of merit, a something given because of the wish to do rather than from the fact of having done anything to deserve it. Since self-denial leads to such sublime possibilities, even though the steps be slow and the path crooked. From the cloister of the Middle Ages looked the prophetic eye of Roger Bacon, and saw steam and fire harnessed to the carriage not of the king, but of the people; and the air, like the sea, plowed by ships out-stripping the eagle in his flight as they pierce the ethereal blue. His philosophic eye gazed with wonder as he saw the sublime transmutations of matter from gas to solid and from solid to gas. The ignorant multitude clamored for his life, and but for the protection of a pope the father of chemistry would have been consumed in his own crucible in the prime of his life, and our civilization held back five hundred years.

But before closing this conversation, allow me to recall that part which referred specially to the doctrine of atonement for sin. The ethics of an early age, and to a great extent the ethics of the present, rests upon the idea of punishment for crime, being in some degree proportionate to the offense, and therefore its equivalent, as an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. You introduced as a means of illuminating the subject the idea of a weight equal to a pound, from which you went on to produce other pounds of any substance without end. Keep in view that each reproduced equivalent, left the original pound weight untouched or unchanged, and you left the inference to be drawn that, as in matter, so in ethics. The first offense could not be extinguished by the reproduction of any number of equal or similar offenses, and that to punish an offense would be simply reproducing it, and that if the first was wrong every subsequent reproduction would also be wrong. You have told me yourself about a judge who was about to pronounce sentence of death upon a boy who had stolen a sheep, and who complained that it was very hard indeed that his life should be taken as an equivalent for a sheep worth only 5s. sterling.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Illness of the Pope.

"The Pontiff is suffering from a chill. Serious alarms are entertained. Being born in 1792, he is now eighty-three years of age, and any new attack added to the gout, from which he is continually suffering, may bring fatal consequences. . . . The demise of the head of the Catholic Church might prove the signal for a general conflagration in Europe still more effectually than any number of German troops."—N. Y. Com. Adv., Jan. 19th.]

The Pope is like to die!

Well, what then?

What is that to you or I?

Not a pin!

Or if other human frauds,

Whom designing people laud,

Left their superstitious gauds

With their sin?

He is eighty-three years old;

What a life!

Selfish icicle so cold—

Child or wife,

Or the ties that true men feel,

That creation's plan reveal,

This mock-god would fain conceal;

Foolish strife!

Why the world should tolerate

In our day,

This self-sanctified old cheat,

Truth may say,

And the gout, with torture twist,

That great toe which fools have kissed,

Or the Infallible resist—

—Growing gray.

Why should Europe go ablaze

When he's gone?

Is it that "St. Peter's keys"

One by one,

Should lose their rusty catch

On the minds beneath their latch,

And that reason, like a match,

Light them on.

This puppet, made by kings

As an aid

To fetter reason's wings,

And degrade;

And in the name of God,

Let the toilers' necks be trod,

Till they bow and kiss the rod.

While they're made

The slave producing slave—

Take, O take unto the grave,

This soul-broker, who on heaven and Hell can trade.

P. E. C.

Woman vs. The Bible.

We heard some one say, not long since, that but for the women supporters of orthodoxy, the Christian Church could not long maintain its stand with all its humbug and nonsense. "'Tis true, 'tis pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true." We can account for this only on the hypothesis, that men are more spiritual than women. That the latter in their reach after the higher and better—the spiritual—cling to the Church, the accepted type of spirituality. I know most women will denounce this statement as false. I accept it and immediately jump at my conclusion. Women reach up after the spiritual; men reach down after the material. I am sure reaching up is the most creditable. Women, the types of materiality, get fearfully taken in by these spiritual reachers. 'Tis true, many women have failed to discover any trace of spirituality, after long years of study, in the masculine types, by whom fate has surrounded them. Caught by creatures of grace, only to find them graceless creatures after all. I constitute myself a special pleader for the much-abused, sterner sex; and the spirituality is there, only you haven't, dear sisters, discovered the way to it.

Women are indeed the powers that move the world, and it certainly is on the eve of an immense stride forward, since they are at last asserting themselves, rousing to the absurdities and nonsense so long palmed off as truth. They are wakening to the fact that man is not their oppressor. That the disabilities and restrictions which have so long narrowed their sphere, and cramped their powers, are not the result of man's oppression, but of the ignorance and false ideas upheld more strongly by themselves than by men. We have long since forgiven Eve and her apple (?) for the little trick she played us, but we will never forgive Christianity nor its founder for the miserable pigeon-hole assigned us in the world. If Paul had had much of an insight into feminine character, he would never have commanded woman to be silent anywhere, knowing that the tongue was the only weapon left her to use, and that she would use it in spite of him. Predominating now in the church, they have almost the whole say. Church and church societies have been almost the only change for women in the past, from the narrow sphere of home. We have nothing to thank for the enlargement of our bounds but free-thought and liberal ideas. They have shown us our wings, and that no limit can be put upon us but the limit of our own capacities. Few of us will become eagles in our soarings, and be enabled to bask in the glories of upper air; but even fluttering from branch to branch will be an immense satisfaction to us, who have so long been compelled to brood quietly in the home nest, watching the flight of our more fortunate brothers, often secretly comparing our wings with theirs, and feeling sure, if opportunity were given, we could many times outsoar them. The bulk of the liberal-minded women of to-day, while still clinging to the Bible as the word of God, and upholding its teaching, have only reached their present position by violating it both in spirit and letter.

Liberal ideas and Christianity are not compatible. To be a Christian is to blindly believe. To be a Liberal is to search and think for oneself. The term Liberal Christian is a paradox. Let the world disabuse itself of the idea that the two can go hand in hand. I said I could not forgive Christianity for its narrowness; rather I cannot forgive those who grope in darkness to-day, while the light of truth illumines the world.

A woman lecturer has recently admirably pictured the posture of Christianity. She says: "The last argument which is to crush us is the authority of the Bible. Frederick Maurice warned people of the danger they ran, when they 'turned the bread of life into stones to cast at their enemies.'

"Now, passing by the fact that many of us do not consider the Bible as the bread of life in any sense, I would suggest that, using it as a pebble to sling at the forehead of Liberty, has not in the past tended to exalt it, nor is it likely to be more successful in the future. For centuries Religion has stood with the Bible in her lifted hand, warning back each wave of the rising tide of liberty, and each wave has rippled forward, regardless of her threat.

"Let every soul be subject to the higher powers," said the Bible to Cromwell; and Cromwell, though he took off his hat to the Bible, struck down the tyrant who strove to enchain the people.

"Honor the king," said the Bible to Washington, and Washington defied the king and founded the American Republic.

"If a city be withdrawn to serve strange gods, thou shalt surely smite that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly," said the Bible to Alva, and Alva obediently hurried the Netherlands, and the people rose, fought for their lives and won.

"Cursed is Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren," said the Bible from ten thousand pulpits; but men arose, and swore, Bible or no Bible, slaves should go free.

"The Bible! why, it has bolstered up every injustice, bulwarked every tyranny, defended every wrong! With toil, and pain, and bloodshed have the soldiers of liberty wrung from the reluctant hands of priests and Bible-worshippers, every charter of our freedom, every triumph of our cause. But take heart, you who cling to your Bibles, as soon as we have gained this one step forward, as soon as it rings through the land that women are no longer in subjection, you will be able to claim as the offspring of your Christianity, that which, at its birth you anathematized. Each trophy of advancement, each symbol of triumph is claimed by the bibliolater as his, as soon as it becomes popular. You will be able to find in your Bibles a sanction for the development of womanhood, even as you have found room in the six days of Genesis for the vast cons of geology, and space in the petty firmament of Moses for the mighty facts of astronomy. The Bible is claimed as the true parent of freedom. It is the spirit of Christianity that has done all this, you say; when the letter said "kill," it meant "preserve;" when "obey," it meant "resist;" when "enslave," it meant "set free." So take courage, ye worshippers of a book, your idol will fall once more, but it can be re-mended. We mean to set woman free, to follow the guiding hand of nature; to fulfil every fair capability of her being; to develop every noble, intellectual power, and every passionate longing of her heart. Little care we whether or not our work squares with the rules of an old Eastern civilization. If Religion and the Bible grapple with us and try to stop or destroy, they must either stand aside or fall."

As we finished reading the admirable lecture, we felt that the first Savior of mankind did his work very imperfectly. His unfinished job must be completed. And that is being accomplished by Saviors in petticoats.

DI VERNON.

Jesus as Seen by Mr. Underwood.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:—In his first article on "Jesus Not a Perfect Character," Mr. B. F. Underwood accused him of teaching men to "take no thought for the morrow." In this Mr. Underwood followed our common English version of the New Testament. In criticising Mr. Underwood's position I called attention to the fact, that, the original Greek of the New Testament showed Jesus as saying a very different thing. The word he used was merimnao (your compositor mistook, and made it moridoro); I said that merimnao does not mean "to take thought," but it means "to be anxious." And thus it should have been translated for English readers; Jesus' real saying being, "Be not anxious for the morrow."

Mr. Underwood, in rejoining, says: "Now the fact is the Greek word mentioned has, like almost every other word, different shades of meaning. The exact meaning of such a word can be known only by the connection in which it is used. In the passage referred to, it is true the morrow does not mean the morrow must not be thought of, that the contemplation of it must be excluded from the mind; but it does mean not simply that we must not be 'torn with anxiety,' but that we must have no care or concern about the morrow in regard to worldly matters, that we should be entirely occupied with spiritual affairs."

It was not simply anxiety, as we understand the word, that Jesus forbade, but what we to-day would consider thoughtful good for the future. I will quote from the Sermon on the Mount. Mr. Underwood then quotes Matt. vi: 25-34.

Mr. Underwood is careless. As a lecturer, at this season, his mind is too much occupied for newspaper controversy. But, had he taken time, and looked into his Greek dictionary, he would have found that "anxiety" is the very essence of the word merimnao. No "shade of meaning" possible can make it mean less or other than "to be anxious." Jesus said, exactly, precisely, and only, "Be not anxious for the morrow." And no sound scholarship can, by any possibility, make the phrase under consideration mean anything else.

In the passage where the disputed word occurs, Jesus utters the phrase, as translated at present, "For after all these things [i. e. food and clothing,] do the Gentiles seek." This sentence Mr. Underwood italicises. He does so to make it appear that Jesus looked upon providing food—e. g. going a-fishing—as a heathenish act, Christians were to avoid it. Again Mr. Underwood would have done well to have consulted his Greek dictionary. He would have found that the word in the above quotation, translated "seek," needed revision. The Greek word zeteo means "to seek." That word occurs in a sentence soon following the one about "the Gentiles." "Seek ye first the kingdom of God," etc. In the sentence about "the Gentiles," the word translated "seek" is not "zeteo" but "epizeteo." The addition of the word "epi" to "zeteo," makes it mean "to seek with anxiety or misgiving or apprehension." Jesus' disciples sought food by fishing; and once, at least, we read he helped them at it. He was consistent with his teachings.

Mr. Underwood says, "Jesus taught we should be entirely occupied with spiritual affairs." Certainly, if Jesus said "take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." But I have shown, beyond any possibility of dispute, that he did not say that. Mr. Underwood is probably confirmed in his error by his misunderstanding of the nature of the business Jesus enjoined. For Jesus did enjoin a business in these words: "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you." Almost every one has been accustomed to confound the phrase "kingdom of heaven" with the word "heaven." Hence they have understood Jesus to mean, in the above command, "Seek to get to heaven, and be good," etc. Now, the phrase, "kingdom of heaven" must be broadly distinguished from the word "heaven," if a man means to have a knowledge of the gospels that shall be anything more than a mere superficial smattering. The word "heaven" means the world above; the phrase "kingdom of heaven" has a much broader meaning. James Martineau, whom Mr. Underwood quotes as very high authority in gospel matters, says, the phrase "kingdom of heaven" means "perfected society." Campbell, a scholar of the highest rank, says that in our gospels it should be translated "the reign of God." According to these great writers, the first branch of the business Jesus enjoins upon every man is, not to seek heaven, but "seek to make the condition of earth perfect." If a man ever conceived or heard of a grander ideal of business than that, I'll be obliged to him to put it into THE TRUTH SEEKER, where I can see it. The whole thing is clear enough to any man who will read the sermon on the Mount carefully and without prejudice. Jesus first tells us to pray, "Thy kingdom come . . . on earth as it is in heaven." That teaches us to look forward for what the world has generally considered a matter of the past, a "golden age." "But not alone pray for this," says the Master, "make it your life's business to bring it about, by working for it." Now, the ideal of heaven is a place where every one is abundantly supplied with all that is needed to sustain life and make it full and happy. Therefore, the man who is engaged in supplying anything that will make life perfect here, is so far striving to make earth like heaven, is, so far, "seeking the kingdom of God."

In my first article, in reply to Mr. Underwood, I said of Rationalists, that their knowledge of Christianity "is to the last degree superficial." In the article, to part of which I am now replying, Mr. Underwood quotes one of the most thoroughly informed of them, as follows: "Christianity in common with Buddhism," says Strauss, "teaches a thorough culture of poverty. The mendicant monks of the Middle Ages, as well as the still flourishing mendicancy at Rome, are genuinely Christian institutions." I have shown above, that Jesus enjoined upon men not to live by mendicancy, but to do for the world the most valuable business the imagination of man can conceive. And, had not the great German Infidel been "superficial to the last degree" in his understanding of Jesus' business precept, he could not have blundered so egregiously as he did in the above sentences.

2. Mr. Underwood says: "Mr. Willard tries to get rid of the objectionable utterances, 'Blessed be ye poor, for yours is the kingdom of God,'" etc. Had Mr. Underwood known enough of Jesus' teachings to be competent to examine them, he would have known that Luke is no authority for that Master's revelations. . . . Mr. Underwood continues: "The verses which I quoted from Luke, are not inconsistent with words ascribed to Jesus by other New Testament writers. 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven.'"—Matt. xix: 24. Jesus does, indeed, as Matthew tells us, enjoin upon men not to get rich. "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth," is unmistakable. Luke, on the other hand, reports him as instructing men to live in poverty. If Mr. Underwood cannot see the vast difference between these two positions, he has less perception than other men. Crowds of very wise men—not believers in the bible, all of them—have been struck with the great sense and beauty of the prayer of Agur, "Give me neither poverty nor riches." And the "golden mean" between the two has been the theme of some of the most approved and admired literature of the world. And here let me show how time vindicates the Master's supreme wisdom. Last winter Mr. Beecher, a remarkable indicator of the growing opinions of his time, stated most emphatically, in one of his lectures, that we must have laws preventing the accumulation of great fortunes. At the anniversary of "the Boston Tea Party," last Summer, Mr. Wendell Phillips, in lauding the grand statesmanship of Jefferson, said, that "the Jefferson of to-day is employed in devising means to prevent the acquisition of great wealth by individuals." Thousands of very able men, who are not believers in Jesus, see clearly that the effort among our people to "lay up for themselves treasures upon earth," is doing more for the ruin of our race than all other causes combined. The wisdom that, eighteen hundred years ago took ground against this evil, must have been unerring.

Other points in Mr. Underwood's last article I hope to answer in future numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

JOHN B. WILLARD.

Still River, Worcester Co., Mass.

To whom do we Look for the Origin of Christian Civilization.

A correspondent within a few days has stated some facts in the illustration of this subject that are worthy of consideration.

Several communications in the 15th of December issue having revived associations connected with this subject, I revert to the facts brought to light by the lectures of two Asiatic foreigners in our Metropolis a few weeks since. From the specimen already obtained, it appears probable that great secrets may be yet revealed to the truth seekers of the present day, from the fact that the literature of the East is now thrown open to their research by introducing to them, not only the educated men from that quarter of the world, but also their various sources of information touching their past and present state of religion, showing that the same rules of criticism should be applied to every species of literature.

W. H. J.

Newton, Pa., Dec. 19.

EXTRACT FROM THE CORRESPONDENT'S LETTER.

"Did you see the synopsis of the speeches made by the Chinese and Persian speakers at the Academy of Music less than a month ago? They proved pretty fairly that our 'advanced Christian civilization' is due to the observance of the teachings of Confucius uttered 300 years before the birth of Christ, and stolen (as printers will steal,) by us, without credit to the author? And have you seen Macmillan's Magazine for November, 1874—'The Oldest Fairy Tale in the World'—written thirty-two centuries ago, by one of the scribes of the Pharaohs? There is a story running through several chapters, in scripture style, in which we have a history—a fable, like that of Joseph and the frail woman—and incidents of craft and attempted murder, with miraculous rescue, the parallel of those enacted by Joseph's brothers—with the accompanying pit and bloody clothes? I wish you would procure it. I think the author of 'Modern Chronicles' would perceive that one story was begotten by the others. The editor of the Telegraph sent it to me. If I had it of my own, I would forward it. I think as the literature of Persia, India, China and Japan are opened to us, we will find that we owe our moral precepts, our religious ideas, and our religious superstitions, too, to those people. But not our 'Ilan of Salvation!' That was invented, or at least given practical working, by our people. It is, too, being improved every year. The machinery being complicated—by new belts and cogs, and levers, so as to do other work than that at first designed, and involving a necessity for a greater variety of workmen and increase of salaries. It would be a sad blow to the plan, if it should be proved that it had been patented a thousand years or more before the present claimant was born!

H. C.

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. III.

FRIEND B.: You say "there are many things not only ifs and perhaps, but positive inventions which ignorant Christians accepted as truth, but Jesus is a more notorious character than Augustus Cæsar, and his history greatly more authentic because its oral and written progenitors were as incapable of inventing the character they describe as I am of repeating it in my life, or of making a world, and so far as having a motive to lie, had a motive as valuable, at least, as their lives for suppressing that knowledge which they imparted."

Now it is no marvel that not only ignorant but educated Christians accept positive inventions as truth, when we consider who and what were the founders of Christianity. The learned Dr. Semler of Liepsic, said, "It is an undeniable fact that the first Christians were the greatest liars and forgers that had ever been in the whole world, and that it was their best scholars, the highest in rank and talent, who were the practitioners, of these forgeries," and Paul also advised Christians to lie for the good of the Church, and indeed it has always been thought to be a virtue to do so.

If the evidence of the existence of Christ depends upon the testimony of such men as these, what is it worth? And as to not being able to invent such a character that is mere assertion. All the ancient classics, poems, tales, traditions and other books that have come down to us from past ages, prove that men were always capable of inventing greater and better lives than any one man could live out in his own nature. It is easy to bring together in one's imagination all the separate goods in all humanity, and combine them so as to form one individual who shall be greater, wiser and better than any "Son of God" that ever yet trod this earth. Therefore I claim that it was possible that just such a character as that called Christ could have been created by his reputed historians, and doubtless was created, because there is no evidence aside from the Bible, and little, if any, in the Bible, that is reliable, to prove that he ever existed! And if he did he was far from perfect in that very history. And again, granting the Bible account to be real biography how do we know even then that it is a fair statement? No biographer can write a true life. If he loves too well he is blind to faults. If he hates he is blind to virtues. If indifferent he has no real stimulus to write at all; and again as to his reputed biographers "having a motive as valuable, at least, as their lives, for suppressing that knowledge they imparted," that is no argument at all. If they really believed in him and were honest, they were compelled through their conscientious scruples, to speak as they believed; but belief never created facts. More, a thousand times more, have been martyrs for error than for truth. Self-evident truths never need proof, but things that are impossible to be known are generally what men are always martyring themselves over. It is just as easy to die for a false belief as for a true one, as long as one has real faith, and his martyrdom only proves his sincerity, not the reality of the thing professed.

Again you say "I should like very much to have the sciences universally diffused, but they have no existence except under the shadow of the cross."

Mere assertion, without a shadow of proof. The real mission of the cross or church is to crush out all science, all knowledge, all happiness, all truth, everything that does not help to build up Christianity as its first aim. Everything else must be secondary, or not be at all. The one assertion that "God made all things" has been the greatest stumbling block to real knowledge the world has ever known. The geology of the earth was for hundreds of years a forbidden book because its facts could not be made to come within "the shadow of the cross," or to tally with the account of the Bible creation. But after many generations of scheming, contriving and fixing up, a pretence is made of the two being "reconciled," and Mahomet has gone to the mountain since it would not go to him. Where science and religion conflict the latter always has to yield in the end, though the "shadow of the cross" so often defers that end, making it so much more difficult to reach; but the world does move. All life is evolution, and thought is free, even though the cross casts its shadow still. But that shadow grows dimmer and dimmer and very soon it will fade entirely from view and the battle of science will be won.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va.

Ancient and Modern Spiritualism.

[We clip the following from a spicy article in a late number of the N. Y. Herald.]

I find a singular confusion of ideas in the Old Testament as to the personality of the manifesting "spirit." Whoever appeared was called the "Lord." Take Abraham's case—"And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre as he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day; and he lifted up his eyes, and lo! three men [in buckram?] stood before him." This was a strong case of materialization, as the three "did eat" the veal cutlets and johnnycake which Sarah made ready, and then (in different verses called "he" and "they" and the "Lord") made wonderful prophecies. You see our orthodox friends find themselves in an "Eddy" as soon as they begin to read with their eyes open.

Genesis, xxxii.—Jacob wrestles, "collar and elbow," all night with a materialized spirit, who gets no advantage over him until he takes an unfair hold and puts the patriarch's thigh out of joint. This, like many of the others, ought to be counted out anyhow, as it was a dark seance and there were no witnesses. This spirit was "nowhere" as soon as the light was turned on.

Genesis, xlv.—Joseph puts himself among the ordinary Egyptian "diviners" by sending after his divining cup. Divine, nota bene, that all these ancient wonder-workers only claimed to "go one better" in the same line as the ordinary magicians.

All through "the plagues of Egypt" we find that when Moses changed rods to serpents, turned rivers to blood, brought up droves of frogs, etc., the "magicians did so with their enchantments." He "stumped" them first on the plague of lice. Then they gave up beat. But he gave them a fair chance and did not scorn the competition. The reason of this is that they were the orthodox diviners of that time, and he had to show his hand or "go hang."

Exodus, xxxi.—In the Sinai manifestation there was "slate writing" on a large scale, but Moses got angry and broke the first stone tables, and he was forty days behind the cloudy "curtain" before he produced the second set.

Numbers, xvii.—Aaron's rod buds. Any cunning magician can make plants grow "miraculously."

It will be found that most of the wonderful things spoken of as seen and heard by the old prophets, were encountered by them when in the condition described by Balaam, Numbers, xxiv.—"Which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open." Take away the dreams and solitary trances and commonplace clairvoyance, and the "miracles" become very few.

In Joshua vi., is recorded the greatest "tipping" manifestation in history. It took the Jews seven days to "prepare the magnetic conditions" for tipping over the walls of Jericho. The whole people formed a circle all around the city on seven successive days. They concentrated their will, power and magnetic force upon the wall as one man. Then "music was called for," and the priests tooted on the ram's horns. Instead of singing a dismal song like a modern spirit circle, the whole people shouted with a will. No wonder the wall fell (if it ever did), though no mention is made of sappers and miners.

Judges, xv.—We find Sampson at the rope and cabinet trick. He had himself tied successively with new cords, green withes and new ropes; but every time the "committee" approached the medium to examine the knots, the stupid fellow, instead of slipping the ropes off, broke them by main strength and awkwardness. At his last seance, though his eyes were bandaged, he smashed the cabinet and the affair broke up in a row, with many sore heads.

1 Kings, xviii.—Elijah called down from heaven a fire that consumed a sacrifice, a stone altar and the water in a trench. Well, they say that an old woman up at the Eddy's made a fire burn by pouring water on it. Shall we believe the old story sooner than the new? "Do gray hairs make folly venerable?"

2 Kings, iv.—There is commotion in the Syrian Court, because "Elisha the prophet that is in Israel (and many miles away) telleth the King of Israel the words that thou (Syrian King) speaketh in thy bed chamber." Very simple clairvoyance. Some of the "seventh sons," who advertise in the Herald, can equal it.

2 Kings, xxii.—Hezekiah is magnetized into thinking that he sees "the shadow brought ten degrees back in the dial of Ahaz."

1 Chronicles.—David produces plans and specifications for a temple, and says, like many a modern writing and drawing medium, "All this the Lord made me understand, in writing by his hand upon me—even all the works of this pattern."

Daniel, v.—We find Israel's great prophet, Daniel (in accordance with a previous statement), gratefully receiving the position of "master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans and soothsayers," and ever ready to beat them at their own games.

In the same chapter we read about "the part of the hand" that wrote on the wall; but no expert, like Oleott, handled that hand, "finding no arm behind the wrist," or looked for a hole in the plaster. Can we trust the old test more safely than the thousand new materializations?

Turning to the New Testament, and conning over the stories there, so variously rehearsed by the different apostles, the story of the miraculous feeding of 5,000 persons is seen to stand out most prominently. If the statement is to be credited at all, modern science shows us that the most likely explanation is that the 5,000 were magnetized into a belief that they were being fed. If the modern materializing of all sorts of things by spirit power were credible, we might suppose this food concentrated from the atmosphere; but as that is out of the question, and as we find such men as Mr. Beecher able to convince even an audience of 5,000 of anything, the first theory seems the right one.

The "Transfiguration" scene, and others where unearthly lights appeared, seem capable of a natural explanation, after reading the writings of the great anti-Spiritualist, Baron Reichenbach, who showed that a light called by him "odyle," emanates from magnets and from the magnetic poles of the human body. A great accumulation of this by will-power might be visible in the day time.

The stories about the healing of the sick are nearly paralleled in our day, without making much impression on the general public. A few years ago the wonderful healing power of the Zouave Jacob, of Paris, brought such crowds around him that the priests became fearful for their goddess Diana, and the government was induced to force his withdrawal from the business. We hear frequently of "healing mediums" in this country, whose offices are thronged for months by such crowds as no doctor draws; but we all know that this is only the result of the fact that the credulity of the people has been aroused by the uncommon power of a mere magnetizer.

The perception by Jesus that a certain man would be willing to have him keep the Passover in the upper chamber, his seeing Nathaniel under the fig tree, his knowledge that the owner of a certain "foal of an ass" would put the same at his service, his perception of the treachery of Judas and Peter are of the same style of "clearseeing" as that everywhere practised, with varying success, by fortune tellers, astrologers and clairvoyants in this city. Nobody but simpletons pay much attention to these phenomena now occurring about us; why will the religionist make such a bother about similar things said to have occurred thousands of years ago, at a time when scientific investigation was impossible.

Again, the miraculous draught of fishes. Why, clairvoyance could show the seer just when and where to order the net dropped, as certainly as an "inside view" can show a Washington official when to telegraph to his Wall street pal to "go in" on Pacific Mail or Union Pacific.

Acts, viii.—The spirit of the Lord caught away Phillip, and he was found at Azotus, miles away. So now, we have so-called well authenticated stories about Home and other mediums being hoisted long distances through the air; and what sort of people are they who swallow these yarns? Yet many of our solidest men really seem to believe the old story.

Acts, xii.—It is thought a wonderful thing that a light shone in Peter's prison and his chains fell off. There certainly have been some queer concentrations of magnetic light around some of the mediums, and they have a queer way of shaking off handcuffs; but if we find so many ways of explaining these phenomena on rational grounds, why make such a time about the bare possibility of one Peter having had the same experience 2,000 years ago?

I have thus shown how readily these old stories can be put in the same boat with the new ones. If any of the D.D.'s "cry for more," I am ready.

St. Rocco.

What is Religion?

It is very easy to ask a question, but not always so easy to answer it intelligibly, so that all may comprehend the answer. Among these questions (for in religion there are many,) that have come down to us with scarcely a thought of their meaning, and what idea they were intended to represent. Our ancestors, as we may call them, though not of the same race, yet form a part of our antecedence, and the ideas of one became engrafted upon the ideas of those who were our immediate ancestors. The idea attached to the word religion has, perhaps, a greater diversity of conditions than any other word in our language. When we see a barbarous race giving attention to, and going through a ceremony ever so rude, we say he is at his devotions, which is another word for religion; we may thus trace this religious idea through all nations that claim a civilization above savages, who are so low in the scale of humanity that they rise but little, if any, above the brutes that have no thought whatever upon the subject.

A principle or force of so universal acceptance, and so diversified in its character and influence, demands of us Infidels a clear understanding of its import, for without this confusion reigns supreme. Webster gives it, "Religion, to bind, an oath, an obligation, a belief," etc. Perhaps, we may say, if we must reduce the word to one point, the definition, to bind, covers all essential points, for we find it so practically in all forms of religion.

The religious sentiment or idea among those who give its first impress are, according to Lubbock, savages very low in the scale of humanity. They admire something that strikes their fancy, without any apparent reason, except what the object possesses within itself, beyond which they have no idea; a simple isolated attention to some object that partakes of a religious character; that is, they seem bound to it for no other motive, apparently, than simple admiration.

This principle in man has been, and is now, used by men to obtain influence over their fellows, and it is through this influence that cunning men have imposed upon others their views of the way this adoration should be performed; thus a system has grown up among men which we call religion, having its inception in admiration of some natural object, this feeling taken up by sharp, cunning men and made use of to aggrandize themselves by the ignorance of those around them. This single fact, in time, has grown up among mankind until a morbid sensibility has become the prevalent force governing the higher civilization.

It is not necessary to trace the influence of religion on the civilized races, for its influence is well known as having blotted out most effectually, all true sociability, dividing "parents from children," and causing discord in families that would not exist if not produced by a religious sentiment—by an organized priesthood. We might have this principle, religion, from point to point, and from age to age, and find it always the cunning few, imposing upon the confiding and ignorant multitude. It was a simple and consistent process, that artificial objects would take the place of the natural; convenient and cunning devices would easily follow the absence of more familiar ones, and thus cunning men have, in time, become sole proprietors of the religious thought of their fellows.

Religion, then, is a thing of growth, and always conforms to the education that the young have lived under; variable, because the conditions vary, and in fact the circumstances surrounding all society is the prime cause of the great variation in the religious opinion of the people. This religious, morbid feeling has produced its sequence in emotional sensibility, producing, first, confused ideas, a wandering of the mind, a resort to stimulants, madness, suicide or murder.

The priesthood have imposed upon their adherents the presence of supra-mundane or spiritual power, whom they control; the ignorance of the masses, together with their fear, gives them power over this mass, who feel, without knowing why, a pressure that produces this morbid sensibility that leads to the acts spoken of. This feeling on the part of the faithful, is called by the cunning priest an evidence that they have sinned, and their services are needed to remove it, as they are the agents appointed by God for this purpose.

This, then, is the condition of the civilized world to-day. The whole religious world, nay, even among some we call savages, feel there is something wrong, the savages have no name for it, the civilized races call it "Sin," or another word is added, calling it "Original Sin." Now, if we examine this idea, that original sin means, we will find it enclosed entirely in the religious fervor, influencing the minds of the people; they feel oppressed, or in other words, something is wrong; this something, then, we know to be purely ideal, yet it is imposed upon the deluded people as a reality, and they feel it as such, because their emotional organization is affected in a manner the same as from reality. We thus find that Religion per se is the "Original Sin," under which the human race is groaning; all emotional influence acting upon man through the imposition of these cunning priests for their own aggrandizement, is what oppresses mankind, and through their ignorance not knowing any better, they submit to the priestly diction, only to be drawn deeper into their toils. Yes, religion is the original sin that curses mankind.

L. T. W.

Carondelet, Mo.

"MILLIONS upon millions were sacrificed upon the altars of bigotry. The Catholic burned the Lutheran, the Lutheran burned the Catholic, the Episcopalian tortured the Presbyterian, the Presbyterian tortured the Episcopalian. Every denomination killed all it could of every other; and each Christian felt in duty bound to exterminate every other Christian who denied the smallest fraction of his creed. In the reign of Henry VIII—that pious and moral founder of the apostolic Episcopalian Church—there was passed by the Parliament of England an act entitled "An act for abolishing the diversity of opinion." And in this act was set forth what a good Christian was obliged to believe."

"THE Church hates a thinker precisely for the same reason a robber dislikes a sheriff, or a thief despises the prosecuting witness."

"TYRANNY likes courtiers, flatterers, followers, fawners; and Superstition wants believers, disciples, zealots, hypocrites, and subscribers."

"THE Church demands worship—the very thing that man should give to no being, human or divine."

New-York Liberal Club.

JANUARY 15th, 1875.

The lecture this evening was by Dr. Heitzmann, a learned scientist and microscopist, recently from Vienna, where he has won an enviable reputation as author and microscopic student upon

THE STRUCTURE OF THE HUMAN SKIN.

He illustrated the subject by splendid diagrams and drawings by himself. The lecture was a learned one and contained information upon the subject never before brought to the knowledge of the audience. As the lecture contained numerous technical terms, and as the accent of the delivery somewhat prevented a perfect understanding, and as we hope in a future number to be able to lay the lecture before our readers in a more perfect form than we are able to present to them now, we decline making a report at this time.

After the lecture, a lively discussion took place upon the subject, participated in by Prof. Ellsburg, Mr. Nash, Dr. Atkinson, T. B. Wakeman, Dr. Heuber, Dr. Hallock, and Dr. Cook. A little feeling was excited for a few moments, but was amicably settled.

JANUARY 22nd, 1875.

The subject of the lecture this evening was, "Do Eleemosynary Institutions Benefit Mankind?" which was very ably handled by the lecturer, Mr. Charles Moran.

The subject appertains to Political Economy, or rather to Sociology which is one branch of it. Some deny either to be a science. Let us see what science means. Formerly it meant anything systematically arranged. To-day it applies to laws, forces, impulses in active operation. Tested by that rule, Political Economy becomes a science, relating to the laws governing man in the social condition. The science of Astronomy has only reached its present perfection through long years of patient and unremitting research and analysis. Man has never been analyzed. Only when that is done will Sociology become a science; and the principles and laws governing man's actions be fully understood. Law means a force or impulse. Violating we suffer penalty, obeying are rewarded. Hence we see the folly of man-made laws—when for our code we should look only to the higher laws which control every atom in the Universe. The moment we meet with suffering we know that some where there has been a violation of law. An infringement of a natural law always results in this.

Man is born with innumerable latent wants, and also a craving to satisfy them. The first natural want is food, and as he develops, other wants are created which become as much a necessity as a desire for food. First comes the lowest or animal; afterward the intellectual. These latter bring far the greatest joy and satisfaction; they never cloy or grow stale. Labor is one of the necessities of life. It is only through its division that any progress has been made in the world. It is in this distribution, every one doing his part, that the world has advanced. We see every day some reformer comes forward to suggest means of improving the race. It would be far better to leave it to nature. Communism, trades-unionism, &c., &c., are all signal failures. Every soul should be left to act as self-interest dictates. There is a great cry against self-interest. Nothing is more absurd. Time will come when the muscular labor of man will not be needed, except to direct the operation of the forces of nature. Man loves distinction and will always seek it. In the future there will be none except that of intellect and intelligence.

The good of one is the good of all; and the evil in the world effects all humanity. The effect of charity is one of the most damaging and degrading in the world. It interferes with the plans of nature. The priesthoods always advocate charity; being non-producers themselves, they cry charity. Look at the convents in the world. But, you say, what would become of the poor if convents were abolished. You forget how much greater benefit to the monks and priests they are, in comparison to the little help they afford the poor. To-day charity is a trade, as much as commerce or anything else. What is charity? It is taking from the producer or laborer and giving to the idler. When we supply a want even in a child without some return, we retard nature. There is a government-board of charity, which is simply a system of taking from the industrious and giving to the shiftless and non-producers. If the doctrine of self-dependence were taught us, that if we ever came to the verge of starvation there would be no help for us—no charitable institutions to take us in, do you think young men would turn to grog shops and in thousand ways squander their means? Throw away the prop that alone could sustain them in the future? Every fine building, every advance in science, every improvement, is due to the compounding sources of those acquired. But, you say, would you let the little child or the aged, the sick, the infirm suffer? No; there is that instinct in the human breast, that will supply such wants. But these should not be regular institutions which a man feels he can rely on at any time. Man does not labor for himself alone; he labors for his loved ones. Children should always be cared for by relatives; never be fed, or clothed, or educated at the cost of the community. When a man can get a thing without labor he will make no effort to obtain it. Habit of labor has to be learned, and is a pleasure, especially if crowned with success, and will be so if pursued with diligence. When the time comes that I can get of my fellow-man only as I give in return, when self-interest and competition are left untrammelled by law, then we shall have the millennium, so long dreamed of, but which neither the Christian Church nor any other institution has ever given us; and what indeed has it given us but bloody wars? Insurance is another form of making one part of the community suffer for the carelessness and neglect of the rest. Goethe says we may grow up under the tenderest, fostering care, every want supplied, every desire gratified, but we shall eventually be thrown back upon ourselves. Mr. Alger says, "If I loved all men with the same intensity that I love myself, it would prove my ruin. The divine plan is the best." The law of life then is, "primarily for oneself, secondarily for all."

The first criticism offered was by Mr. Wehle. He objected to Mr. Moran's patent formula for curing the ills of humanity. A close observer will find that general rules will not meet all cases since the exceptions are nearly as numerous. Of course we don't give anything except we get it from some other source, and probably Mr. Moran is the only man in New York that don't require any help from his fellows. I do often. The speaker's views on eleemosynary institutions were correct. But they exist and have become a necessity and can not at once be abolished.

MR. ORMSBEE next spoke. He said the speaker was the Plato, he the Aristotle of this subject of self-interest. He had entertained the idea that most people have, that God's charities were all right. After reading Herbert Spencer on that subject, I concluded it was a great wrong. One idea I got from this was that public charities kill private ones. That is, we pay some one to do what we should do ourselves. If there is any efficacy in prayer it must be done for oneself.

DR. HALLOCK followed, showing that society had a duty to individuals, as well as they to themselves. Too many mistake philanthropy for justice. The Church, boasting of its work, points to its hospitals and charitable institutions. They are rather its shame.

MR. NASH would show where he disagreed with the speaker. Pain and suffering were not always the result of the violation of natural law, but the means often for our development, rather than our punishment. The law of life should rather be, "from each according to his ability, to each according to his need."

DR. LAMBERT acknowledged Mr. Moran to be a master of finance, and in that he should always humbly sit at his feet. But on this subject he must criticize. The speaker said children should be cared for by their relatives; brother by brother, etc. But who is my brother? The man next me—who needs me. With regard to insurance he would say from experience that he knew life insurance to be conducive to life and peace. That the satisfaction of knowing our families would be provided for, was a great blessing, and promotive of a satisfaction here. (It is needless to say the Dr. is President of a Life Insurance Company.)

MR. WAKEMAN, at the close, addressed the meeting with regard to the recent rejection of Dr. Joseph Treat as a witness in the case of Truman vs. Woodhull, Claflin & Co., on account of his not acknowledging any religious belief, (which was referred to in our last issue). He said if allowed to stand unchallenged it would afford a bad precedent, and at any time exclude Liberals who refuse to swear on the Bible, or subscribe to somebody's God.

The following resolutions were submitted and passed, and a committee of five appointed to attend to the case.

The undersigned, officers and trustees of the N. Y. Liberal Club, request the President and Vice Presidents of the Club to appoint a committee to see that the case of Truman vs. Woodhull be appealed; that the right of every man in the State of New York to testify be thereby secured and maintained. That said committee collect the necessary funds for the purpose and account to the Club therefor. And also that they confer with other societies for that purpose.

(Signed)

COURTLANDT PALMER,
W. L. ORMSBEE, Jr.,
D. T. GARDNER,
T. B. WAKEMAN,
R. T. HALLOCK,
HENRY EVANS.

Committee:

JAMES PARTON, Pres.,
COURTLANDT PALMER,
CHARLES MORAN,
T. B. WAKEMAN,
D. T. GARDNER, Sec.

REV. CYRUS OLIVER, of the Zion M. E. Church, Jersey City, has been arrested for traducing two young ladies. Justice Corrigan held him to appear and answer at a subsequent trial.

Heathens of the Heath.

Among the friendly notices taken of this interesting work, we clip the following from The Banner of Light:

"THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH, by William McDonnell, author of 'Exeter Hall,' is a new book of five hundred pages, and is a bewitching, mysterious, and powerful fiction, which its readers pronounce to be such at once. 'Exeter Hall,' as is well remembered, was a theological romance; the 'Heathens of the Heath' surpasses it in the vivid sketches of character whose actions develop the most remarkable religious possibilities. Theology is generously discussed in its pages, but not didactically or in set phrase; it is done in living dialogue, by the changing panorama of incidents in perpetual motion, and through the conduct of its most striking characters. We could not pretend to give an outline of this fascinating romance in the space to which the present notice is restricted; suffice it to observe that for all that is startling yet truthful, radical and attractive, novel and wonderful, powerful and noble, it is one of those books which are written, not to die with the single sensation it creates, but to leave an impression on the mind that will prove indelible and lasting. The romance is entirely religious, but in a large and liberal sense. It elevates the reader's thoughts to a very high plane, and expands them to the real and vivid comprehension of the grandest and most beautiful truths. It is an entirely new era in popular literature when religion is powerfully presented in fiction, and so as to stir and stimulate the hungering soul instead of burying it still deeper under a load of precepts and dogmas borrowed from tradition, priestcraft, and the creeds. Read this book, all you who would enjoy an entirely fresh and healthy spiritual sensation. Published by D. M. Bennett, New York.

Badly Frightened.

A friend in Iowa sends a local paper containing a letter referring to friend B. F. UNDERWOOD, who was advertised to deliver a lecture at Oskaloosa:

"AND SATAN CAME ALSO."

EDITOR REFORM LEADER: In looking over your last issue I was startled on observing an announcement that B. F. Underwood, the great exponent of Materialism, would visit our city, and lecture at City Hall, on the evening of January 9th and 10th, 1875. Subject, Bible Prophecies Falsified by Facts of History.

Now, I will not attempt to answer this gentleman in advance, but will predict an entire failure on his part to prove his position.

It appears he is here at the solicitation of "The Liberal Association." Who constitutes the Liberal Association? Where do they hold their meetings, and what object do they have in sending for this self-admitted Infidel and Materialist, whom we admit to be no mean champion of a dangerous cause? We know the man and have heard him lecture on several occasions. He denies the Bible and the truth of the Christian religion, the existence of a personal God, and the immortality of the soul. His doctrine once accepted gives birth to crime, takes away responsibility for conduct, makes the intemperate and licentious the equal of the pious and self-sacrificing, provided they can succeed in evading the statute or human laws of the land (which are all based on the Bible code).

He comes not as a reformer or as a bearer of "glad tidings," but as an iconoclast, taking all we have and giving nothing instead. But we are not frightened, nor do we intend to "whistle to keep our courage up." We have faith in our religion, the divine origin of the Bible, and the good sense of our people. It is the young and thoughtless only that are in danger and the ignorant—those who have not tasted of the truth born of God and the religion of Jesus. Therefore we say to the Christian people of Oskaloosa, arm for the conflict; see to it, that you who are parents and guardians, keep your children and wards under close surveillance. Let the clergymen of the respective churches appoint meetings on the nights in question, and insist on the laity's presence, and pray with one accord for the discomfiture of this child of the Devil. Satan is strong; he tempted even Christ himself, and if a desperate effort is not made to resist this powerful adversary, how can we expect the young and ignorant to resist him?

Be not deceived, my dear brethren, this is no ordinary foe. He is blessed with more than ordinary native ability, is a profound scholar and evinces a bravery worthy of a better cause. He is no outlandish fellow from a backwoods country, but hails from the classic shades of a modern Athens. I believe that this man is permitted to thus invade Christian communities as a just rebuke to a careless and ease-loving clergy. Our clergymen are becoming lax in duty; they are succumbing to the corruption of modern fashionable society; dancing and card-playing are being tolerated in church circles, and hardly rebuked by the men who are paid to rebuke these evils. Ministers are getting so refined that we no longer hear of the terrors of the law, only the glories of the hereafter. Beecherism is very popular nowadays—preaching Jesus as a perfect man instead of the divine being we take him to be. One can scarcely tell a Methodist nowadays, or a Baptist, from a Universalist. Members of orthodox churches proclaim their unbelief in a personal devil and literal hell, with all the bravado of so many Infidels. Once the rich man could hardly enter the kingdom of Heaven. Now he is the chief corner-stone; the church doors swing on silver hinges; the clergy are dressed in "purple and fine linen and feast splendidly every day." When I was young in my far-off New England home even fire was not tolerated in church; now we have furnaces and splendid chandeliers and hired choirs, and ere long we will perhaps be called upon to pay for hired mourners. The time has been when Infidels were outlaws; now, they go about challenging Christians to discuss the origin of the Bible; flaunt their vile publications in one's face; they even have had the impudence to establish a tract society in Boston, and publish eulogies on Tom Paine and scatter broad-cast all over the country the writings of the Tyndalls, Millses, and Herbert Spencers, who under the dignified title of scientists, are poisoning the youthful mind with their sugar-coated poison. "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem! how oft would I have gathered ye, but ye would not," etc.

Noble Lives.

There are hearts that never falter
In the battle for the right,
There are ranks that never alter
Watching through the darkest night.
And the agony of sharing
In the fiercest of the strife,
Only gives a nobler daring,
Only makes a grander life.

There are those who never weary,
Bearing suffering and wrong;
Though the way is long and dreary,
It is vocal with their song;
While their spirits in God's furnace,
Bending to his gracious will,
Are fashioned in a purer mould,
By his loving, matchless skill.

There are those whose loving mission
'Tis to bind the bleeding heart;
And to teach the calm submission
Where the pain and sorrow smart.
They are angels bearing to us
Love's rich ministry of peace;
While the night is nearing to us
And life's bitter trials cease.

There are those who battle slander,
Envy, jealousy and hate;
Who rather die than pander
To the passions of earth's great;
And no earthly power can crush them;
Nei'her fear nor favor hush them.

These alone, are truly great;
These are the conquerors of fate;
These truly live; they never die;
But clothed with immortality,
When they lay their armor down,
Shall enter and obtain the crown.

—Balance, August, 1874.

"Go and Sin No More."

The story of Jesus, and the woman taken in adultery, as all scholars know, is an interpolation in the text. As it is found in only one of the gospels, and not in the oldest manuscripts of that gospel, there is no reason for believing that the events as recorded ever happened. Still, the majority of Christians accept it as truth, and as genuine and authoritative as the Sermon on the Mount. Illustrations of the event, of the persecuting crowd, the compassionate Jesus, and the humiliated, perhaps penitent woman at his feet, hang up in hundreds of Christian homes; while these magic words are daily used to shut up the mouths of the merciless in all Christendom, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone." If this story is not strictly gospel, it is good enough to pass as such, and we may believe that it is not improbable that somewhere, sometime, Jesus did say these words to somebody. Well, grant it; are they altogether wise words? Ought he not to have condemned her? Is adultery such a light offense that we should simply dismiss the offender as the Plymouth Church did Beecher, with a gentle "Go and sin no more." Jesus was not called upon to condemn her to be stoned to death according to the law of Moses; that power did not belong to him but to the civil authorities. Is not such amicable treatment of criminals weakness rather than wisdom? Perhaps there were palliating circumstances in this case which made such tender treatment politic and wise; perhaps the elderly Pharisees had been rather hard on such offenders; but looking at it from a modern stand-point we think it would have been wiser if Jesus had rebuked the woman for her great sin, and then turned to the Pharisees and denounced the extreme severity of their laws against adultery, which were out of all proportion to the offense. But he simply said to the woman, "Go and sin no more; I do not condemn thee," and she went, but whether she sinned "no more" is not recorded.

All crushed and stone-cast in behavior,
She stood as a marble would stand;
Then the Savior bent down, and the Savior
In silence wrote on in the sand.

What wrote he? How fondly one lingers,
And questions—what holy command
Fell down from the beautiful fingers
Of Jesus, like gems in the sand?

Oh, better that Homer uncherished,
Had died ere a note or device
Of battle was fashioned, than perished
The only line written by Christ!

P. R. J.

A RELIGIOUS VIEW OF THE BEECHER TRIAL.—The prospects are that Mr. Moulton, Mrs. Moulton, Mr. Tilton and Mr. B. F. Carpenter will swear to Mr. Beecher's confession of guilt; that Mr. Beecher will deny the confession, and that both he and Mrs. Til on will deny the general charge; that there will be a cross-examination of the most searching sort, and a determined and unsurpassing effort to impeach the confronting witnesses; and that the jury will disagree. As the trial goes on, it is one of the saddest scenes that the sun looks down upon in the whole world. It is pitiful to see poor Mrs. Tilton brought into the court-room daily for theatrical effect. The nonchalance and levity assumed by some who are most interested are painfully out of place. Whatever be the truth at the bottom of the matter, the sin committed by one party and the wrong endured by another, are of a sort to awaken feelings of the profoundest pity and sobriety.—Chicago Advance, Orthodox Congregational.

GEORGE VANDERHOFF, Esq., the eminent actor, in reply to the Rev. Mr. Talmage's bitter attack on Theatres, used these truthful words: "I know of no single profession; I want to weigh my words—I know of no single profession which has produced, in proportion to its numbers, so many and such flagrant instances of crime, such gross immoralities, such breaches of confidence and trust, as well as of the divine law, of which they are supposed to be exemplars, as the clerical profession."

BUCOLIC.

In the spring the spurs grow longer on the gaudy rooster's legs;
In the spring a pullet's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of eggs.

—St. Louis Democrat.

AQUATIC.

In the spring the vernal blubber ripens in the burnished whale;
In the spring a tadpole's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of tail.

—Minneapolis Tribune.

URBAN.

In the spring th' umbrella owner 'gins to wonder which is his;
In the spring the soda fountain lightly turns to thoughts of fizz.

—Boston Globe.

DOMESTIC.

In the spring the vagrant tomat howls with more discordant cry;
In the spring the housewife's fancy turns to thoughts of rhubarb pie.

—Boston Advertiser.

Friendly Correspondence.

JOSEPH B. SELLEGREN, Knoxville, Ill., writes: I must say I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and I wish it to be a permanent success.

A. BELLIS, Berlin, Wis., writes: I have this morning been reading over your paper of Jan. 1st. I find so many excellent articles in it, and so much to be learned from it, that I desire you to send it to my daughter attending school at Michigan University. Please find address below, and the money enclosed.

JOHN G. JENKINS, Denver, Col., writes: Send me the "four dollar Combination" you advertise. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. It is of the right stripe and is bound to do much good in storming the strongholds of Superstition. I shall do the best I can to promote its circulation.

CHAS. JONES, Waynesville, Ill., writes: I am very much pleased with your paper. I hope it will keep on advancing until reality is substituted for imagination and falsehood. I am a well-wisher to the cause of truth.

ISRAEL BETZ, Oakville, Pa., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is improving rapidly. The reports of the Liberal Club are very interesting. I hope you will before long give us the lives and deaths of noted Infidels. This is still a great scare-crow among the ignorant.

WM. WEST, West Elizabeth, Pa., writes: Send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months to start on. As a good Christian, I want to read some religious publication, and I find THE TRUTH SEEKER just "fills the bill." Elder Harkins' Sermons are very comforting these hard times.

H. H. HALSEY, Oregon, writes: I must compliment you on the neat and tidy appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER which comes all ready gummed and trimmed, ready for reading, with the date at the head of every page. The matter contained in its columns seems to me just about right, and I read it with great interest.

J. P. E. WHEDON, Winterset, Iowa, upon sending in thirty names of trial subscribers, writes: Mr. Kiser and myself have done what we could to send you a list of new names, and we hope some of them will become permanent subscribers. We intend continuing our efforts for the spread of "the bread of life." It is conceded by those who appreciate the "situation" that THE TRUTH SEEKER columns are giving some of the hardest blows to priestcraft of any paper extant. Don't "let up." Brother Bennett, for the weak-kneed gentlemen of our ranks, but pile on the blows "thicker and more of them." The world is brimful of ignorance and superstition, the legitimate results of priestcraft. Let the thunderbolts of common sense batter these mummy piles till they go down.

W. R. WILCOX, Rocky Hill, N. J., in sending in a list of new subscribers, writes: Verily, truth is stranger than fiction." I am throwing the seed of truth broad-cast right under the shadow of the wings of the two churchisms [Dr. McCosh and Dr. Hodge] that overshadow the mercy seat of Princeton College and Seminary. As soon as we can get people to divest themselves of preconceived opinions, and look matters "square in the face," they cannot help seeing how unreasonable and absurd it would be for angels to rebel, have a war and turn devils. It is said in the Scriptures, "There was war in heaven. Michael and his angels fought against the Dragon and his angels, and the great Dragon was cast out—that old serpent called the Devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world." And that God drove Adam out of the Garden of Eden just for eating an apple he told him not to eat, and cursed the earth and exposed Adam and his posterity to hell-fire in another state of existence with those angels—devils to harass and torment them in this world, with the privilege of burning them in hell-fire while eternal ages shall roll, and just for eating an apple. How absurd.

The priests tell us what a merciful Heavenly Father we have got. I defy them to produce an earthly parent—the most degraded tyrant that ever lived—that would punish his children to that degree. Another dogma, equally absurd, is that God was born of a poor woman in a stable, cradled in a manger, reared in the wilderness, worked at the carpenter's trade till thirty years of age; that those angel-devils had kept him there forty days without anything to eat, and all that twaddle. My dear sir, it looks to me more like blasphemy than anything else, to assert and uphold such idle stories.

The "plan of salvation" is another institution equally unreasonable. What would we think of a Governor that would not set a prisoner free whom he had pardoned, and not reinstate him again in society, but leave him in jail to writhe in his chains, with the promise of great rewards in another world? That is just the kind of freedom that is offered us through Christ. If Christ is not able to reinstate us in the original condition that Adam was in before he transgressed, it is of no practical use whatever, and I would not "give a fig" for it all.

THOS. B. JOHNSON, Sterling, Iowa, writes: I read your remarks on Noah's Flood in former numbers with much interest, and thought you threw some new light upon the subject. You showed the utter impossibility of the whole story in the clearest manner. It is plain a new creation of the entire vegetable kingdom would have been necessary after its inevitable death from being covered for months with water. Not an oak of the forest or a blade of grass of the fields could have escaped. There are many minor points that might be questioned—for instance, was the one window of the ark put in after glass was invented or before? We have no account of glass being invented so long ago as that. The window could only have been a scuttle, and therefore as it was closed, the inmates must have been in utter darkness, and old Noah would be troubled to tell Mrs. Noah from one of his daughters-in-law from the elephant's trunk, or from a boa-constrictor. I think Mrs. Noah must have been as patient as Job, for we have no reason to suppose God provided a cook-stove for her, or a chimney for the ark; and we have no account in the story that she ever fretted, or scolded, or gave any "curtain lectures" to the captain of the vessel. She was truly an example of peacefulness and patience for the ladies of the present time. There is no account that Noah or either of his boys ever brought a pail of water or cut a stick of fire-wood during the whole voyage. As for the animal kingdom all perishing that were not with him in the ark, I think it is a matter of doubt. Methinks I see the young ducks Noah left out in the rain without an umbrella, enjoying themselves finely. True, it might have been inconvenient for them in "breeding time," but perhaps the old ducks made necessary accommodations according to circumstances, and gathered together floating twigs and grass, and in the crotch of some floating trees built their nests and raised their broods. Naturalists tell us some birds build floating nests and succeed admirably. I cannot say whether birds take the spirit form or not, but one whispered to me last night and said:

I ride on the wave while I sleep,
The deep all my wants will supply;
On the crest of the surf I can creep,
And feed on the salt water fly.

My home is well known to the whalers,
A thousand or two miles from the shore;
And superstitions seize the mind of the sailors,
If by chance I am struck with an oar.

I follow the course of a steamer,
And play on the crest of the foam;
I call to my mate like a screamer,
And over the billows we roam.

Not a flood since creation began,
But what I've enjoyed like a lark;
And oft have I pitied the man
That God had shut up in the ark.

[So said the sea-chicken, or Mother Cary's chicken.]
The sea utters reply:

Drown me! Indeed what a folly;
Indeed, sir, I'd show you a trick,
I live on fat salmon quite jolly,
Rise up, take fresh air with a lick.

I lie like a log on the wave,
So expose my full side to the sun;
I know that the water's my grave,
But not till my mission is done.

I change my abode at my leisure,
Nor care where the drift it may carry;
I ride on the iceberg with pleasure,
And where there's good feeding I tarry.

'Tis true, I've enemies round,
I know well the smiles of a shark,
But still was not born to be drowned
Or breathe the foul air of the ark.

Such, friend, are my musings for pastime.
If the beaver, mink, osprey, swans, pelicans, quails and the like use me for medium to inform the world how they rode out the storm, on floating logs, living on fish, I will keep you posted.

Some critics ask, what became of the "Tree of Life" and good and evil? Why, sir, they were drowned out in the flood with all the vegetable kingdom, and as they carried so much trouble in the brief time they existed, God deemed it best not to take the trouble to re-create them.

In closing, permit me to say I admire your pluck, spirit and perseverance. Go on in the good fight.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER.

Buy the Best. Price $7.50.

SIXTY THOUSAND SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

Medal awarded at the N. Y. State Fair, 1874; First Premium at Western N. Y. Fair, 1874; 12 State Fair Premiums taken the past year; also, Silver Medal of Honor at Penn. State Fair, 1874.

This gem of a Washing Machine has claims on public attention that few machines possess.

We have tried it and find it all that it is claimed for it.—West Rural.

We have thoroughly tested the Calkins' Champion Washer and find it in all respects simple, durable and cheap; efficient in its work, and capable of doing all that is claimed for it. We endorse the Champion and recommend the firm.—Prairie Farmer.

We have seen the machine in operation, and feel safe in recommending it to our readers.—Moore's Rural New Yorker.

Almost every family will buy it, after seeing it in use. Send for descriptive Circulars and Terms to Canvassers.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER CO.,

106 Chambers Street, New York, and 207 South Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

Having made special arrangements with the Company, we can send it by Express to all parts of the country, at the Company's price. In connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER, we send it at a greatly reduced price.

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, New York

Scottish Western Loan Co.,

G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,

Bankers,
Le Roy, Minnesota,

BRANCH OFFICE, 332 East 13th St., N. Y.

MONEY INVESTED
IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner.

10 per cent. paid on receipt of money at the Bank, or in New York until invested.

For full particulars, send for Circular. To Jan. 1, 1876.

SPIRITUALISM.

The recent extraordinary attention the subject is attracting, and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless and widely-circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

Religio-Philosophical Journal

3 MONTHS for 30 CENTS.

POSTAGE FREE AFTER JANUARY 1st.

The JOURNAL is a large 8-page weekly paper, regular price $3 per year, now in its Ninth Year. Address S. S. JONES, Editor, 180 E. Adam St., Chicago.

N. B.—State where you saw this advertisement.

J. M. FOLLETT. E. B. HILL.

SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid:

Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz.
Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz.
All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles,
Oils, etc., etc.,

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.

BEST AND CHEAPEST

SEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

R. H. SHUMWAY,
Rockford, Ill.

till Apl. 15.

No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Free-thought and Miscellaneous Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty.

Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole,
Bronson, Mich.

A Grand Combination!

$10.00 for $4.00.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE FOR 1875,

THE HERALD OF HEALTH FOR 1875,

THE TRUTH SEEKER FOR 1875,

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE, in one volume of over 1000 pages and 36 illustrations, and that charming Chromo,

"JUST ONE,"

all sent, post-paid, for only Four Dollars.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

RARE OFFERS!

We offer a sample of

The Ladies' Own Magazine,

a sample of its premium Chromo, and choice of the following popular books, all for 50 cents: Victor Hugo's BELLRING-ER OF NOTRE DAME, Goldsmith's VICAR OF WAKEFIELD, Lamb's ES-SAYS, Defoe's ROBINSON CRUSOE, Gerald Griffin's COLLEEN BAWN. OBJECT, to introduce our superb Magazine and get agents for it. It is the best LITERARY, HOUSEHOLD and FASHION Monthly published. SUPERBLY ILLUSTRATED. Bound in ILLUMINATED COVERS. Over 40 first-class writers. ROMANCE, BIOGRAPHY, HOUSEHOLD ECONOMY, POETRY, PHILOSOPHY, HEALTH, SCIENCE, FASHION.

$2.00 A YEAR, postpaid, with a Superb Chromo, in 16 Oil Colors. LARGE CASH PAY, or Splendid Premiums for Clubs.

AGENTS make $50 a week. Now is the time to Subscribe, and make up Clubs.

T. A. BLAND, Publisher,

11 CLINTON PLACE, NEW YORK.

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN

Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Send by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Eating For Strength.

A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

D.M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED, DESCRIPTIVE AND PRICED SEED ANNUAL 1875
Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.
Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

"Common Sense."

A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.

A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL
DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY
OF SPIRITUALISM, SOCIAL RE-
FORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE,
ETC., ETC.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors.

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions.

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per. Annum, Post-paid. Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,

236 Montgomery St.,

San Francisco, Cal.

500,000 Freethinkers WANTED

To subscribe for the second volume of

THE LYCEUM.

A Monthly Illustrated Liberal Paper for the Young, designed to teach them "Religion without Superstition." Its writers are amongst the ablest in the Liberal ranks, and, as it occupies an exclusive field—the education of the young in the principles of Freethought—it appeals to every liberal and non-church member for support.

The publisher, determined to offer every possible inducement to subscribe, makes the following very liberal

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

Two dozen steel pens, or the excellent little book, "Stories for Our Children," and THE LYCEUM three months for twenty-five cents and a 3 cent stamp for postage.

Two dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or four dozen steel pens and THE LYCEUM six months for fifty cts. and two 3 cent stamps for postage.

For seventy-five cents THE LYCEUM will be sent one year and "One pack of Arithmetical Cards and Games," or four dozen steel pens, and the "Stories for Our Children," or "The Lyceum Stage."

For one dollar THE LYCEUM will be sent one year, with one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games and four dozen steel pens; or one pack of "Arithmetical Cards and Games," the "Stories for our Children," and two dozen steel pens.

When requested we will substitute other books of equal value for any of the above.

The above liberal rates are made to secure the patronage of every one not in sympathy with the churches. Please forward the amount of at least one subscription to

P. H. BATESON,

Publisher of THE LYCEUM,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

Altman's New Price List.

MORRIS ALTMAN begs to state to his old friends and patrons that he has made extensive reductions in his various departments, and earnestly calls attention to the following quotations. The fullest satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance, and all goods not suiting will be exchanged, or the money returned in full.

N. B. To insure the immediate dispatch of orders by mail a P. O. Order, Draft, or Registered Letter must accompany each. Goods by express sent C. O. D. Packages can be sent by mail at the rate of 2c. for 4 ounces and 1 cent for every additional two ounces, or fraction thereof under four pounds.

We refer to A. T. Stewart & Co., H. B. Claflin & Co., E. S. Jaffrey & Co., J. B. Spellman & Co., and all the leading Houses in New York City, also to D. M. Bennett, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and G. L. Henderson, Banker, both of whom are well known to all Liberals, and especially to the readers of this paper, as to our responsibility and integrity.

Notion Department.

All goods incidental to this Department not herein comprised are in stock, and will be furnished at equally low prices.

Clark's O. N. T. Spool Cotton, warranted, at 68c. per doz.
Clark's Cotton on black spools, warranted, at 68c.
Brook's glazed Cotton, white, black and col'd, 68c.
Coat's white, black and colored cotton, at 68c.
Corticelli's and Belding's blk and col'd
Sewing Silk, 100 yds. at 10c. per spool.
Corticelli's black and col'd Button Hole
Twist at 2c.
Knitting Cotton, white and colored, at 9c. per ball
Milward's best Helix needles, at 5 cents per paper.
Crowley's patent Helix needles, at 5 cents per paper.
Milliner's best needles, at 6 cents per paper.
Best American Pins, at 6 cents per paper and upward.
Best English Pins, finest manufacture, warranted, at 10 cents per paper.
Patent Safety Pins, at 6 cents per dozen, in all sizes.
French Hair Pins, two papers for 3 cents, in all sizes.
Best English Hair Pins, at 6 cents per paper, all sizes.
Best English Hair Pins, assorted sizes, at 8 cents per box.

English Pin Books, black and white assorted, at 15 cents.
Mourning Pins, at 6 cents and upward.
Buttons of every description, in all the leading styles, greatly reduced. From 10 cents to $1 per doz.
Black and colored Alpaca Braids, 6 yard pieces, at 6 cts.
"Can't-Break-'em" Corset Steels, at 10 cents a pair.
Cotton Corset Laces, at 18 cents per dozen.
Linen 3 yards long, at 5 cents each, 55 p. doz.
Linen Shoe Laces, at 4 cents per dozen, all lengths.
Whalebones, at 45 cents per dozen, full lengths.
Jet Beads, all sizes, every variety, in latest novelties, at 5 cents per bunch.

Blk Alpaca from 25 cents to 50 cents in good makes.
The celebrated "Buffalo" Brand, pure Silk Lustre, at 82 cents per yard; equal to that sold at $1.00.
Dress Goods of every kind, style and price.
Blk Waterproof Cloth, a superior quality, at 92 cents.
The very best English Waterproof cloth at $1.38.
Navy Blue Waterproof Cloth at $1.13 per yd.
Medium and clear Blues from $1.25 to $1.75.
White and colored Flannels at all prices.
Ladies' Suits in Empress Cloths, Merino's, Cashmeres, Lateen, and all other cloths from $10 to $60 per suit, made and trimmed in Latest Styles.

"This Department is replete with the thousand and one articles incidental to it, but which cannot be enumerated in this advertisement."

MILLINERS, STOREKEEPERS AND DRESSMAKERS will be supplied with goods on unusually advantageous terms, and every care and despatch, will be used in filling orders.

MILLINERY DEPARTMENT.

One of the largest, and the most elegant and original assortment of Imported Novelties to be found in this city, is now in stock, including the following specialties. All goods selling lower than at any other house.

A beautiful assortment of French Flowers in Roses, Buds, Pansies, etc., from 10c. to 5c.
Floral Dress Trimmings and Bridal Wreaths, branched to order, in any style.

A fine assortment of Pompons, Feathers and Wigs.
An extensive assortment of Fancy Feathers, very rich, from 25 cents up to $20.
All the newest shades of Ostrich and Plume de Cock Bands for trimming, from 65 cents and upward.
All the newest styles of blue steel and jet ornaments at the lowest prices.

Elegant Ostrich Plumes, in all the latest shades, $2 and up.

The latest shapes in Felt Hats, at 85 cents to $1.25.
Elegant Imported Felt Hats, best quality, at $1.15 to $3.
Drab Felt Hats, in the latest, most fashionable styles, 85 cents and up.
Silk Velvet Hats, of our own importation, in all qualities, at great bargains from $4 to $10.

Evening Bonnets, elegantly trimmed, from $20 to $35.
Carriage Bonnets, exquisite in design and quality $15 to $30, already trimmed in the latest styles.

Ladies' and Misses' trimmed Bonnets and Hats for general wear, in all shapes and shades, at $6 and upward.
Children's Bonnets and Misses' Round Hats, from $5 to $15, ready trimmed.

Infant's Caps in all the new styles, at great bargains, or made to order at lowest prices.
Mourning goods made to order at the earliest notice.
Sent in neat boxes, perfectly.

Altman's New Price List.

SILKS.

Black Silks, of excellent quality - - - $1 $1 19 and $1 25
Better and wider - - - $1 33 $1 50 and $2
Black gros-grain Silk, very rich and good, - $1 50 to $2 50
The very best grades, - - - 3 and 3 50
Colored Trimming Silks, all shades, - - $1 38 and 1 50
Colored Dress Silks at - - $1 25, $1 50, $2 00 and 2 50
Black Satins, beautiful lustre, at - - 1 50, 1 75 and 2 00
Colored Satins at - - 1 50, 2 00 and 2 25
Black and Colored Velvets at - - 1 50, 2 00, 2 50 and 3 00
Silk Cloak Velvets at - - 5 00, 6 00, 8 00 and 10 00
Velveteens at - - 60c., 75c. and $1 00, worth 1 50
Hat Sashes in every shade and color.
Sash Ribbons in all colors and widths, from 65c. up.
Colored Fringed Sashes, all the new shades, at very low prices.

Laces and Embroideries.

These goods will all be found Extraordinary Bargains, and includes

Hamburg edging at 10 cts. per yard and upwards.
Real Guipure Laces at 25 cts. per yard and upwards.
Black Thread Lace at 20 cts. per yard and upwards.
Valenciennes edging from 5c. per yard and upward.
Patent Valenciennes edging from 6c. per yard upwards.
Beaded black Yak Laces at 25c. per yard and upwards.
Beaded black Yak insertion at 38c. per yd and upward.
Black Yak Laces at 18c. per yard and upward.
Cluny Laces from 15c. and upward.
Colored blonde Laces, from 10c. per yard and upward.
White blonde Laces from 9c. per yard and upward.
Spanish Lace for Scarfs at 50c. per yd and upward.
Black Lace Veils, all patterns, at 50c. per yd and upward.
Black Silk Fringe at 23c. per yd. Black Silk beaded Fringe 35c. per yd. and upward.
Black Silk Galoon 5c. per yd. and upward.
Black Bullion Fringe from 20c. per yd and upward.
Black Beaded Gimp at 20c. per yd and upward.
Large assortment in Hamburg Embroideries.
Large lot of Hamburg insertion at 6c. per yd.
Swiss Medallion Embroideries, great variety at very low prices.
Lace Tides in every variety at 10c. and upward.

Ladies' Underclothing,

A Valuable Reduction in prices has taken place in this Department, and we imperatively state that no other house can compete with the general inducements we offer. We quote the following as a sample:

Ladies' Fine Chemises, warranted Muslin, finished superbly on Wheeler & Wilson machine. French corded band, extremely neat, 80 cts.
Ladies' Fine Chemises finished as above, with 75 tucks, yoke back and front, handsomely stitched, corded braids and sleeves, at $1.50.

Ladies' Chemises en pointe French pattern with fine hand-made needlework edging and inserting, at $1.48.

Ladies' Night Robes, Utica Mills Muslin, pointed, tucked, and ruffled yoke back and front, full length, at $1.10.

Ladies' Night Robes, tucked and embroidered yoke, Masonville Muslin, trimmed and embroidered collars and cuffs, reduced from $2.95 to $2.25.

Ladies' Night Robes, greatest attraction in stock, made of best muslin, with diagonal puffing and embroidered yoke, back and front, (new shaped) puffed and embroidered pointed collars and cuffs, at $5.50. Worth $6.50 to $7.

Ladies' Night Robes—another attractive article—entirely "our own style," just received, made with diagonal tucks, puffing and embroidery, robe front; very elaborate. $5 to $6.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, trimmed with deep hem and wine tucks at 75 Cents.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, trimmed with tucks and ruffle and diagonal tucking at 85 cents.

Ladies' Fine Muslin Drawers, with deep hem, cluster of tucks and needle work inserting, handsomely finished on Wheeler & Wilson Machine, at $1.25.

Ladies' Demi-train Walking Skirts, with double ruffle, cluster of tucks, at $1.

Ladies' Fine Walking Skirts, made of Lonsdale Muslin, with cambric flower, six inches deep, diagonal puffing and tucking with needle-work inserting five inches deep at $5.

Train Skirts, fine muslin, deep hem, cluster of tucks six inches long, at $1.90.

Ladies' Train Skirts, very elaborate, with one row of tucks, puffs, inserting and puffs over, with deep cambric ruffle, at $5.50.

Ladies' Masonville muslin Underskirts, with ruffles and cluster of tucks, at 95 cents.

Ladies' Cambric Toilet Sacques, trimmed with fine ruffling, at $1.40.

Linen and Muslin Pillow-Cases and Pillow-Stands, in plain ruffles and needlework inserting, &c., on hand and made to order. Chemises, square-tucked bosoms, trimmed with ruffles, 75 cents.

French Plouces Skirt, at $1.20.

Corset Covers, trimmed with Hamburg edging, inserting, ruffling, tucks, &c., at 80 cents to $1.50.

HOSIERY, etc.

Ladies' Iron Frame Hose, excellent quality, at 25c. per pr.

Ladies' full regular made Hose, at 25c. per pr.

Ladies' fine Balbriggan Hose at $2 50 per 1-2 doz.

Ladies' Striped Hose in every variety at 46c. per pr. and upward.

A full line of Ladies' Cashmere and Woolen Hose at lowest prices.

Children's White and Colored Woolen Hose, a particular specialty.

Gents' full regular Half Hose, cheapest in the city, at 25c a pair.

Gents' Merino and Cashmere Hose at 43c. and upward.

Gents' Shaker Socks, not to be equalled, at 34c. per pair.

Ladies' Hemstitched Handkerchiefs, at 12c. and upward.

Gents' Linen Handkerchiefs, superior quality, at 18c. and upward.

Gents' Hemstitched Handkerchiefs, all Linen, at 39c. up.

Altman's New Price List.

We have just received a fine assortment of Ladies' and Gents' Kid Gloves, including the following specialties. Single button blk and col'd Kid Gloves at 50c. per pair, Next grade better at 95c. per pr. Warranted.

"ALTMAN" Kid Glove, our own make, in black and all fashionable shades, at $1 25 two-buttoned, every pair taken back and a new pair given if they rip or tear.

"Josephine" real Kid Glove, perfect quality, at $1 95 per pair.

"Lucca" Kid Glove, an excellent wearing glove, at 95c per pair, two button.

Gauntlet Gloves, every color and shade, 63c. and upward.

A large assortment of Woolen Gloves for Ladies', Gents' and Children at the lowest prices, from 25c. to $1 00 per pair.

Gent's Fine French Dogskin Gloves, every color, at $1 29 per pair.

Gents' fine French Gloves, excellent wear, at 95c. per pair.

Ladies' 3 4 and 6 button, every shade, $1 40 and 11 80.

Full assortment of Cloth and Wollen Gloves, from 25cts. to $1 per doz.

Gent's Furnishing Department.

This department is replete with a splendid assorted stock, and our prices are such as undersell any other establishment, where quality is included.

100 doz. Gents' Merino Shirts and Drawers, at 50c. and up.

75 " " Clouded, all sizes, at 64c.

75 " " Red Flannel woven very fine, $1 69 "

Our own make Dress Shirts, perfect fit, made of Wamsutta Muslin, fine linen bosoms, open or closed at back, at $12 per half doz.

Extra fine perfectly fitting Dress Shirts, New York Mills Muslin with Richardson's best linen bosoms, made in any style to order, at $14 per half dozen.

Gents' White Dress Shirts as low as $1 each.

Gents' Merino Under Shirts at 85c. up to $2 00.

Gents' Suspenders, every variety, at 25c. up.

Gents' Windsor Scarfs, best quality, at 89c. and up.

" Wide end colored Ties, endless variety, at 45c.

" Collars and Cuffs in all the latest styles.

" Collars pure Linen, latest styles, $2 00 per doz.

" Columbia 3 ply linen collars, at $1 90 per doz.

" Turn down collars at $1 75 per doz,

" 3 ply cuffs at 25c. per pair.

" St. James Cuff, 3 ply, all linen, at 31c. per pair.

" Elmwood Paper Collars at 25c. per box.

" Superior Paper Cuffs at 32c. per box of 10 prs.

" Common Paper Collar at any price per box.

A large assortment of Boys' Merino Shirts and Drawers at 50 cents.

Boys' and Children's full regular made Shirts and Drawers at 73c. and upward.

Children's Merino Dresses, all sizes at $1 25 upward.

Ladies' and Misses' Merino Vests and Drawers at all prices.

Toilet Department Jewelry, &c.

Tooth Brushes, excellent to best, from 10c. and upward.

Nail " " " " 14c.

Hair " " " " 28c.

Dressing Combs " " " " 10c.

Hand Mirrors, elegant designs, " " " " 31c.

Tortoise-shell Back Combs, " " " " 25c.

Ladies' Rubber Belt Buckles, " " " " 25c.

Jet " " " " 25c.

Ladies' Jet Farrings, in latest designs 10c.

" Real Garnet Sets, " " " " 38c.

" Bracelets of all kinds, " " " " 38c.

" Beaded Belts, " " " " 75c.

" Leather Belts, " " " " 20c.

" Rubber Belts, " " " " 45c.

" Beaded Pockets, " " " " 50c.

" Leather Satchels, in newest styles, at $1.50 and up.

" Real Russia Leather Satchels, from $4.50 and up.

" Morocco Pocket Books, from 18 cents and upward.

" Real Russia Leather Pocket Books, from 35c. up.

" Shawl Straps, " " " " from 45c. and up.

Children's School Bags, " " " " 81 to 89 cents.

Ladies' Ties, " " " " 28 cents and upward.

" Linen Collars, " " " " 7 cents

" Linen Cuffs, " " " " from 5 cents per pair.

" Neck Ruffling, " " " " from 15c. and upward.

" Undersleeves, " " " " from 45c. and upward.

Gilt and Jet Earrings, Pins and Bracelets, from 25 cents per pair, or as high as $5 per set, according to quality and design. We guarantee that, in the exercise of our own judgment, on receiving as near a description as possible of what is required, and the price desired to be paid, we will give entire satisfaction or refund the money on return of goods C. O. D.

Ribbons of all styles, colors and widths, at prices that will astonish customers.

In Velvet, Velveteens, Satins, and all kindred goods, we have a full stock, of which we cut on bias at wholesale prices.

We have on hand 5000 pieces of the Worsted Ball and Twisted Fringes, now so much in vogue, which we are offering at the unheard of low price of 48 cents per yard, in all colors.

Forty different styles of the latest designs in Beaded Gimps and Fringes, now so fashionable, which we offer at from 25 cents per yard up to $3, according to the quality and design. . . . I will personally attend to all orders coming through the Liberal papers, and having, for many years, filled orders for the readers of this paper, my judgment may be relied upon in the proper selection of purchases.

All goods not mentioned herein, including such as are entirely out of our regular line of business, will be as judiciously and carefully selected, and as readily sent as those enumerated, and I will guarantee, in all cases, that the prices will be as low as anywhere else in the United States. Ladies' and Misses' Suits and Gentlemen's Clothing may be confidently ordered, all that is requisite being the correct measure, and about the style, price and kind of material required. I will make myself personally responsible for the remainder.

I will guarantee to satisfactorily fill all orders that may be sent, and assure all patrons that wherever goods are sent, different in prices or kinds than ordered, that the goods may be returned by express, C. O. D., at our risk and expenses. Address

MORRIS ALTMAN,

OF THE FIRM OF M. ALTMAN & CO.

Sixth Avenue and 19th Street.

Odds and Ends.

A WIFE's farewell to her husband: "Buy buy."

WANTED.—Young ladies to sell on commission.

ADVICE is like castor oil—easy enough to give but dreadful to take.

"Woman, with all thy faults I love thee still," as a man said to his scolding wife.

A WISE philosopher has discovered how to avoid being dunned—never to go in debt.

"O you be darned," said a bachelor as he poked his toes through a hole in his stockings.

FOR SALE.—A piano, by a lady about to visit Europe with carved legs in an oak case.

ABSENCE OF MIND.—A girl once blew her lover out of doors and then kissed the candle.

A VOCALIST said he would sing "Way down on old Tar River," if he only could get the pitch.

THE greatest triumph of the surgical art is said to be taking the jaw out of a scolding woman.

A GERMAN waiter at a hotel said to a boarder: "Of you see what you don't want, yoost speak out."

A YOUNG physician asked a young Miss for a kiss. "No, indeed," said she, "I wish no doctor's bill stuck in my face."

"SOMETHING to love" is all very well, but Jenks says in order to do that he must have something to put his arms round.

A YOUNG man named Turn married a cousin by the same name, on the plea that "one good Turn deserves another."

"THE water cure is no new invention," says Stiggers, "it is as old as the deluge, and even then it killed more than it cured."

A WISCONSIN man recently killed six skunks in one day. After interviewing the first one he became reckless and so kept on.

"I'll give that girl a piece of my mind," said a young man. "No," said his uncle, "I would not do that, you have none to spare."

A WITNESS in a case of assault and battery, when asked what he said, replied: "I said to him with the toe of my boot, go home."

WHEN Adam got tired of naming his descendants, and when he got about half through he said, "let's quit and call all the rest Smith."

"THAT's very singular," said a young lady, when a gentleman kissed her. "O," said he, "then I will make it plural," and gave her another.

A COUNTRY magistrate being called on to marry a couple, said: "I pronounce you man and wife, and may God have mercy on your souls. Amen."

AN Irish crier being ordered to clear the court-room, did so by announcing: "Now all you blackguards that are not lawyers leave the court at once."

THE time has now arrived when the voice of the shivering husband is heard at day-break murmuring: "Hanner, where'n the old scratch are my boots?"

"AM I not a little pale?" inquired a lady who was short and corpulent, of a crusty old bachelor. "You look more like a big tub," was the blunt response.

THE young man who sang, "I'm lonely since mother died," has got bravely over it. His father has married again and his step-mother makes it lively for him.

A PERSON was boasting that he sprung from a high family. "Yes," said a bystander, "I knew some of the same family so high their feet could not touch the ground."

"HERE's to the vine that grew the grapes that made this wine," said Spivens, as he swallowed a glass of milk. "What vine was that?" asked Smith. "Bovine," was the prompt reply.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN often stumbled upon the truth. He said: "The eyes of other people are the eyes that ruin us. If all but myself were blind, I should neither want a fine house nor fine furniture."

"I CAN'T say as he went to heaven," remarked a Fort Scott citizen of a deceased townsman, "but he paid a bill of eleven years' standing only the day before he died, and you can judge for yourself."

A POOR fellow begged for five cents with which to pay ferriage over the river. "O," said the party importuned, "if you have no money, it makes no difference which side of the river you are on."

A LADY setting for her picture was trying to render her mouth much smaller by contracting her lips. "Do not trouble yourself," said the artist. "I will draw your face without any mouth at all."

A MINNESOTA Editor says a man came into his office to advertise for a lost dog, and that such was the wonderful power of advertising that the dog walked into the office while he was writing out the advertisement.

A GEORGIA paper knows a man who went all the way from Cassville to Atlanta. On his return he looked solemn with the weight of garnered wisdom, and said; "If the world is as big t'other way as it is that, it's a whopper!"

MR. B., did you say, or did you not say what I said you said, because C. said you said you never said what I said you said. Now if you said you did not say what I said you said, then in the name of stars what did you say?

A GENTLEMAN who took a common-sense view of things being asked his opinion of a poetical individual, replied: "Oh, he's one of those men who have soarings after the infinite, and divings after the unfathomable, but who never pay cash."

THACKERAY tells us of a woman begging alms from him, who, when he put his hand in his pocket, cried out: "May the blessing of God follow you all your life!" But when he only pulled out his snuff-box she immediately added, "And never overtake ye!"

A SCOTCH physician being asked the meaning of metaphysics explained it as follows: When the party who listens doesn't know what the party who speaks means, and the party who speaks doesn't know what he means himself: that is metaphysics.

A PERSON named Owen Moore being deeply involved in debt suddenly left for parts unknown, upon which a wag remarked: "Owen Moore ran away Owen Moore than he could pay."

"I WISH to consult you upon a little project I have formed," said a noodle to his friend. "I have an idea in my head." "Have you?" interposed the friend, with a look of great surprise. "then you shall have my opinion at once. Keep it there, it may be some time before you get another."

A DUTCH ADVERTISEMENT.—"Sothoring, I takes this way to inform the public vot I can do—dat I can make sehtove bipes, brass, copper and tin vork of any kind, from a still-vorm to a vistle, and I can sother up de booter dea pots vat has a hole in em, and make em shoost as goot as new. All dish I will do for de gash, at mine old shtand near where the carpenter lives vot mamke the wheel barrows and mends de vajons. HANS BRANGEN.

A New Englander, riding in a railroad car, seemed particularly anxious to astonish the other passengers with tough stories of Yankeedom. At last he mentioned that one of his neighbors owned an immense dairy, and made a million pounds of butter and a million pounds of cheese yearly. This story produced some sensation; and the Yankee, perceiving that his veracity was in danger of being questioned, appealed to a friend as follows: "True, isn't it, Mr. P.? I speak of Deacon Brown—you know Deacon Brown?" "Y-e-s," replied the friend, "that is, yes I know Deacon Brown; I don't know as I ever heard precisely how many pounds of butter and cheese he makes a year, but I know that he has twelve saw mills that go by butter-milk."

For Winter Evenings. PLAYING CARDS.

Fancy, Transparent, Illustrated.

THE LATEST OUT.

Sent Post-paid by Mail, for $1. Address,

E. M. McDONALD & CO.,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sexual Physiology.

BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. With eighty fine engravings. AGENTS WANTED.

SYNOPSIS OF TABLE OF CONTENTS.

The Male Organs of Generation.
The Female Organs of Generation.
The Origin of Life.
Sexual Generation.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Impregnation.
Pregnancy.
Embryology.
Parturition.
Lactation.
The Law of Sex.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Theory of Population.
The Law of Sexual Intercourse.
Hereditary Transmission.
Philosophy of Marriage.

This work has rapidly passed through twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Prof. Wilder, of Cornell University, says it is the best work of its kind published.

Price, by mail, $2.00. Sold by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE Heathens of the Heath,

A ROMANCE,

Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH

PRIESTCRAFT, THE MISSION-

ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shown up.

A perusal of it will open

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will regret the investment.

It contains nearly 450 pages. 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper, and gotten up in excellent style. Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00

In Cloth, neatly bound.....1.50

Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,

335 BROADWAY.

New York.

DR. WM. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMPTIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH.

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere. Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.

CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.

CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.

CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.

CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.

Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S OXYGENATED BITTERS.

The OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSLEY'S

Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,

Proprietors,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO.,

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION, FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 12. { D. M. BENNETT, EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. } NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 15, 1875. { 335 BROADWAY, SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

THE divorce business seems to be pretty good in Maine. Last year 487 bills were granted, of which 238 were for desertion.

It has been suggested by a friend at our elbow that, in view of the great trial through which Plymouth Church is passing, that its name be changed and hereafter be known as The Church of the Holy Adultery.

THERE are in the United States 156 firms and corporations engaged in the silk manufacture, with an aggregate capital of $16,000,000, and with a force of 10,651 operatives. New York has 61 of these establishments, New Jersey 30, Connecticut 22, and Massachusetts 12.

A Troy stove firm has received a letter from the West in relation to the purchase of a heater for a church, which concludes as follows: "The heater furnished by you for the church at — works bully. Give us your rock bottom prices, as we are poor, but very pious."

A LATE MINISTERIAL SCANDAL comes from Baltimore. Charges of gross immorality have been preferred against the Rev. Alfred N. Gilbert, pastor of the Paca Street Christian church. The charges are made by members of his own church. A female is connected with the scandal.

THE Science of Health impresses on its readers the pernicious effects of the habit of breathing through the mouth, sleeping or waking. The nostrils are the proper breathing apparatus—not the mouth. A man may inhale poisonous gases through the mouth without being aware of it, but not through the nose.

A CHURCH DIFFICULTY IN HOROKEN.—In the Methodist Episcopal Church a serious misunderstanding has arisen between the Shepherd and his flock. They do not seem to like his style of preaching, and have secretly organized a party to oppose and "oust" him. Brotherly love, accord and concord seem to have departed from their midst.

IT HAS BEEN ASCERTAINED a slight mistake was made in the rendition of the statement of the remark made by Samuel Wilkinson in reference to the publicity of Beecher's little deviations from the path of virtue. It is now claimed he did not say, "If this gets out, it will knock The Life of Christ higher than a kite," but that his real words were, "It will send 'The Life of Christ' to the Devil." That our readers may understand the precise direction Beecher's "Life of Christ" was to take, we cheerfully make this correction. Our sympathies are still with the aforesaid "Life of Christ." We cannot help thinking, "what a pity, what a pity, that this is thus."

THE papers inform us the Hon. Wm. M. Evarts, the leading attorney in the defense of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, is to be paid $25,000 by Mr. Beecher's friends for services thus rendered. It is said there are twelve other lawyers working for the defense, with Porter, Tracy, Hill and Shearman at their head; and in the aggregate they ought to be able to earn as much as Mr. Evarts. Other expenses connected with the trial are heavy. $50,000 is a pretty round sum for the friends of a clergyman to have to pay for his errors and indulgences. If he only had had the grace to exercise due self-denial and continence, it would have saved his friends these heavy expenditures and himself many a regretful pang.

THERE ARE TWO BEECHER SUITS.—Solomon Skinner, a former dentist of Brooklyn, has brought suit against Henry Ward Beecher for $600 for three sets of teeth furnished twenty years ago,—two sets to Mrs. Beecher and one to Lyman Beecher, father of Henry Ward,—and for which payment was never made. The dentist was rich and did not care for the money, but since becoming poor he finds it would be convenient to have it. Mr. Beecher, through his attorneys, pleads the statute of limitation. If the work was performed, and Mr. Beecher does not deny it, would it not be quite as honorable to pay the debt and say no more about it? Twenty years is certainly a good long credit. Possibly the Reverend gentleman thinks as did that other fellow on a similar occasion: "As it has stodd so long a time, perhaps it had better run awhile."

THE GREAT BEECHER TRIAL still drags its slow length along, and a large portion of the public are weary with it and heartily wish the great Preacher had behaved himself as a decent man ought to do, and thus have saved the recital of such a mass of prurient testimony. Mr. Tilton has passed through the ordeal of a direct examination and a close cross-examination, in which he was clear and concise, clothing his ideas in more finished language than is often heard from a witness stand. Mr. Evarts, in his labored cross-examination, made very little off Mr. Tilton and "lugging in" Mr. Tilton's Poems, Editorials, etc., which have no connection with Mr. Beecher's guilt or innocence only show the weakness of the case for the defense. Thus far the testimony of Messrs. Moulton, Woodruff, West and Tilton has agreed remarkably, and must have made a decided effect upon the minds of the jury. It will, doubtless, be the purpose of the defence to break down this testimony, but it cannot easily be done. These witnesses all presented a candid, impressive manner, and their credibility will be vouched for by any number of persons of the first respectability. It would seem a verdict for the plaintiff will be inevitable, but it is to be remembered the jury is a Christian jury, and it is the first Christian clergyman of the country that is upon trial, and the main witnesses against him are heathen or unbelievers. "The good of the cause" will possibly have some effect upon the minds of those twelve Christian jurors.

A NOTICEABLE FEATURE of Mr. Tilton's examination was the respect and consideration he bore his erring wife. He repeatedly pronounced her a woman of unusual excellence, intelligence and devotion, possessing in an eminent degree the characteristics of a "true lady." He blamed her not for the mistake she made in listening to the artful arguments and importunities of the man her religious views and associations conspired to cause her to look up to with trust, confidence and adoration, but casts all blame upon her seducer and deceiver.

If he still cherishes for her such esteem, confidence and perhaps, too, love, is it not to be hoped she may reciprocate the feeling, and when all "this cruel war is over," a reconciliation may take place, and this once happy, but now scattered and distracted family again be united, and the bliss of former and better days be at least partially restored? We will cast our vote for this "consummation devoutly to be wished." However reprehensible it may have been in Daniel E. Sickles to shoot the seducer of his wife, we thought it was noble in him that he forgave her and again took her to his arms; and the late great and good Gerrit Smith wrote Sickles a letter warmly and emphatically approving his noble magnanimous course. If Daniel set a good example in this respect, let Theodore follow it.

THE GOLDEN AGE says it has heard of "people dancing at the funeral of a wife or child, but it is not often a man dances at his own." This was said with reference to the remarkable cheerfulness and jolity of the pastor of Plymouth Church exhibits during his trial. No matter how damaging the evidence, whether it is Moulton's narrative of Beecher's numerous confessions, whether Tilton's of his wife's admission of the sin, whether it is the Pastor's own letters of contrition or his consequent resignation of the pastorate of the church is read, he is all smiles, and his face beams with radiance and good humor. His jokes and witticisms come in on all possible occasions, and he assures us he never was so happy before in his life. These continuous smiles and jokes of the Plymouth Pastor would seem to make applicable to him the merited rebuke, which Mrs. Miller addressed to the Rev. Mr. Glendenning, when he, while being tried for adultery, also frequently indulged in smiles and laughter: "Sir: I see nothing to laugh at in this business." How cheerful, indeed, it makes these reverend gentlemen to be brought into court for their offenses. The more their shame is exposed, the more they laugh. There is some contrast between this conduct and the tears which frequently rush to Mr. Tilton's eyes while giving testimony of the pathetic parts of this sorrowful story, or when the endearing letters which passed between his wife and himself are read. He has, during the trial, often wept, but rarely smiled. He possibly sees but little to laugh at. Which looks the most like innocence? Which, under the circumstances, seems the most appropriate, the assumed cheerfulness and jolity of the one, or the grave, sad demeanor of the other? Among the accomplishments and talents of the great Plymouth Preacher, the art of dissembling and hypocrisy is by no means the least. And is there not danger of his playing the cheerful game too strong?

IT IS FORESHADOWED that the defense in the Beecher Scandal trial will be to break down the evidence of Moulton, Tilton, Woodruff, and others, and to pronounce the whole thing a conspiracy. If it was a conspiracy Henry Ward Beecher was a party to it. He must either be guilty of the charges against him, or he must be one of the conspirators in making it appear so. How else can his letters of confession and contrition and his resignation be accounted for? Why else should he pay out ten thousand dollars so willingly? Why else should he have been in secret conclave at hours early and late with the other conspirators? Why else should he propose to abdicate Plymouth pulpit with its $20,000 per year? Why else when Deacon West was trying to bring Tilton to a church trial did the pastor do all he could to defer it and stave it off, that the whole affair need not be dragged to the light? Why else did he send away Bessie Turner and pay hundreds of dollars for her tuition? Why else did he propose to send Tilton and Moulton to Europe at his expense? Why else did he write so many letters with his own hand, fitting and dovetailing into the entire statements of Moulton and Tilton? Verily if there has been conspiracy in the case, he himself has played an important part in it, and his confidential attorney, Gen. Tracy, was also a conspirator. By the corroborative testimony of Moulton, Tilton, and Woodruff (who, by the by, will not be easy to impeach as he stands as high for honor and truthfulness as any man in this community), proves that Gen. Tracy was made acquainted with Mr. Beecher's criminality, when he said, while he was not in favor of lying as a general rule, in this case he approved of it and it must be used. It is also intimated by some of Beecher's friends that if it is necessary, it will be shown that Mrs. Tilton acted upon the instructions of Tilton and Moulton in her advances to Beecher, and thus herself became one of the conspirators. If this lying dodge is taken it will be meaner than any other conduct in the whole case, and throw into the shade Adam's defense when arraigned in the celebrated apple case. Will not that be a beautiful defense, that Mrs. Tilton acting upon the instructions of her husband and his co-conspirators by her sweet arts and allurements tempted the good Plymouth pastor when he unconsciously and innocently stepped into the trap thus wickedly set for him? Will it not be a defense worthy a great Christian Church and a great Christian Pastor? Let us at all events hope this great Christian preacher when he is brought upon the witness stand, will not sit day after day and coolly commit perjury. "We shall see what we shall see."

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XI.

When the half-breed stood before the Fanatic and informed him of the discovery he had made, the latter bounded to his feet with an exclamation of surprise and pleasure, which was most grateful to the wily and treacherous scoundrel who evoked it.

"What!" ejaculated Sloucher, "you saw them with your own eyes in the wigwam of the Indian; and saw the ferryman and his two godless companions alive, and with their scalps safe and sound?"

Now there was one peculiarity about the manner and language of the Fanatic which was known to but few in the settlement, and that was the readiness with which both changed when there was no longer anything to be gained by the observance of a sanctified mein or drawl. Hence when he addressed Lightfoot, his voice was quite commonplace, and his drawl and long face completely cast aside for a curtness and vivacity most marked.

"Yes," returned Lightfoot, "saw them with my own eyes, and heard them speak. They were seated on some furs in the wigwam beside Firefly the chief's wife, who was here with him a couple of years ago."

"And you say the Indians are all or nearly all to go away on a hunting expedition to-morrow," rejoined the Fanatic, "and that Red Wing will be away also, not to return until the following day?"

"That's just what I heard him tell his three companions as I crept after them to the ravine," said the half-breed. "And that the whole of his party hereabouts numbers only eight or ten, I know also, for I heard him mention the fact, and that only one or two would be left behind to keep watch over the two whites and his wife."

"Don't mention a sentence of this to any one living," said the Fanatic, "but go and find Nat the Moose, and bring him to me before you sleep, if you can fall in with him."

"Good," returned the half-breed. "I think I know where to meet with him; although after his fright—for I saw him run—he may not like to venture abroad again to-night; and, besides, it is now getting late."

"You shall be well rewarded for your trouble if you find him," replied Sloucher, "and what's more, you shall have all the credit due to the discovery of the retreat of the Indians; and you know the government will recognize that service handsomely."

"Well," rejoined the other, "I will try and persuade him to accompany me here if I can make him out, for I suppose whatever work you have in hand, I can help you with it. But will you not inform Peter Huskins of how the case stands?"

"No!" returned the Fanatic. "Not a word must be spoken to him or any one else on the subject. Bring me the Moose, and then you shall know more of my intentions in this matter, and shall take a part in whatever work we may cut out."

In a few moments Sloucher was alone once more; and no sooner had the door closed behind the half-breed, than he bolted it securely; and while his whole aspect changed, as it had changed at the gate of the villa when he was repulsed by Maurice and Alice, he exclaimed, in a suppressed voice, and with a fiendish glare of his eye:

"This time! this time! Alice Ravenswood, you shall fall! The Indians are not aware of the treachery of this Lightfoot, but will still believe in his friendship, and still trust him, although he has proved their deadliest enemy, and was the means of all the troubles that beset Red Wing two years since. He shall betray those to be left in charge of the fugitives to-morrow into the hands of the authorities, while I and the Moose shall be left free to dispose of our share of the live spoil."

The dwelling of the Fanatic, which was as repulsive in appearance as himself, was situated among some trees in a gloomy hollow that invaded the town on one side, and as yet gave shelter to his lonely habitation only, of which he was the sole inmate. The building was a large, rough one, that had been used formerly as an outpost, and which, on being abandoned, had fallen in some way into his hands.

The windows were small and of a loop-hole character, and the entrance narrow and secured by a heavy oaken door with iron bolts and bars. The interior was divided into three or four rooms, one of which only appeared to be occupied by the Fanatic, the others being always kept locked, as if to shut off their gloom from the already sufficiently forbidding apartment in which the meek and lowly follower of the humble Nazarine partook of his coarse fare, and sought repose upon his uninviting pallet of straw.

In this cheerless room only was he to be found whenever Huskins or the Moose visited him; and here, also, he received such of his brethren of "the cloth" as came to consult with him in the best methods of carrying out their diabolical designs in relation to those whom they were determined to sacrifice to their cupidity, superstition or lust, as the foul fiend inspired them. The half-breed, however, whose eyes and ears were always open, became somehow impressed that, notwithstanding all these appearances of mortification and humility, Sloucher was not altogether indifferent to the comforts of this life, and that there was beneath his lonely roof some little nook to which he could at times retire and obtain a more dainty morsel and a more refreshing night's rest than his every-day quarters seemed capable of affording.

Contrary to the expectation of the Fanatic, the half-breed had not been absent but a very short period when he again presented himself, accompanied by Nat. He had met the Moose approaching the house, his fellow-conspirator after his fright, as he was anxious to learn something more of the affair with the Indians; from the fact of his having been unconscious at the moment they appeared on the scene of action at the ferryman's, he was terribly confused on the subject; and, like the brave fellow that he was, having looked only to his own safety when he regained his legs, he had not paused in his flight to ask any of his companions as to how the matter stood.

"Have you told him anything?" said Sloucher to the half-breed when both the men entered.

"No," returned Lightfoot, "I have left that for you to do."

"How many Indians were there?" interrupted the Moose, "and how many scalps were taken?"

"There were no scalps taken, and not a single drop of blood spilt," replied Lightfoot.

"How is that?" said the Moose, turning to the Fanatic.

"Don't you hear how it is?" rejoined Sloucher. "No one has suffered save yourself, and I must say you went down very easy under the hand of that bully from The Heights."

This sarcastic observation nettled the Moose, who ground his teeth on hearing it. But before he could make any remark upon it the Fanatic continued:

"Lightfoot has discovered where the two witches are hidden; and, besides, has happened to fall upon the spot where Red Wing and a few Indians are secretly encamped. It was the chief and three of his tribe that routed us an hour or so past."

Now, as already stated, the language of Sloucher lost all of its sanctified twang when he was dealing with those who knew him. In the presence of the witchfinder, or of those to whom he did not wish to reveal himself, did he only drawl out his villainous projects and sentiments. In fact, he knew Huskins to be a sincere and consistent monster who believed in the terrible delusions that had overspread the land, and he had consequently to keep on the right side of him, with a view to furthering his own nefarious designs; for although he had himself great power with the Church and the authorities, Peter in the matter of witches was a law to both.

In a few moments all reserve being thrown completely off by the three men, it was decided that the half-breed should visit the ravine, stealthily as it were, on the morrow and betray whatever Indians were in it into the hands of a party that Sloucher should induce the authorities to post toward nightfall at a point to be decided upon. No allusion whatever was to be made to the proximity of Firefly and the fugitives. These, when left unprotected, were to be pounced upon unexpectedly and hurried off to some place of security by the three ruffians—Firefly being now named as the prize of the half-breed.

As may be presumed, Florence felt almost as much relief as the invalid at the intelligence of the escape of Alice from the second attempt to capture her made by the Fanatic and his party. Seeing the intense anguish of the mother of her dear friend, she determined to remain at the villa for a few days, in the hope of being able to solace the poor invalid to some extent, and to hear something more from Alice.

The dangers which surrounded Martha pressed heavily upon the heart of John Langton, while Emily Graham, the maid of Alice, was inconsolable at the terrible calamity that threatened her young mistress. Again and again did she beg Robert to take her to the hiding place of Alice, so that she might share her dangers and troubles. Dearly as he loved Emily, however, Robert could not accede to her wishes in this respect, because he was not only pledged not to approach the ravine at present, but perceived that to add to the number already in sore distress would be to embarrass their secrecy and to expose them to a greater chance of falling into the hands of their enemies. This Emily soon saw was a reasonable view of the case, so she gave up her pleadings and betook herself to the solace of tears in her own little chamber.

Titmouse said but little, although he thought a great deal, and as he had not heard from either John or Robert anything of the true merits of the case, or of where the fugitives had now found shelter, he determined to return to the ravine on the following night and lay all he knew of the matter before Red Wing and Firefly, convinced that they would be able to give some advice on the subject, as he believed it was not known where Martha and Alice fled after they had left the cave.

Although Maurice and the detachment that had marched in the direction of Cape Ann, were constrained to right-about face and retrace their steps, they found it no easy matter to dispose of the few miles that separated them from Boston.

The fatigue of a single day, of one sleepless night, and the effects of the bitter encounter with the enemy, brief as the latter was, had so preyed upon some of the party that, after a march of half a dozen miles, the little command was constrained to pitch their tents once more, so that the strong and the hardy might minister to the needs of those who had fancied that a couple of hours' rest was sufficient to restore their wasted energies after the hardships they had suffered.

They still kept close by the sea, and where they halted they found a second sheltered spot in which they determined to encamp for the remainder of the day and for the approaching night, as the wounds of one or two of the men, which had at first been considered mere scratches, were becoming not only extremely painful, but absolutely dangerous.

Maurice and the officer who had been liberated after the fight with the French and the Indians, were active in making the best of the situation during the delay, a duty in which the commander of the other section of the volunteers was busily engaged also.

The restoration of this officer to liberty was a source of extreme gratification to Maurice, inasmuch as he was neither more nor less than Francis Ellencourt, the cousin of Alice, who, at the time of his capture, was on his way to Boston to visit his relatives and friends, whom he had not seen for a long period.

Maurice and he had first met at Cape Ann a couple of years previously, where our hero and his sister Florence had been on a visit, and when an intimacy sprang up between the three which became very warm in a very short space of time.

So far as Mr. Ellencourt and Florence were concerned, this was soon made apparent; for, in the course of a single week, there was no disguising the fact, that the one was exceedingly happy in the society of the other.

Nor was this all; for on the return of Florence to Boston, she frequently received a missive from the young officer that heightened the rose on her beautiful cheek and set all her pulses in rapid motion.

The fact is, Francis had received permission from Maurice to write to her, and hence the correspondence in question, and the tender secret, which in Boston was known only to brother and sister and the Ravenswoods.

So deeply imbued were the people of Boston and the surrounding settlement with the terrible superstition of the day, that the few who were possessed of more rational views on the subject, and who regarded the league between Church and State against freedom of thought as infamous in the extreme, dared not express themselves openly, for fear of becoming entangled in the meshes of both powers.

Among the boldest and most outspoken of the mere handful of Liberals—a dozen or so—to be found in the town and near it, were the Fitz Raymonds and the Ravenswoods; although even these were cautious at times, and knew that their opposition to the persecutions of the Church was at their peril.

It was to them revolting in the extreme to hear of the atrocities inflicted almost daily upon innocent persons of every age and sex, by men who assumed to be commissioned from on high, and who alleged that the dungeon, the fagot and the rope were necessary to the spread of gospel truth and the welfare of human souls.

If Baron Munchausen was the central figure of the creed of Christendom, and the originator of the beliefs and theories of which it is constituted, it could not be more absurd and untenable than it is. In the first place, it presupposes a creator of all things, who is omnipotent, omnipresent and omniscient; who is all-wise, all-great and all-good, and, the next moment, it tells us that he had botched the work of creation, and got so angry with the fruits of his own incapacity, that he wiped out the whole animated world with a flood, save some necessary representative pairs, that he had most consistently preserved to perpetuate the very breeds he was about to destroy. There is not one of Baron Munchausen's stories more lamentably preposterous—more utterly ridiculous than that of the Deluge. The efficacy of the Flood, in so far as the purifying of the world was concerned, may find an illustration in Sodom and Gomorrah, and the infamous wars of the Jews. It was a dead failure, for the races that succeeded Noah were composed in part of as infamous a pack of scoundrels as could possibly have been found among antediluvians.

What did Baron Munchausen ever fabricate more absurd than the story of the Ark, with its freight of lions, tigers, panthers and every other savage creature in existence, from the white bear of the polar regions to the deadly cobra of India? Would it not have been quite as pleasant for the Creator to have harmonized and purified all the inhabitants of the world and to have saved them from destruction, as to have created a special millennium for the dangerous monsters that crowded that impossible old scow, and that became so amiable and so docile all in a moment, as to approach in sample pairs from every quarter of the globe, ignoring intervening seas and walking across that plank to their floating quarters in as gentle and good natured a manner as if they had never previously preyed upon each other.

The theory of evaporation was not well understood in those fanciful old days, else the people would have discovered that it not a single drop of rain that fell from the clouds but had been previously drawn from the stock of waters already on earth, and was but simply returned to them under a most admirable law. To have achieved the Flood, we should have had five miles deep of additional waters spread over the level of the ocean, with a view to submerging the tops of the highest mountains, and as there was no possible place for these waters to come from; and as, if they had been called into existence in any miraculous manner, at such a height from the earth's surface, they would have been frozen solid to a great depth, encasing the world in a sphere of ice, it may be fairly presumed that this old fable has been ruled out of court by common sense, and consigned to the dust heaps of the past.

It was an implicit belief in the alleged atrocities of the divine being, as set forth in the Bible, that fostered the spirit of blood and rapine which has characterized the Christian religion throughout a lapse of eighteen hundred years. If God told the children of Israel to steal, and prompted the murder of his own son, who shall find fault with those who choose to emulate his example? The fact is, as already observed, if you want a warrant for the commission of any crime, no matter how heinous, if you don't get it somewhere between the first chapter of Genesis and the last of Revelations, a drop of blood has never been shed under the laws of Draco.

These points had often been privately discussed between the Fitz Raymonds and the Ravenswoods, and a conclusion arrived at in relation to them, which influenced both families to repudiate much that was contained in "the book of books," and to set their faces against the terrible persecutions which were devastating the settlement under the sanction of the secular and the religious power. The households of both were permeated throughout with a deep hostility to the fiendish movements set on foot in these relations, and were consequently the most implacable enemies of Sloucher and the witchfinder.

The ferryman and his daughter had also become deeply impressed with the degraded aspect of the creed that led to the heinous crimes that were almost daily perpetrated beneath their eyes by men who assumed to be doing the will of God, notwithstanding that they were palpably imbruing their hands in innocent blood.

There were of course some others in and about the town who sympathized with the opinions of the two families, and who secretly denounced the superstition that had consigned so many already to the dungeon and the rope; but so deep a dread had fallen upon the people, that few dared to copy the example of the Ravenswoods or the Fitz Raymonds, by uttering occasionally an indignant protest against such foul inhumanity.

When Sloucher and his companions, the Noose and the half-breed, had decided fully on their course of action, the two latter sallied forth once more, and left the Fanatic to himself and his humane meditations. Now that he was alone, and the hour solate, one might suppose that he would have repaired at once to his humble couch. But the supposition would be at fault, for no sooner had the Noose and Light-foot disappeared, than he closed and bolted the heavy oak door through which they had just passed, and approached the hearth where the fire was still burning.

Here he knelt down, and raising a small flag close to the chimney, drew from beneath it a large key, which he at once applied to the lock of one of the doors that shut off the apartments already mentioned.

Speedily the bolt answered to the nervous twist of his massive, bony hand, and the door swung upon its hinges, revealing a comfortable, if not expensively furnished room, with a large and curiously wrought silver lamp, upon a centre table, whose mellow rays were thrown upon an arm-chair of antique workmanship that stood beside a few dying embers that smouldered in the fire place.

Into this seat he now threw himself, and, resting his head upon his hand, he began thinking aloud, and running over the events of the last couple of days.

"Yes!" he observed, "my resolve is taken; she shall be mine, were I ultimately constrained to seal the secret with her death. Once in my power, I can shut her in from the whole world, and then her life and her happiness, if she will, are in her own hands. The Noose and the half-breed can take care of themselves, and try the depths of the forest with their prizes; and then bid good-by to the settlement. As for myself, I have committed my whole being to this issue. Alice Ravenswood, I shall not trust you even to the walls of a prison, now. I shall be your jailor and your executioner if you drive me to it!"

After some sentences, which were ejaculated at intervals, he remained for a few moments wrapt in the most profound thought. Then, rising slowly from his seat, he took up the lamp, the rays of which could not find a single crevice to struggle through to any of the adjoining apartments or to the outer world, and opening another and smaller door, which led into a sleeping room, he disappeared for the night.

When Alice found herself in the wigwam of Red

Wing, by the side of Martha and Firefly, she breathed more freely than she had since the hour of her flight from the town; and expressing her sense of relief to her beautiful protectress, when the chief disappeared at the instance of the ferryman's daughter, she observed:

"Dear Firefly, when we last parted, I had but little idea that when we met again it should be thus, and that I should be indebted to you and your brave husband for the shelter and assistance that enable me to set my enemies at defiance for the time being. How grateful ought I to be to kind Providence for this favor shown me in the hour of my extremity."

"Sweet white squaw make 'um mistake," returned Firefly, smiling, "'um Providence make all spoil; 'um make white squaw trouble, and 'um no kill bad mans who hunt 'um. 'Um half-breed! 'Um make good one side and trouble on the other so much as more."

"There is some truth in what she says," chimed in Martha, "for this Providential escape you allude to involves Providential exposure, which balances the account; so that, after all, there's very little to be grateful for, when we come to view the affair in its proper light."

"White mans make 'um Great Spirit too much in one place," said Firefly. "Make 'um too much talk like squaw. Make 'um bid bad mans sneak after poor white squaw and kill 'um. Red Wing better than white man's Great Spirit. 'Um fight for white squaw and save 'um from kill."

Even the most liberal minds in the settlement had not yet advanced so far as to doubt in toto the authenticity of the Scripture records, so that the startling proposition of Firefly regarding the superiority of the God of the Red man found but little favor with Alice, although there was something about the unsophisticated argument of the beautiful squaw that impressed her seriously. She perceived, without an effort, that between the alleged beneficence of the Creator of all things, and the works of his accredited agents, as they termed themselves, there was an impassable gulf, and that had the latter been the emissaries of the foul fiend himself, greater infamy and cruelty could not have been expected at their hands. She had not yet learned the great fact, that cause and effect are God's right hand and left, and that good and evil are necessarily complements of each other. Had she comprehended that all law is universal, and that a partial revelation, under the divine government, was an impossibility, she would have arrived at the conclusion that all religious sects, beliefs and theories were but simply the offspring of an imperfect appreciation of things, and of the influences of climate, education or early habits on our part.

The three friends were conversing on this and other subjects, when Red Wing entered from the ferryman's. Martha was glad to hear from the chief that her father had accepted, with more than his ordinary courage, the misfortune that had overtaken her, while Alice felt some consolation on hearing that Florence had determined to remain a few days at the villa, and that Robert Miles and John Langton were now aware of her place of refuge.

After some remarks upon the scene at the ferryman's, and the summary manner in which the Noose was disposed of by the lover of Martha, the chief informed Firefly of the journey he was constrained to take on the morrow, and of the fact that all the Indians in the ravine, save two, were going, at the same time, on a hunting expedition, from which they might not return for three or four days, although he should be back on the day following that of his departure.

The fugitives had already partaken of some refreshments prepared by Firefly; and now, as it was time to retire, the furs, which had been brought from the cave, were called into requisition, and Firefly and her two guests entered the compartment of the wigwam already spoken of, while Red Wing stretched himself beside the smouldering embers, on the deer skins upon which Titmouse had slumbered the night previous.

The morning broke bright and glorious over the town and Bay, and, considering the lateness of the season, the air was warm and inviting.

That something of deep interest was about to occur, was quite evident, for toward ten o'clock, long-faced and silent groups were seen moving to and fro in the vicinity of the prison, where some lay unsentenced, and numbers who expected the rope or the cat-tail, were lying in awful suspense as to their fate.

There was to be a double spectacle of horror. A woman was to be publicly whipped for some offense against the Church, and another was to suffer the death penalty for witchcraft. Although the Fanatic and his two companions of the preceding night had other matters in hand, they could not resist the temptation of being present; and, besides, Sloucher's absence, on so glorious and triumphant an occasion, could not fail to attract attention, that might, perhaps, embarrass his operations in another direction.

At the prison gate the three scoundrels met Huskins, who had just emerged from the gloomy building, and who informed them that the whipping would first take place, and almost immediately.

In this he was correct; for scarcely had he made a single additional remark, when the gates of the dungeon were thrown open, and a vision of pale-faced loveliness and frightened modesty—a creature of the most exquisite beauty, stripped to the waist, was led forth between two coarse, low-browed ruffians, one of whom held a knout made of knotted whip-cord in his sinewy right hand.

When the sunlight struck on the beautiful apparition, and she caught a glimpse of the numerous faces that were turned sternly toward her, she uttered a sharp, wild cry, and attempted to conceal with her outspread hands her two beautifully moulded breasts which in their fullness gushed between her taper fingers where one of her nipples gleamed like a rosebud or ruby. Her hair, which had not been cut off, was dark and luxuriant, and swept her shoulders as she eagerly turned from side to side, as if seeking some avenue of escape. Her eyes were a miracle of darkness, and her face so exquisite that something like a suppressed murmur of admiration was heard in one part of the crowd, as she was pushed forward by her jailors.

In a few moments she stood in an open space surrounded by trees opposite the dungeon where she had been confined for but a short period only, so speedily had her sentence followed her arrest, and so inexorable the clerical council that had doomed her to such cruel and ignominious pain and degradation.

Not a fibre of compassion was moved in the infamous soul of the Fanatic, or in that of any of his companions, at a spectacle so well calculated to melt even a heart of stone. The Noose even passed some unseemly jokes upon the fair bosom and trembling lips, and seemed anxious to witness the first cut of the lash that should lacerate her delicate flesh, for she had evidently been born in no low station of life.

Her hands were now quickly fastened with cords to a post in the centre of the space, and the man with the knout stepped back a pace or so, as if about to begin his hellish work.

At this juncture there was the report of fire-arms among the trees, and the next instant, and just as he was in the act of raising his murderous lash, a bullet pierced the brain of the executioner, and he fell a corpse where he stood.

The wildest commotion ensued in an instant, but ere it had time to manifest itself in any active measure for the apprehension of the murderer, a second report was heard, and, this time, the head of the beautiful prisoner fell suddenly forward, and she sank to the earth without a moan. Another bullet had entered her heart just below the crimson nipple she had sought to conceal a few moments previously from the rude gaze of the fanatical mob.

The last deliberate deed of blood, which had anticipated the sufferings of the now lifeless maiden, and saved her from a further sense of shame, degradation, and from bodily anguish, leading doubtless to a lingering death, wrought the cruel and relentless crowd into madness filled with terror. They could not comprehend the terrible daring which prompted the two deliberate acts—one in the light of vengeance, and the other in that of mercy. There was no one to be seen, and all were anxiously looking for some explanation as to the possible perpetrator of the terrible deed, when suddenly there appeared in their midst a youth of noble presence, with a gun in his hand and a brace of pistols in his belt.

Without uttering a single sentence, he bounded toward the lifeless form of the beautiful maiden, and in an instant cut the cords that bound her hands. He then, as she sank deeper on the earth, leaned over her and kissed her wildly. The crowd recognizing in him the person who had committed the double deed of blood, rushed forward to tear him limb from limb, but ere a single hand was laid upon him, quick as lightning he drew one of his pistols, fired and sank a corpse on the prostrate form of her he loved.

He and a few friends had tried every means in their power to soften the heart of her judges, but to no purpose. So, finding that she was to be whipped on the morning in question before the jail, he secreted himself at day-break in an evergreen close by the whipping post, determined to rescue her with a bullet from the degradation that awaited her, and then to sacrifice his own life on the same altar.

The body of the coarse ruffian who had been struck down was borne away hastily from the scene, while those of the two lovers were left to some friends who ventured to claim them when the crowd had gathered round the jail once more, to await the appearance of the witch who was to expiate her crime on the scaffold, for the time for her execution had now arrived.

The Fanatic and his friends had been terribly disappointed at the unexpected termination of the whipping affair. The release of instant death was considered by them altogether deplorable, inasmuch as the crime of the accused had not been expiated fully, through lengthened pangs of bodily anguish. This latter humane idea was entertained by every long-faced clerical wolf on the ground, as well as by the degraded wretches who, following in the footsteps of the Church, believed that human anguish, human gore and human degradation formed the staple of the only adoration acceptable to the triune God.

Scarcely half an hour had elapsed since the tragedy just described had closed, when the gates of the prison were thrown open once more, but this time a being of very different aspect emerged from them between two guards who had not previously presented themselves, and who were surrounded by a number of soldiers, with halberts, and bearing horse pistols in their belts.

This was a woman, also, but with white flowing hair, and almost bowed to the earth beneath the weight of years. As she was not yet bound, and leaned on her well-worn staff, she looked up now and then as she passed along, at the cruel eyes that were fastened upon her, and heard with a sort of stony unconcern and with lack-lustre eye, the heartless jibes with which she was greeted.

One of her arms was bared to the elbow for the purpose of exhibiting to the superstitious groups through which she moved, a large brown mole, now scarcely distinguishable from the flesh of the frail dark limb on which it was pointed to as incontrovertible evidence of her dealings with the foul fiend.

On this having been mentioned by one of the guards, hisses and hootings immediately filled the air, together with a chorus of opprobrious epithets heaped at every step upon her defenseless head. Only one thing that had life among that cruel crowd looked upon her wonderingly and lovingly, and that was a dog which followed close by her side, and which now and then gazed into her withered and wrinkled face with a piteous moan. He had been her faithful companion for long years, and now he was her only friend in the last moments of her existence. She seemed to comprehend his faithfulness and love; for once or twice, as she was hurried along, she tried to reach him with a caressing hand, but in vain.

The gallows had been erected at some distance from the whipping-post, so that the poor creature was so much fatigued when she reached it, she had to be carried on the scaffold. Here she was unable to stand, having to be supported by two brutal soldiers who had just passed a heartless joke with Nat the Noose.

As the rope was being put about her neck, and her hand pinioned behind her back, she caught a glimpse of the Fanatic and his companions. All her apathy and feebleness seemed to disappear in a moment, for she stood almost erect, and looking about her upon the throng of upturned faces, she cried in a voice of unexpected power and startling energy, while fastening her eyes upon Sloucher, once more:

"Accursed among men, and forsaken of heaven, hear my dying words, Solomon Sloucher. You who have brought me to this with your infamous falsehood, and who are the prime mover in all the persecutions that now afflict this land, shall soon be called to a dread account for your infamy.

"Those whose instrument and prompter you are, shall fall with you, but your last hour shall be filled with horror beyond that of any of them. Blood and plunder and lust have marked your course. Your religion has been that of the wild beast; and the sanctified murderers and robbers that fill the Church and the pul—"

Before the word was finished, a signal from a cadaverous looking minister who stood on the scaffold beside her, cut the sentence short, and before the cap had been even put on her head, she was swinging in mid air with her white hair streaming in the wind and her dog howling mournfully beneath her.

Applause and execrations arose to the echo, as she struggled and writhed in the merciless clutch of death. Through some error the cap, which should have covered her face, had been forgotten, and now the latter presented to the gaze of some few present at least, a battle field the most terrible. Her frame was so light that her neck had not been dislocated by the fall, so that, as her features indicated, she was being remorselessly strangled. The veins stood out on her forehead like whip-cord, and her tongue protruded from her mouth, while her eyes had started from their sockets, and glared hideously far beyond her forehead.

At this terrible stage of the murder, the hangman, a huge, burly scoundrel, took hold of the rope, and with a hoarse laugh leaped down upon her shoulders. The blood sprang from her nostrils, purple patches overspread her face, a slight tremor ran through her whole form, her limbs fell limp and straight beneath her, and she was dead!

When the last scene was over, the Fanatic, the Noose and the half-breed turned away from the spot. They had kindred work in hand, and as it was verging toward the afternoon, there was no time to be lost. As they moved along, the Noose referred to the prediction of the witch; but Sloucher, who appeared to be occupied with his own thoughts, made no remark upon the subject.

ANOTHER BROOKLYN SCANDAL.—This time a Catholic Priest, the Rev. Michael Hickey, pastor of a church in South Brooklyn, has suddenly abandoned his flock, and charges of a two-fold character are brought against him. 1st. For appropriating to his own use considerable sums of money that had been contributed toward building a new church. But the more serious charge is connected with a young lady. He had been holding a clandestine correspondence with a young lady at a boarding school. These letters had been intercepted by the father of the girl, and when he went with the letters to the priest and upbraided him, the latter was at first imperious and contemptuous, but when he learned the father had his letters, he cooled down very materially; and the next thing known about him was that he was among the missing.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL

OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XXI.

Among the many "big stories" with which the Bible abounds may be included that of Balaam and his ass (or his jennet, for it was a female ass), and the conversation she held with her master. This is the only instance in the whole history of the world, including the animal kingdom, of an ass speaking the human language. Asses and mules have a language of their own, if the noise they make may be dignified with that title, but while it is very sonorous it is not regarded as being musical or possessing much variation.

The formation of sounds constituting human language requires a peculiar set of organs which alone are found in man, and hence it is an utter impossibility for horses, cattle, dogs, and all other kinds of animals to make the various sounds and connect them together, which constitute a human language, and no amount of education or practice on the part of animals can overcome this difficulty. Parrots are about the only exception to the rule; they have the faculty of imitating various sounds, and can be taught to articulate words and imitate human speech. Thus, asses, though they have no deficiency of lung power, are lacking in the essential organs for modulating and connecting sounds, and they will never be able to speak with a human voice.

Our remarks apply only to four-legged asses; there are many of the two-legged kind that not only possess the organs of speech, but use them also to such extent that many who have been compelled to listen to their braying have heartily wished they could talk no better than their four-legged namesakes.

Æsop, who lived some four thousand years ago, and who taught excellent moral lessons by means of fables, often represented asses, lions, cattle, dogs and other animals and birds as using human speech, and he often caused them to utter sound sense and wisdom. He knew, however, his readers would understand his recitals were mere fables, and that no one would for a moment think those animals really talked.

Charles Dickens, of our own time, used to draw largely upon his imagination in the stories he wrote. If he did not say that animals used human speech, in his fancy he converted the merest shadows, articles of furniture, andirons, shovels and tongues and various other household goods into human beings, and made them talk, and often with excellent sense too, but after all, he knew nobody would believe these articles were really human beings, or that they used human speech, but would understand in a moment, that he was only letting his fancy have a little innocent play for a specific purpose.

How often have many of us in our childhood days witnessed the effects of imagination when alone in the dark, either out of doors or within; how impelled by fear, trees, stumps, posts and other objects assumed human shape, the slightest movement of a limb would fill our imagination with ghosts and hobgoblins, and in the sighing of the wind through cracks and crevices often we heard human voices. As we arrived at years of discretion, however, these fancies took their flight, having no more existence, in fact, than "the baseless fabric of a dream."

This Bible story differs from all these. This is given us as a bona fide fact, and priests tell us it is divine truth, penned even by the hand of God himself, and must be believed. Let us look at it a moment and see if it appears probable. That which is divine ought at least to possess probability. No one knows who wrote the account. Our Christian friends attribute it to Moses, but they have not the slightest authority for doing so, and even if he did write it, we cannot see why we should believe him, as he was not present to know the events he was writing about. This total uncertainty as to who wrote the story is quite sufficient, with the improbability of its truth, to excite our strongest suspicions as to its fabulous character.

It seems while the Israelites were journeying towards the land of Canaan they came in among other nations and tribes of people, who, from the aggressive character of the Israelites feared and dreaded them. Balak king of the Moabites was greatly annoyed by their presence, and wished to gain some advantage over them, and for this purpose sent some of his princes to Balaam, a prophet of Midian to come over and curse the Israelites for his benefit. Balaam did not belong to God's chosen people, but nevertheless seemed to be on very good terms with him, and held direct conversation with him. When the king of Moab sent for Balaam, God went to him and asked him what those men wanted. Balaam, like an honest man, told God the facts in the case, that Balak wanted him to go over and give Israel a good cursing. Then God told Balaam he should not go, neither should he curse his people, for they were blessed. So Balaam the next morning sent word to Balak that he could not go over.

Upon receiving this intelligence, Balak sent over more princes of a still higher grade, and urged Balaam still more strongly to come over, offering to confer great honors upon him if he would come. Balaam, however, was unmoved and replied, if Balak would give him a house full of gold and silver, he would do and say no more than God authorized. He, however, begged the messengers to wait over night, that he might see God again and have another conversation with him upon the subject. God held another interview with Balaam that night, and he told him to go with the men when he arose in the morning, and that he would be there and direct him in what he should say and do. So in the morning, in accordance with God's instructions, Balaam saddled his ass and went with the princes of Moab. But here we have another instance of God's fickle and changeable character; though he had just a few hours before told Balaam to go, yet no sooner had he yielded to these instructions, and while he was on his way, God's anger was kindled very suddenly, and he became greatly incensed toward Balaam for doing just what he told him to do, and he had one of his angels stand in the road for an adversary, so as to prevent Balaam and his two servants from passing. This disagreeable habit God had of flying into a passion on the most trifling provocations, as so often narrated in the Bible, was one which cannot be recommended for human beings to imitate. It is far better, under all circumstances, to keep cool and unruffled.

There was one fact connected with this affair which seems singular. Although Balaam seemed to be a man remarkably favored of God, and had several interviews and conversations with him, yet he was far inferior to his ass in spiritual discernment. She saw the angel, but her master could not. That was truly a remarkable ass; she could not only talk, but could see spirits. She must have been a medium. She seems, however, to have been afraid of the angel, for when she saw it, she turned out of the road and went into the fields. It was Balaam's turn to get angry now, and he struck Jenny to turn her back into the road; but as Balaam and the ass were passing close to a vineyard wall, the angel appeared again before the ass and caused her to shie up to the wall and crush Balaam's foot, when he beat her again. Farther on, in a very narrow pass, where there was barely room for the ass, the angel again placed himself before the ass, and as she could neither turn to the right nor left, she fell down, and probably Balaam fell off, for now he got very angry again and smote the ass with a staff. At this juncture God interfered and opened Jenny's mouth, and she talked and asked her master what she had done, to cause him to beat her these three times. Balaam did not seem at all surprised to hear his ass talk thus, and simply replied that he had beat her because she had mocked him, and regreted he had not a sword with him that he might kill her at once. The ass then asked him if she was not his ass, and whether she had ever misbehaved before, and he acknowledged she had not. Then the Lord opened Balaam's eyes, and he too saw the angel with a sword in his hand, and he immediately fell on his face. The angel put him through a short catechism and reproved him for his conduct. He also told Balaam if the ass had not turned out of the way as she did, he (the angel) would have slain Balaam and kept the ass alive. Balaam, fearing he had been doing wrong, proposed to turn back and not pursue his journey farther, but the angel told him to go on with the men.

Now this is all a singular story. That God should interest himself so greatly in a matter of no more apparent consequence; that he should hold conversations with Balaam, and talk to him as one man would talk to another, is entirely different from what he does now-a-days. Then his being under the necessity of asking Balaam what the men wanted, seems a little odd. God who knows every-thing would not seem to be under the necessity of doing this. What great difference could it make whether Balaam cursed Israel or not? If God had blessed him and did not want curses should fall upon him, couldn't he do just as he pleased about it? Then after conferring with Balaam and telling him to go, it seems to us weak in him that he should fly in a passion at him for going. A man merely, with a small allowance of reason, would hardly act so absurdly, but the Bible makes God to get very angry on a great many occasions on the slightest provocation, and to do many things which a man with half sense would be ashamed of. Then obstructing the way so the ass could not get along, causing her to be beat three times, and crushing Balaam's foot, really seems like "small business" for God to be engaged in, especially with no greater apparent reason. The story says he made the ass to talk, and as it was probably the only time that such a beast ever did talk, it would seem she ought to have uttered something more important. All she said was to ask Balaam what he whipped her for, and whether she had not always served him faithfully? As it was so easy for God and Balaam to converse together it appears wholly unnecessary for God to perform such a miracle, to make a beast speak which had no organs of speech, merely to ask two or three simple, unimportant questions. God does not do such things now; but the priests tell us his ways are mysterious and past finding out. Nothing seems to have been gained by all this trouble and detention, for Balaam was told to go on according to the programme laid out. When he met Balak he had the latter build, in all, twenty-one altars, and offer on each an ox and a ram to get God in a good humor so that he might put into his mouth what he should say; but blessings on the Israelites where Balak wanted cursings were all that came. This shows one thing, that building altars and offering oxen and sheep to the Lord to produce a favorable influence was not peculiar to the Israelites, for the heathen around them had the same fashion. We also see that heathen prophets had access to God and talked with him the same as the most favored of God's peculiar people.

A question that naturally arises is, why did God open the ass' mouth and give it human speech? Was it because Balaam had beat her? If it was for that reason, and he is "always the same," why does he not now open the mouths of asses, horses, mules, oxen and brutes of all kinds when they are whipped, and so cruelly abused by hard-hearted man? If he did not give Jenny human speech for that purpose what in the world was it for? Did he get before her to cause her to shie and crush Balaam's foot that he might beat her, that her mouth might be opened and she ask Balaam why he did thus? The conundrum is too great, we give it up; the mystery is too deep, we will not try to fathom it.

Balaam seems to have been a good sort of man and doubtless tried to do as God wanted him to, but nevertheless in a short time after this he was cruelly murdered with the five kings of Midian, and all the men of the nation, at the time God authorized Moses to send twelve thousand men to utterly destroy them and devastate their country.

There are a good many points in this story we would like to notice, but we will have to let them pass. Our article is already too lengthy. In closing we will just say, we are willing anybody should believe this story who wants to. For our part we think it is altogether too silly and childish to believe for a moment that the Deity that rules all worlds and pervades every particle of matter in the Universe, either ever had anything to do in the asinine events here narrated, or in writing or dictating such a senseless, preposterous story.

Another Letter from George Snode.

BELOIT, OHIO, Feb. 8th, 1875.

MR. BENNETT, Dear Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 1st contains an article to stop your Paper, written over my signature; you called it uncomplimentary (Thanks for the concession) I should have been sorry indeed, if you had construed it in any other way; Was sorry that I forgot the sum due on your paper, as I do not want you to estimate my Religion and honor as low as you do your friendship, which can be bought sold and bartered away for seventy-five cents. (For that is the amount that severed us taking your own Words for it) I shall remit that amount with the greatest of Pleasure; and Pleas accept my thanks for the great favor you conferred by giving my name a Place in your Dr. column.

1st. You say you are SORRY that "a year's Reading the T. S. has done me no more good."

My Dear Sir do you go to the gutters of your city or some filthy stagnant Pool to wash and expect to come away clean and refreshed?

Or when you want to breath the pure fresh air, do you go to some back filthy alley or some loathsome dark dungeon? Or are you in the habit of going in a cellar or a coal bank to see the sunshine; Instinct would teach you better than that if nothing else.

I intend to go to the fountain head for all Pure good and enobling thoughts to guide my steps in this world let that be to sustain my Phisical, Moral, spiritual or mental.

2d. You think I am as much in the dark as though I had never seen a "liberal Paper." Mr. Bennett Pleas tell me what good has such liberal Papers and free speech done in the world? We only have to look at France Blood Washed Infidel France, and that answers all.

Infidelity was the mother, Disbelief and Obscenity the Cradle that nursed and cradled the viper that poisoned her life's blood.

You say, "the thoughtful are reaching for a higher phase of truth." A Heard of men that can see more beauty and morality in the Koran (than in the Bible) a Book that has very little novelty or Originality to recommend it, the most material parts of it being borrowed from the Old Testament or the New, and even these are so deformed by Passing through the hands of the impostor, who vitiate and debases everything he touches. In the Koran, Mahomet continually boasting of his own merits and the Excelencies of his book the son of Mary is the oposite.

3d. When Infidelity triumphs in any heart the hope of immortality is Banished; It crowns the Tyrant Death forever on his Throne and seals the Conquest of the grave over the human race forever, it wraps the tomb in eternal darkness, and suffers not one Particle of the remains of the great, the Wise, the good, of all ages to see the light of eternity; but consigns by an irreversible doom all that was admired, loved and revered in man, to perpetual annihilation. It identifies man with the vilest reptile and levels man to the grade of the meanest weed whose utility is yet undiscovered.

You rob him of everything which could make him dear to himself, and proud of his Existence, it murders all his hopes of future being and future bliss. It cuts the cable and casts away the golden Anchor and sets man adrift on the ocean, of uncertainty to become the sport of the Wind and waves of animal passion and appetites untill at last in some tremendous gale "he sinks to everlasting ruin." O skepticism is this thy Philosophy—is this thy Bosted victory over the Bible? And for this extinguishment of light and life eternally, What do you teach? You teach us to live according to our appetites and Passions, a mean animal life; You might well preach with zeal and exert all your energies for your heaven is only worthy of your efforts and the Purity of your life is just suited to the high hopes of eternal annihilation.

Yours in the hope of a hereafter,

GEORGE SNODE.

P. S. Mr. B. I have confidence enough in your honor as a man and as one of those that is earnestly seeking after "a higher phase of morality" and better code of morals that you will let the readers of the T. S. know that I have Paid the price of lost friendship "75 cents." I would not lose the Friendship of a dog for that sum much less that of one of the poor deluded sons of Adam.

Respectfully,

G. S.

REPLY.—We cheerfully lay the fact before our readers, that Mr. George Snode has sent in the sum of seventy-five cents, which pays for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to the time of his discontinuance. We are obliged to him for this compliance on his part to the rules of right and justice. The publishing of his letter with our accompanying remarks, has done this much good, if no more. If, by the same means, others in arrears—both those who have stopped and those who have not stopped their papers—can be induced to do likewise, we will feel well repaid. Seventy-five cents is not an immense sum to us, but a good many of these together count up, and we find these little amounts very necessary in meeting the bills presented to us.

As to the sum of seventy-five cents buying our friendship or respect, our friend slightly miscomprehends us. Though it does cause us to esteem a man higher if he pays what he justly owes, it does not buy our respect for a blackguard or a falsifier.

It seems our remarks had the effect to draw Mr. S. out—not only his pocket-book, but his piety and historical lore. We only wish he had adhered more closely to the truth in his rejoinder. An Infidel values the truth very highly, and expects to be amenable if he violates it. With a Christian it makes not so much difference; if he deviates from the truth, or commits any other offence against morality, the one he depends upon for righteousness and atonement will perhaps pay all such debts he may contract, and he possibly even shine brighter in glory than he who depends upon his own good deeds for happiness and justification.

Mr. Snode says, "when Infidelity triumphs in any heart, the hope of immortality is banished." This is wholly untrue. There are hundreds of thousands in this country, and hundreds of millions in the world who are entirely infidel to the system of Christianity, and yet entertain a bright and cheerful hope of a life beyond the grave; and we think a far more consistent one than the average Christian. True, immortality is a mystery; many cannot understand how organized beings, which had a beginning fifty or seventy-five years ago, can become immortal or never-ending, and they have doubts upon the subject. Others have received proofs that are satisfactory to them that there is an intelligence outside of the body, and that their friends and relatives who have passed out of sight, still exist and retain their identity. Unfortunately Christianity throws no light upon this subject, and what belief or views it has, were borrowed from the heathen religions which preceded it. It so happens, however, that no belief that may be entertained upon the subject makes the slightest difference as to the facts. Whether we exist as individuals after death or not, belief or non-belief in the matter makes not the slightest difference one way or the other. If there is a brighter world after this, an honest Infidel will doubtless be quite as well prepared for it as a canting, self-righteous hypocritical Christian.

Mr. S. says, "Infidelity crowns the tyrant Death forever on his throne, and seals the conquest of the grave over the human race forever; it wraps the tomb in eternal darkness, and suffers not one particle of the remains of the great, the wise, the good of all ages to see the light of eternity, but consigns to an irreversible doom all that was admired, loved and revered in man, to perpetual annihilation." This is also utterly false. There are ten times, yes, probably a hundred times as many Infidels in the world who believe in a happy existence after death as there are Christians. As we just remarked, however, no belief we may hold upon the subject can make the slightest change in the reality, what we want is the truth, so far as it can be ascertained; and this is what the intelligent Infidel is searching after. The most skeptical view that is entertained, is not so horrible as our friend paints it. It is simply that we return to the same condition we occupied previous to our birth. We never heard any one bewail the death, the horror and the eternal darkness he was in previous to his existence.

What, on the other hand, is the future which the Christian religion holds out to us? It is, that ninety-nine-hundredths of the millions of billions of human beings that have existed on the earth are irrevocably doomed through an endless eternity to suffer the torments of an excruciating, burning hell. The most ultra Infidel unbelief is a thousand times preferable to this horrible doctrine, and if belief could possibly change it at all, commend us forever to a long, quiet sleep rather than burning and writhing in a terrible hell. The hell-believers seem to think that the tortures of that horrible place are not destined for them, but for their cursed neighbors, and especially for the Infidels. But the belief that one-millionth part only of the human race are to suffer forever in hell, is incomparably worse than the most ultra form of skepticism.

(Continued on page 8.)

The Jews and their God.

BY ISAAC PADEN.

CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

In connection with the examination of this subject, the existence of spiritual beings inevitably comes in for a share of our attention. In the Bible various accounts are given of these spiritual personages being seen, under various circumstances and conditions. The seeing of them is not an opinion, but a fact, claimed by all nations and ages of the world, and even at the present day. To deny their existence, would give the lie to all nations, and to some of the best men of our own time. This, perhaps, should place it beyond a doubt. But here is a mystery, the extreme Materialist, who denies the immortality of man, and our Christian friends agree, that there are none seen and talked with at the present time. In this the materialist is far the most consistent, as Christians claim they were once seen and talked with, but not now. If the question rested upon the claims of the Christian, and those who deny man's immortality, presumption decides the question in favor of the Infidel; if none now, there never was any.

Here the Christian, in his defense, replies to this reasonable decision: "Yes, there may be spiritual personages or spirits now seen by those who are mediums, but they are all of the Devil and his angels or evil spirits, but those seen and talked with by Abraham, Jacob, Moses and others, were God himself and his holy angels." Here we propose to take our Christian friends at their word, and admit their claims, that God and his holy angels administered in person in the affairs of man, from Adam to Constantine, and that the Devil and his angels have been exercising in person to rule ever since, or at least from the days of Swedenborg, and are now doing all in their power to govern the affairs of man. This is the substance of the claims of the Christian world on this point. And the thing most necessary is to realize the condition of man then and now.

How was it then, commencing with Abraham, when the idea of one God and angels were first introduced, previous to Abraham's day? Gods were in the plural, and the original Greek from which the Bible was copied, begins with the words, "In the beginning the Gods created the heavens and earth, Gods in the plural was used throughout" in the creation of man, which agrees with all ancient records of the different nations. Abraham and his God, entered into a covenant of circumcision, changing and altering the private member of each male as a mark of distinction, the same as a stock raiser cuts off a piece of the ear of his calf or pig. There was also a land contract entered into, the possession of which cost rivers of human blood and the destruction of property, the value of which is beyond figures. This was all done by the command of Abraham's God in person, aided and assisted by angels. As for the slaughter and carnage throughout, there is no parallel.

It is also recorded, Jacob had a wrestle (rough and tumble) with the same personage that he calls God, and prevailed, but in the fall got his thigh put out of joint. Here he refused to tell his name, but blessed Jacob and left for fear of daylight. We would ask, was he afraid some one would see him and know him?

It is an undeniable fact, wars and bloodshed were the only means advised by the Jewish God to settle national disputes; in fact death was the penalty for all crimes, and in some cases the criminal's father's house had to suffer with the criminal. Fraud, deception, theft and robbery were the national character of the Jews; polygamy, whoredom and concubinage were tolerated. Human slavery and selling females for wives and concubines were the practices of the day. A compound of drugs, that would poison a horse, was given to the wife of a jealous husband, but no redress for the woman, who was cursed with a dishonest companion. Where is justice to be found in such a law. The priests and those in authority, put to death all who dissented from them in religious views—their God aiding and assisting in all this. Tyranny was the ruling power.

But our Christian friends may tell us, God and his angels have not spoken to man on earth, nor made their appearance since the New Testament was written, therefore God is not responsible for what Constantine and the Pope did. Not so, friends, you claim the commands, statutes and laws recorded in the Bible, were put there by God himself, to govern his people in after days. This Constantine and the popes believed and acted in accordance therewith.

How are things now, under the reign of the Devil and evil spirits, who now appear in person, conversing with men and women face to face, such as Swedenborg, Judge Edmonds and thousands of others, who, for truth and veracity, stand unimpeached? These spirits or spiritual personages are, and have been, using all their power and influence to wean the affections of man away from the God of the Jews, and to abandon all the Jewish and heathen relics of savage barbarism. I ask, how is it now? Wars and bloodshed are being now discarded, and arbitrations are now about to be instituted to settle national difficulties. Crimes of all kinds are now being punished according to the aggravation in the case, and the death penalty is now limited to only murder in the first degree, and that is discarded by our best humanitarians. Polygamy, whoredom and concubinage are prohibited by law. As for jealous wives and husbands, our laws are the same for both. As for priestly power and divine authority, by which thousands were put to death, they are becoming things that once were, and men and women are now permitted to worship God according to the dictation of their own conscience. As for human slavery and selling females to the highest bidder, it is almost universally abandoned. Fraud, deception, theft and robbery are now individualized and punished by law, except in war, which is a Jewish relic, and cannot be avoided, until the god of war and of vengeance is discarded, and the god of peace and good-will to man adopted. The reader is left to decide and judge between the condition of then and now.

We have said, there was a plurality of gods before the days of Abraham and Moses; and it is true. The Jews, as a nation, were the first people who claimed one God, and all other spiritual personages were angels. Before this they were all called gods, and many were named according to circumstances. Thus, Mammon was the god of riches, Bacchus was the god of wine, Cupid, the god of love, Æolus, the god that ruled the wind and lived on an island in the sea. There were the god of war and the god of peace. There were gods many, and lords many, but with the Jews there was but one God, all other spiritual personages were called angels. Thus their God and his angels were believed by the Jews to constitute the spirit world.

How was it with Abraham? He saw three men, which were three spirits who were materialized, so as to be a tangible substance, a fac simile, but could have vanished and disappeared at pleasure, the same as the hand that wrote upon the wall. Abraham called them men, and they were men in every sense; they ate, which proves their condition was the identical same as Jesus' was, when seen on the bank of the sea, eating broiled fish. Two of these men or spirits were afterward called angels, whose interest it was to inform the Sodomites that a volcano was about to burst upon them. But on account of ignorance and religious superstition, the history of the facts in the case are very imperfect, yet we may get the outlines. Abraham believed one of these three men was God the Lord, and held a conversation with him as such; and he was God in the sense he conceived him, when, in fact, he and the other two were angels or spirits materialized, the same as now. How was it with Jacob, who said, I have seen God and my life is preserved. Yet he calls the same person a man. How was it with Moses at the bush? He some times says it was God, at other times the angel of the Lord. It is recorded God got angry several times with Moses, and one time declared he would not go with him on their journey, but would send his angel. And the next thing you read, "And the Lord spake unto Moses saying." In all cases the power of an angel (spirit) was the same as he whom they called God. The idea of a god showing fear, as is recorded in the case of the building of the tower of Babel, that a man could build a road to heaven with brick, when he, God, said, "Go to, let us go down," etc.; also in the case of Sodom he came down—but there were three distinct persons—to see if the report he had heard was true. Are such ideas calculated to represent the true character of the Jewish God? If so, no wonder he yielded to the counsel of Moses, and asking Moses to let him alone, that he might execute his wrath. All this proves his inferiority and petulant passions. As for his name, he refused to give it to Jacob, but gave his name Jehovah to Moses. By this name he was not known among the gods. This proves he assumed this name, or was a new god.

Even in the days of Moses, the Lord himself makes Moses a god to Pharaoh, and claims to Moses that his origin is back of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but says he was known to them as God Almighty, but by the name of Jehovah he was not known to them. The idea of this Jewish god existing or figuring in anywise in the singular, previous to the days of Abraham is assumed and unwarranted. It is true he called himself God Almighty; but this proves nothing, when the plurality of gods is not only sustained by the records of all nations but admitted in the original Greek, and so expressed in the fore part of the Bible as being the order of the day previous to Abraham.

From Adam to Abraham he is not spoken of in the plural (Gen. i: 26; iii: 5-22; xi: 7), to Abraham and the Jews in the singular. The Lord appeared unto Abraham, etc. (Gen. xii: 7), to Hagar he appeared twice. First he is called the angel of the Lord, then Lord, and spake unto her; she says, "Thou God seest me;" also he says, "I will multiply thy seed," etc. (xvi: 10-13). Next the angel of God speaks out of heaven, tells Hagar what to do, assuming the authority of God himself as before. "For I will make him a great nation." It is evident the angel of the Lord, the Lord, thou God, the angel of God, and God who opened his eyes, were all one and the same person (Gen. xxi: 17-19). He again is said to appear to Abraham as the Almighty God, proposes to make a covenant with him and to multiply, etc. (Gen. xvii: 1). On another occasion he appears as a man, one of three. In this case the plural is used the same as before Abraham, except the first salutation after seeing them. Abraham addresses the singular and includes the other two by saying, "Comfort ye your hearts," and they said, "so do," etc. And they did eat; after dinner the men (not one) rose up from thence and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way. It is evident here they parted, and two went to Sodom—Lot's house; the other one Abraham called Lord, who said he had come down (from the spiritual sphere) to see if what had been told him was true. After a chat with Abraham, the Lord (in the singular) went his way unto his place (Gen. xviii). Two angels are next seen at Lot's, and stay with him over night, and Lot calls them Lords. He now appears to Jacob as the Lord God of Abraham, and having charge over a ladder upon which the angels (spiritual personages) ascended etc., (Gen. xxviii: 12, 13). He again appears to Jacob as a man, the same as he was when he ate dinner with Abraham—being alone he is called God, seen and handled by Jacob (Gen. xxxii: 24-30).

This same personage appears to Jacob, and orders him to build an altar, and is called God Almighty (Gen. xxxv: 1-11). His first appearance to Moses was that of an angel of the Lord in the burning bush, and said, "I am the God of thy father Abraham," etc., (Ex. iii: 2-6). When presented to Pharaoh he was called the Lord God of Israel. Pharaoh asked who is the Lord, and was told he is the God of the Hebrews (Ex. v: 1-3). Again he appears to Moses, and says his name is Jehovah; by this name he was not known (Ex. vi: 3). Before this he claimed his name to be I am that I am (Ex. iii: 14). He also tried to kill Moses and is called Lord (Ex. iv: 24). He makes Moses a god to Pharaoh (Ex. vii: 1).

When killing the first-born in Egypt it was necessary to put blood upon the door-post of each house in which the Jews lived, lest the Lord might make a mistake (Ex. xii: 7). He was called Baali, but this name he refused and was called Ishi (Hos. ii: 16); these names mean man, husband, etc.; the name Baali got mixed up with other gods. [See Hitchcock's Bible Margin]. His name, for common, was the Lord; or, the Lord of Hosts, which means boss or chairman over a goodly number of his equal lords, or one in charge. For instance in council sitting as chief (1 Kings xxii: 19; Job i: 6 and ii, 1). In both of these councils there were different grades of characters, yet all on friendly terms, attending to the business of the times.

We have given a few quotations in regard to the personages, whom the Jews claimed to be their God. We will now give a few others in regard to the places of his abode. Darkness was his secret place (Ps. xviii: 11). Darkness was under his feet, and round about him dark waters and thick clouds (2 Sam. xxii: 10-12). Dwells in thick darkness and Solomon builds him a house—a settled place to abide forever (1 Kings viii: 12, 13). 2 Chron. vi: 1 says the same. We now give a few quotations as to his disposition. On this point he is well mixed. One moment he is full of love, mercy and human kindness, and the next, as it were, he burst open in the most horrible rage like a savage monster. In fact in almost every page of the Jewish history, he is stained with human blood and most heart-rending threats: on this a few quotations will suffice. He is as a bear in wait and a lion in secret places (Lam. iii: 10). I will pour out my wrath like water; as a moth, and as rottenness to the house of Judah (Hos. v: 10-14). I will be unto them as a lion, as a leopard by the way; I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, and devour them like a lion (Hos. xiii: 7, 8). The Lord is a man of war (Ex. xv: 3). Hath sworn that he will have war with Amalek from generation to generation (Ex. xvii: 16). Full of vengeance, wrath and is furious (Nah. i: 2). The Lord goes forth as a mighty man; he shall stir up jealousy like a man of war. Yea more, will cry like a travelling woman, destroy and devour at once (Isa. 43: 13, 14). This is the day of the Lord God of hosts, a day of vengeance, the sword shall devour and made drunk with their blood (Jer. 46: 10). I will laugh at your calamity; I will mock when your fear cometh; when they call I will not answer; they shall seek me early but they shall not find me (Prov. i: 26-28). Dear reader, my soul sickens when reflecting on such a savage god, now imposed upon humanity by our theologians. One of the most changeable and excitable beings on record; one moment full of love and tender kindness, overflowing with compassion, the next minute in a rage of anger, bursting open with wrath and revenge, finding fault with that which he does himself (Gen. vi: 6; 1 Sam. xv: 11, also 35; Jer. xxvi: 19; 1 Chron. xxi: 15; 2 Sam. xxiv: 16; Ex. xxxii: 2-14; Ps. cvi: 45; Deu. xxxii: 36.) Notwithstanding his savage disposition, yet in the same record many acts and sayings are recorded that would be an honor and credit to any man. All of which goes to show he was a personage not only subject to, but absolutely possessed of all the imperfect attributes of a man from the sublime to the ridiculous. In no sense whatever above men, only in spiritual power and angelic majesty.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

REV. JOHN A. HUSKINS, who has been acting as pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church at Germantown, Pa., has been discovered to be a bigamist, having two wives in the same State. Upon the fact being discovered, he immediately fled with wife No. 2. Some are beginning to think ministers are not very much better than other folks.

A Respectable Lie.

BY LIZZIE DOTEN.

"A respectable lie, sir!" pray what do you mean?
Why the term in itself is a plain contradiction;
A lie is a lie, and deserves no respect,
But merciless judgment and speedy conviction.
It springs from corruption, is servile and mean,
An evil conception, a coward's invention;
And whether direct, or but simply implied,
Has naught but deceit for its end and intention."

Ah, yes! very well! So good morals would teach.
But facts are the most stubborn things in existence,
And they tend to show that great lies so in respect,
And hold their position with wondrous persistence.
The small lies, the white lies, the lies feebly told,
The world will condemn both in spirit and letter;
But the great, bloated lies will be held in respect,
And the larger and older the lie is, the better.

A respectable lie, from a popular man,
On a popular theme, never taxes endurance;
And the pure golden coin of unpopular truth,
Is often refused for the brass of assurance.
You may dare all the laws of the land to defy,
And bear to the truth the most shameless relation,
But never attack a respectable lie,
If you value a name or a good reputation.

A lie well established, and hoary with age,
Resists the assaults of the boldest seceder;
While he is accounted the greatest of saints
Who silences reason and follows the leader.
Whenever a mortal has dared to be wise,
And seize upon Truth, as the souls' "Magna Charta,"
He always has won from the lovers of lies,
The name of a fool, or the fate of a martyr.

There are popular and political lies,
And "lies that stick fast between buying and selling,"
And lies of politeness—conventional lies—
(Which scarcely are reckoned as such in the telling.)
There are lies of sheer malice, and slanderous lies,
From those who delight to peck filth like a pigeon;
But the older and far most respectable lies,
Are those that are told in the name of Religion.

Theology sits like a tyrant enthroned,
A system per se with a fixed nomenclature,
Derived from strange doctrines, and dogmas and creeds,
At war with man's reason, with God and with Nature;
And he who subscribes to the popular faith,
Never questions the fact of divine inspiration,
But holds to the Bible as absolute truth,
From Genesis through to St. John's Revelation.

We mock at the Catholic bigots at Rome,
Who strive with their dogmas man's reason to fetter;
But we turn to the Protestant bigots at home,
And we find that their dogmas are scarce a whit better.
We are called to believe in the wrath of the Lord,—
In endless damnation, and torments infernal;
While around and above us, the Infinite Truth,
Scarce heeded or heard, speaks sublime and eternal.

It is sad, but the day-star is shining on high,
And Science comes in with her conquering legions;
And every respectable, time-honored lie,
Will fly from her face to the mythical regions.
The soul shall no longer with terror behold
The red waves of wrath that leap up to engulf her,
For Science ignores the existence of hell,
And chemistry finds better uses for sulphur.

We may dare to repose in the beautiful faith,
That an Infinite Life is the source of all being;
And though we must strive with delusion and Death,
We can trust to a love and a wisdom all-seeing;
We may dare in the strength of the soul to arise,
And walk where our feet shall not stumble or falter;
And freed from the bondage of time-honored lies,
To lay all we have on the Truth's sacred altar.

Enthusiasm and Enthusiasts.

TO YOUNG TRUTH SEEKERS.

To all earnest men and women, to every one learning for the first time how to shake off the shackles of educational prejudice; most especially to those young and ardent souls who are just beginning to know the satisfied pleasure of thinking for themselves independently of creeds and dogmas, there comes a transitional stage, which is termed, by older and colder brains, "A period of enthusiasm,"—enthusiasm which, at white heat, is fanaticism, and when frozen into solidity is bigotry.

The first glimpse of truth comes to the heart of the man just beginning to think for himself, as does the world of reality to the dreamer, newly aroused from his slumber, and as yet only partially awake, as rather a portion of the world of vision than the real; and so it is not to be wondered at, that sometimes ludicrous mistakes are made ere the glamor of dream-land is completely shaken off. But having once caught a glimpse of the divine face of Truth, it is not long before, with all a young lover's ardor, he seeks boldly to know her face to face. And it is in his first eager and uncertain pursuit of her, that enthusiasm comes to help him on his way, making the beginning of the rugged path, which is to lead him to her, easier for his tender and inexperienced feet.

Enthusiasm always accompanies our first sincere belief in any truth; and sincere belief is the offspring of earnest thought and the parent of action; or, as Theodore Parker states: "In all great movements there are three periods; first, that of sentiment—there is only a feeling of the new thing; next, of idea—the feeling has become a thought; finally, of action—the thought becomes a thing."

I like to meet in this prosaic world of ours, an enthusiastic man or woman, even though, in their eager pursuit of the true, they plunge floundering at first in the direction of error. I do not fear for them; for I know that Truth will yet meet them half-way and lead them to the light. Enthusiasm has been the lever applied to every progressive movement and grand achievement. It is that which gives us at the outset in any great aim the faith to believe in our fellow-man's willingness to help, instead of retarding us on our way; it is that which makes martyrs smile at and glory in their pains.

But to all enthusiasts, there comes at last an hour of reaction—an hour when the young and fervid hearts are filled with a divine despair of accomplishing. They wonder at the luke-warmness, the apathetic indifference which men exhibit toward them and their aims. They begin then to question whether they have not, after all, been mistaken in their ideas. Then, for the first time comes lassitude, weariness, and they feel as though they had at last

"Lost the dream of doing,
And the other dream of done,
The first spring in the pursuing,
The first pride in the begun,
The first recoil from incompleteness
In the face of what is won."

It is in this hour that enthusiasm is first tested as to its solidity of basis. If the aims and hopes from which it emanates are not founded on the inherent love of truth in the soul and the most inflexible principle, then alas for the enthusiast!—for henceforth enthusiasm, which was but the propelling power to start him on his way, is gone forever, and only the bitter ashes of the Dead Sea fruit of error remains. At this time of depression and gloom, when firmness of principle must take the place of ardent enthusiasm, many fail from lack of will sufficient to overcome the difficulties which appear like mountains, but which indomitable resolution may reduce to mole-hills. But he who truly brave,—O how brave, how courageous, you who have never dared to think for yourselves, who know not the disheartening task of fighting daringly for "truth which men receive not now," can never know or even guess at—dare yet turn his face and footsteps steadily toward the goal of his early ambition; who shall, in spite men's unbelief and coldness, yet cry passionately with recanting Galileo, "But still it moves." He shall in the end triumph over all obstacles:

"For with his side shall stand at last
The victory of endurance born.

SARA A. UNDERWOOD,

Politics and Religion in the Granges.

BY A. GAYLORD SPAULDING.

It is evidently a wise regulation to exclude from the granges all exciting and bitter debates and discussions of partizan politics and sectarian religion, which tend to distract and divide the order; since the success and prosperity of any people or enterprise requires a spirit of harmonious unity and co-operation, firm and unwavering, that the winds cannot shake. But the principles of true politics and true religion are very different things. We want a new political dictionary for workingmen. When politics means home interests and every-day duties, of labor, production, wealth, and comfort, then it properly belongs to the grange. We also need a new defining of religion. When that is made to consist of love, affection, brotherhood, sisterhood, it at once becomes most heavenly in its character, and fit for the Patrons and the family.

The politics of party, as understood by professional politicians, is of course wholly unsuited to grange exercises, because the principle of equity and brotherhood is not its basis. Its motive is selfish, and its method a continual conflict for personal station and aggrandizement, and the spoils of office. It is rough, heartless, wrangling, and unprincipled, and consists of cunning tricks of leadership and caucus management, election days, and counting votes. It is the politics of lottery speculators, and not of the common people; of salary grab and monopoly, and not of plain, honest production; of the small-souled trinket peddler, and not of the fair and sober farmer, mechanic and worker.

The religion of sect, like party politics, is a thing of popular aristocratic, professional church leadership—of theological dogmas, controversy, and speculation. It gives an easy living to men in high seats of sanctimony, who pick their bread from the hard toiling class. It is not the religion of humanity, and not the kind for the grange. It dwells too much in the clouds of mixed and debatable theologies, and soars too far above the heads of common minds and common sense. We want the practical, with less theory and Sunday formulæ, and more real, solid work of moral reform and social improvement; less of costly and gaudy steeples, and more of home culture. That is sensible grange religion.

Partizan editors and leaders are highly gratified with the fact that the granges are non-political, and expect, therefore, to retain their party leadership as heretofore, and secure the offices and emoluments right along, under the old names. The late election is claimed as a glorious democratic triumph. But is it not a mistaken interpretation? Aye, that is the delusion of it. Certainly it is a different sort of democracy, so far as the grange vote is concerned. There has been a considerable landslide under our very feet, and we stand on advanced ground. Some don't seem to know it, but so it is, nevertheless. With the granges it is now a democracy with an equal rights plank. The reform element is diffused, which commends it.

Woman suffrage is a grand and happy feature of the grange. Woman in the old parties has no recognition as a part of the human family, except as a mere subject, but is kept down as something below the human. But now she rises up, and is welcomed to the grange, to its politics and its new government. Her domestic services fit her most admirably for government housekeeping, and such a cleaning out of the filthy Augean stables of masculine corruption will be marvelous in our eyes. Our bachelor-hall government will be changed by the new order from a house of moral disorder to a ladies' parlor and home of industry, refinement, frugality, and economy. Man without woman is but half a man. With her help, corruption must fall, and monopoly cease.

The grange philosophy remodels our old politics in all its practical arrangements, and brings the ruling power home to the people. It individuates them, and makes each one personally responsible. Home, strength and manly dignity are self-sustaining, and more important to the country than any outside law. It is its own law, and if united, it is public law. Unite, then, dear workers—combine in a compact body. Organize, co-operate! We have sense enough among the people, scattered round, confused; but it must be transferred from the city to the country—from the tender and delicate professionals to the rough-skinned industrials. The farmer's home is made his royal palace. The November election is past, and we wait a whole year for another. But the workingman can never wait so long for the political wagon. He requires his daily meals, with his regular toil, and to depend on legislators and congressmen is a discouraging life delay. The home is a little world—a kingdom—to every family.

Let us understand, that co-operation kills all monopoly. The grange saves the farmers, and therefore all should come into granges and lodges. Dairy associations are co-operative, and when the cows co-operate all can eat cheap butter and cheese. The world is a big monopoly of kings, presidents, governors, money, and professions, to be subdued by co-operation. The post-office system is a grand example of universal co-operation, most perfect and beautiful. A letter goes thousands of miles for one cent, or three cents, when, if a man carried his own mail, his correspondence would cost a fortune! So all things are cheapened by co-operation. Banks are cruel monopolies. The few are rich; the many, poor. Apply co-operation to finance, and every workingman will have plenty of work, and plenty of money.

Love is co-operative. Marriage is the co-operation of the sexes, and equal rights make it happy. Woman's ballot will equalize. Monopoly of wives is Brigham Youngism. Death, death to monopoly! Lawyers monopolize law; and doctors, medicine, and rob the ignorant masses. The priest monopolizes religion and lives nice and easy, fine and cosy, with very little work. Co-operation remedies such things. There is no monopoly in heaven. All are in the grange. Anti-monopoly is the essence of grange politics and grange religion.

What a mighty revolution in a single day, as it were, and that without blood! Now, instead of a king, with his sword, to awe his subjects, we have thousands of farmers with the plow, mechanics with their tools, and women with their needle, broom, cook-stove, and cradle—each and all armed with the ballot. The hand that holds the bread is the power that makes the law. The farmer's granary is his bank, and he holds the key, and should govern the transportation. Under Potter law, or no law, the right belongs to the people—the common people. That is the true democracy.

Now, it is plain that such discussion is eminently appropriate to the grange, in its County Councils, and in the newspaper. It is friendly and brotherly, and requires unchecked and unlimited free speech. Let it rouse up the sleeping apathy of all drugged laborers over the whole land. The idea is strange and absurd that grangers have tied their own hands or choked their own mouths in any true sense of politics. The reform movement is really both political and religious practically. Theologically, free religion only suits the order. Toleration is freedom.

Champlin, Minn., December, 1874.

(Continued from page 5.)

ticism or Infidelity. In this respect the Christian religion is the most direful, the most abhorrent, of any religion upon the face of the globe. This belief in eternal damnation, endless misery, and ceaseless torture, for any portion of the human family is most execrable, and makes God a cruel monster—an infinite fiend.

Mr. Snode has the gentlemanly (?) bearing to speak of Infidels as a "herd of men who can see more beauty in the Koran than in the Bible," and that it contains less novelty, and that its important parts are borrowed from the Bible. This is not correct. Herd is not just the word to apply to men, it is more appropriate for cattle, sheep and hogs. It is particularly inapplicable to Infidels, as they are somewhat scattered over the country and are hardly numerous enough yet anywhere to get together in herds. As to the Koran being copied from the Bible, it is possible it may be to some extent, as it was written a long time after, but that seems a singular reason why a Christian should condemn it. We are no special champion or admirer of the Koran. We believe it to be entirely a human production, as all other books are, and consequently possesses excellences and imperfections, as nearly all others do. As a "copy" it is far less so than many parts of the Christian's Bible. A large portion of this is essentially borrowed from the literature of nations older than the Jews, as can be easily shown.

If success is a proof of excellence and truth, the Mahometan religion is superior and more under divine patronage than the Christian. Although some five or six hundred years its junior it has far outstripped the elder, more than four adherents having flocked to the crescent to every one that has gathered to the cross; and to-day there are 140,000,000 believers in Mahomet in countries that were once Christian, but where a Christian is now scarcely to be found, except such few as occasionally pass through. In civilization, enterprise and wealth, which are not dependent upon religion, the Mahometans are in the background, but in morality and good conduct they are ahead. There is less murder, less stealing, and less crime of all kinds in Mahometan than in Christian countries.

If, however, the Koran has less "novelty" than the Bible, it also has less of cruelty, slaughter, carnage and bloodshed. In morality, likewise, it is eminently above it. We cannot take the room here to draw comparisons or point out one case in a hundred where the morality of the Bible is below the Koran, but will cite one chapter only, which will answer our present purpose. It is the thirty-first chapter of Numbers, where is narrated how Moses, who acted under the direct command of God, sent out 12,000 brigands and murderers to despoil and destroy a peaceful, quiet nation, the Midianites, and how they put all the men to death, captured women and children together with all their property, consisting in part of 675,000 sheep, 72,000 beef cattle, 61,000 asses and several hundred shekels of gold, besides jewels and other valuables. These the holy robbers (for they were no better,) took to their camp, but the meek man Moses became very angry with the officers and captains of the hosts and said: "Have you saved all the women alive?" "Kill every male among the little ones, and every woman that hath known a man by lying with him, but all the women and children that have not known a man by lying with him, keep for yourselves. In pursuance to these orders, 32,000 virgins, consisting of children, half-grown girls and young women were divided out pro-rata among the officers and soldiers of the different tribes, to be the helpless victims of their animal lusts, and fifty to seventy-five thousands of defenseless women, mothers, children, babes and suckling infants were fiendishly put to death in cold blood for committing no offense at all; and all this by the command of God. There is nothing like this to be found in the Koran, nor in any of the Bibles of the Pagan nations in the world. Nay, take all the cruelty, bloodshed and assassinations recounted in all the other bibles that were written, (and there have been many of them,) add them all together in one aggregate, and so much horror and extreme cruelty cannot be found, as is narrated in this one chapter.

We will say more, among all the tyrants, despots and murderers that have lived in any part of the world, whether savage, barbarous or civilized, including all the Neros, Caligulas and Dracos that ever lived, not one of them, in their maddest freaks of cruelty, malice and devilish hate have ever equaled the horrid recitals of this one chapter. Mr. Snode wishes to compare the morality of the Bible with the Koran. If he is pleased with this aspect of his idol, we have nothing to say, only that he has a very singular appreciation of goodness and morality.

He also introduces the subject of obscenity. This is a point in which his adored book is so vulnerable it would seem better for him not to mention the subject. Why, the Christian Bible is one of the most obscene books in the world, and those which are more so, are prohibited by law, and men are sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for from five to fifteen years for selling them! Why, George Francis Train within the last thirty months was imprisoned in the foul and malarious "Tombs," of this city, till his life and health were seriously endangered, for simply publishing some quotations from the Bible, without a word of comment. We could call attention to a thousand obscene and impure passages of the Bible, but lest the pious "Comstock" get after us, and to spare time and room we will pass them by for the present. We are, however, free to say that in all the other Bibles (and we may add, also, all the other books of the world, except the small number of obscene books alluded to,) of the Pagans, not a tenth part of the obscenity can be found that exists in the Bible of the Christians—a pretty source, indeed, from which to look for morality and purity.

Mr. Snode in his flings at Infidels refers to France and the French Revolution to show how much inferior Infidels are to Christians. The allusion is not a happy one for him. The facts in the case are very damaging to the Christians. True, in the French Revolution there was a great rebound from the political and religious tyranny under which the people had been groaning for centuries, and it is only natural that under such conditions, as in many similar ones in changes of governments and dynasties, excesses and wrongs should be committed, thus, during ten years known as the French Revolution not exceeding 4,000 executions of criminals and political offenders took place all together.

Admitting, to please Mr. Snode, that Infidels were responsible for all this, which is by no means true, as a large share of these executions took place under the avowal of the existence of a God, how does it compare with Christian rule? We will, for instance, take a single day of Christian work in the same France when, by pre-concerted arrangement, and by the direction of priests, over 40,000 men, women and children were assassinated and cruelly put to death, not for political offenses, but for opinion's sake? A more cruel, infamous and bloody piece of business was never known, and when the intelligence reached the ears of the Pope—the head of the Christian Church—he was greatly rejoiced at it, and ordered Te Deums to be chanted in honor of the good work thus performed. If the executions of the ten years named reached but 4,000, they make but a small show compared with the 40,000 the Christians basely slaughtered in a single day.

Does Mr. Snode like this picture of Christian France better than that of Infidel France? In truth, very few of the executions during the French Revolution are chargeable to Infidelity. They were political not religious. Infidels have rarely ever persecuted their fellow men for not believing as they do. This business is monopolized almost entirely by Christians.

We cannot undertake to give one case in a thousand of Christian persecution, or even a minute fraction of the enormities the Church has committed. It would take volumes to contain a brief recital of them only. One has but to read the horrible details of the bloody work of the "Holy Inquisition" which existed under the immediate control of the Church for five hundred years, and under whose infernal tortures hundreds of thousands of innocent people were most cruelly mangled and murdered; of the relentless and exterminating persecutions for years visited upon the unhappy Albigenes and Waldenses, by which scores of thousands of men, women and children were tortured out of the world under the most cruel and damnable circumstances; of the wars of the Crusades, by which a great effort was made to exterminate Infidels and unbelievers, and by which millions of all ages, sexes and classes were sent to bloody graves by those emissaries of the Church. We say one has but to read these historical facts to be entirely convinced there has in all the world been no such bloody persecutions, such continued and relentless slaughter as the Christians have been guilty of. All the religions the earth has been cursed with, falls in this respect far behind the Christian religion. Pagans and heathens cannot compare with them for cruelty, persecutions and horrors.

Mr. Snode's enquiries as to what good Free Thought, Free Speech and a Free Press have done in the world, are too insipid and senseless to even merit an answer. What have these agencies done? Why, they have broken down and destroyed just the state of things we have here described. But for the existence of Free Thought, Liberal Sentiments and a Free Press, the world to-day would be groaning under the same relentless tyranny, the same murderous persecutions, the same mental slavery and degradation which existed in the Dark Ages, when Christianity had entire control. A moiety of Liberalism infused into Christianity made Protestantism; a little more brought out Quakerism; a little more produced Unitarianism and Universalism; another degree brings in Spiritualism, and when all superstition is discarded, Liberalism is pure and unadulterated—a state of belief as much superior to the bloody and darkening creeds and practices of Christianity, as the glorious sun of day is superior to a common "tallow dip."

Mr. S. talks glibly about "filthy gutters," "stagnant pools," "filthy back alleys," "dark dungeons," "damp cellars" and all that sort of thing, but we have no taste in that direction, and will leave him in that locality with the superstitions and fallacies of a darker age, while we climb the high grounds of science and truth, and bask in the glorious sunshine of mental freedom and human progress. Mr. Snode, good bye.

WE REGRET exceedingly to learn that the Shakers at Mt. Lebanon, N. Y., have sustained a heavy loss by fire. Eight buildings, some of them large and valuable, were swept away in a few hours on the 6th inst. The loss is estimated at $140,000. Mid-winter is a sad time to be turned out of house and home by the destroying element, and we sympathize with those thus situated. Having spent a portion of our childhood and youth at the locality designated, we remember it distinctly as our boyhood home. We are truly sorry such a loss should fall upon our whilom friends.

We also have suffered to the extent of a few hundred dollars by two fires within the last few days. In one instance some five hundred volumes of The Heathens of the Heath were consumed in a Bindery that burned, and a lot of stereotype plates for pamphlets and tracts, were destroyed in a printing house where another fire occurred. We are sorry to say we were not insured.

MATTIE'S OFFERING is a collection of original songs by Mattie Sawyer of Boston. Many of the pieces possess poetical merit, and are faultless in sentiment. Price 25 cents in paper, or 50 cents in cloth.

THE GOLDEN AGE.—We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of our cotemporary on page 14. Our friends of the Golden Age are making extra offers to subscribers. To every one is presented a pair of Ladies' Elegant Kid Gloves. The Golden Age is one of the very best papers published. Its articles are able, well digested and well written. Mr. William T. Clark, the Editor, understands how to get up an interesting paper, well calculated to please and instruct the studious, enquiring mind. It is a Literary, Progressive sheet, favorable to all true Reforms, and Liberal in sentiment. It is not so Radical as THE TRUTH SEEKER by considerable, and for this many will like it the better. Those who want a splendid pair of kid gloves for nothing, will do well to subscribe for the Golden Age, Box 2848, New York.

Paine Hall Dedication—Boston.

We had the pleasure of attending the opening and dedication of this new Liberal Hall, just completed in Boston, on the birthday of THOMAS PAINE, on January 29th, and met there a large collection of Liberal friends from various parts of the country, including Materialists and Spiritualists. The best of feeling seemed to animate and cheer the spirits of all present, and the opportunity of thus meeting and holding communion in a beautiful hall devoted to free discussion and mental liberty, seemed to be appreciated by all present.

The Building Committee—Messrs. Mendum, Seaver and Savage, as well as the architect, Mr. Brown—are entitled to much praise and gratitude for the fine edifice they have so well constructed, to stand as a memorial to the memory of the great man who performed such valuable service for his adopted country and all mankind, in breaking down the idols of superstition, and opening up the way for the lovers of truth and light to walk in.

Three meetings were held, one at 10:30 A.M., the second at 2:30 P.M., and the last at 7:30 in the evening, after which in the upper hall two or three hundred for five hours joined in the mazes of the dance, and partook of a splendid supper. The arrangements were well planned and executed, and everything passed off agreeably.

We have not space to give even a brief report of the many speeches made, and can do little more than name the speakers. Josiah P. Mendum of the Investigator, presided. Horace Seaver, Editor of the same paper, delivered the first address. It was one of welcome and congratulation. It abounded in appropriate allusions to the struggle that had been made in the direction of Free Thought and in dispelling the mists and fogs of superstition and ignorance. He hoped Paine Hall would be to Mental Liberty what Faneuil Hall was to Political Liberty. He hoped in the former Truth, Reason, Liberty, Equality and Fraternity might ever find a home, and that its doors may always be open to enquirers after Truth. He paid a fine tribute to Abner Kneeland, and alluded to the efforts he made to build up a temple of science. Since Mr. Kneeland's death there had been little agitation in regard to a public Liberal Hall until a few years ago, when it was revived by Mr. Mendum and others, through whose efforts and struggles the task was at last completed. His address lasted for an hour, and was warmly applauded.

The Rev. Mr. Sargent of Boston made a few congratulatory remarks, and referred to his having been disfellowshipped by the Unitarian Church on account of his Liberal views.

Mrs. Townsend, a Spiritualist was called upon the platform, and made a beautiful address, which was cordially received. A splendid bouquet of flowers which stood upon the desk afforded her a good text to illustrate the organization of the human body and soul, and she handled the subject beautifully. She expressed great love for humanity, not excluding the lowly and despised. She regarded all mankind as her brothers and sisters, and she felt willing to spend her strength and life in lifting up and helping the down-trodden.

F. C. Birtles of Woonsocket, R. I., addressed the audience in a vigorous speech, and alluded to the progress he had made in freeing himself from the bonds of ignorance and bigotry. He had for twenty-six years been free from the fetters that once bound him, and he rejoiced in the increasing light and freedom which were spreading over the world.

Mr. Mendum read congratulatory letters from W. F. Freeman, Stockton, Cal., Mrs. Mary Brown, Mrs. L. F. Smith, and Morris Altman.

G. L. Henderson of this city was the next speaker. His subject was the moralization of wealth. He alluded in complimentary terms to George Peabody, Peter Cooper of this city, and James Lick, for the liberal donations and magnanimous efforts they had made for the amelioration of mankind and for the advancement of science. He paid a merited tribute to D. R. Burt of Dunleith, who had contributed liberally to the Paine Hall fund, and induced others to do the same, and had made a trip to California and sold the property donated by James Lick. Though Mr. Burt is very deaf he is vigorous and active in the cause dear to us. Allusion was made to the objects of the donors, that the donations were not made to individuals, but for a Memorial Hall to aid in the diffusion of Liberal sentiments. He hoped New York and other cities would have similar temples of Science and Liberalism wherein the scientific truths inculcated by such teachers as Spencer, Huxley, Geo. Combe, Mill, and others can be made familiar to the people.

Mrs. Prudence Worcester, ninety years of age, was invited on the platform by Mr. Seaver, and spoke for a few minutes. She stated she was at the opening of the first temple in which Abner Kneeland taught in Boston. One hundred and fifty took dinner with her family that day, and they were insulted by cries and abuse from people in the streets. She spoke in warm terms of the efforts Mr. Kneeland made in the cause of truth and progress. She gave advice to mothers upon the treatment of children, and said children should not be whipped. She dilated somewhat upon this subject. The remarks of the aged mother were kindly received.

Mr. Seaver made the closing speech, expressive of the kindest feelings toward Spiritualists, and declarative of the freedom of speech and sentiment that should be maintained in Paine Hall. He gave credit to Mr. Savage, one of the trustees who had given his personal attention to the erection of the building, and who had hardly given sleep to his eyelids for many months. Much credit was due him for the meritorious style and appearance the building presented. This closed the forenoon meeting. The Hall was full—not a seat being left unoccupied.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Hall was densely packed, the aisles and standing room being fully occupied. The dedication hymn by F. C. Birtles was sung by the choir, after which Mr. Seaver read a poem by J. Alberger of Baltimore, entitled The Age of Reason, after which another hymn was sung. A toast proposed by D. R. Burt was read.

Mr. Hamilton then read a somewhat lengthy but spicy poem in which many fine hits were made at old theology—the same was well received.

Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, Mass., made a very pleasant and effective speech which was entirely extempore, as she stated she had no time to make any preparation for speaking. She passed happy eulogies upon the memory of Thomas Paine, whose birthday was being celebrated. She was proud of being numbered with his admirers, and of being counted an Infidel. She felt to be counted a Free Thinker was the proudest title to which she could lay claim.

She said she held no dogmas in regard to the existence of God. To her it was of far more concern to know of the poor who were walking the streets hungry and shivering with the cold. "Let us," said she, "relieve the suffering of humanity about us, and let all theological nonsense and superstition take care of itself. I know no God, save that which appears to me in humanity up or down. Which ever way I look I can understand nothing about any God, except as it appears to me in human beings. I love Humanity, and if that is loving God, I love him well. I cannot find him anywhere else. I never saw a man so degraded, or a woman so utterly vile, but that I could discern some evidence of God in him or her. I have come to the conclusion there is no God anywhere except as he is exhibited in Humanity. Hence I love all human beings.

I know nothing about the 'atoning sacrifice' and all that kind of absurdity. I don't want to know anything about it. I would not if I could. I know very little about creeds, except as I see the different sects fighting with each other. What concerns me most is to know how the poor people of our cities are to get through this Winter; whether they have food enough to keep them from hunger, and whether they have clothing enough to keep them from suffering with the cold. I don't want to meddle with anything but that." She referred again to Paine, and said in conclusion:

"When I think of the immortal sage who said, 'I believe in the equality of man, and that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy and endeavoring to make our fellow-beings happy,' I am compelled to say, 'If this be Infidelity, the more of it the better.'"

Moses Hull followed in a speech of moderate length, first of dedications, next of Thomas Paine and Theodore Parker, and lastly of social reform. In the latter discussion he alluded to his well known theory upon this subject. His manner is impressive, and his eloquence of no mean order.

Mr. John Verity, of Cambridge, Mass., was next introduced, and made a brief speech, and recited a poem of his own in answer to the question, "Who was Thomas Paine?" His remarks were in reference to the progress that has been made in mental liberty, and the charity we ought to exercise towards those who differ from us.

Anthony Higgins, Jr., made one of the most eloquent speeches of the day. He commenced by saying he felt much inclined to keep in the rear guard and remain a listener to others. He could not probably claim to be one of the Old Guard of Free Thought as it had not been very long since he had "broken the shell." It was some thirty-five years since his birth. Mentally and physically he came into the world a Radical. It would be hard to mould him a conservative. Christianity did for a time try to do something in that direction, but it proved an utter failure. He complimented Messrs. Mendum and Seaver on the fine Hall thus reared for the expression of Free Thought, and said it would command respect from our opponents. Oh! money and its products are wonderful charmers even to old Mrs. Grundy.

In alluding to the spirit of proscription and want of due gratitude exhibited towards Thomas Paine for the great services he had rendered this country, while Washington, Jefferson and others stood out from canvas and were sculptured in marble, Thomas Paine who had rendered equally valuable services, has no canvas to represent him, no marble to hold him in memoriam. And why? Because of the spirit of fanaticism and persecution that has had its hand upon the people of this country, and because the brave man dared to be anti-Christian—to oppose the superstition and absurdity of the Christian Church. But his admirers took it into their heads to build a fitting memorial to his name, and hence this proud edifice has been reared. And now as a Spiritualist I must believe if ever a spirit could come back to earth, that the spirit of Thomas Paine stands upon this platform and addresses you to-day.

Thomas Paine did not end the warfare in behalf of the rights of man when he attacked the Bible. He but attacked the cause of human ignorance, iniquity, priestcraft and superstition. The triumph of the rights of man is yet to come. We have only entered upon the dawn, the sunrise is yet to appear. We have here a monument to one of the heroic leaders in that warfare. While there are thousands who have no memorial it is grand to think that one at least has been remembered.

Prof. Morse, of England, followed with a good speech. He avowed himself a searcher after truth. He was proud to stand upon this platform in an edifice reared to the memory of an Englishman, one who had been a foremost worker in securing the independence of this country, and in securing the rights of opinion for all. He as a Spiritualist hailed with joy the fraternization of Spiritualists and Liberals and hoped they would continue to work together in accord and harmony.

Prof. Toohy made an excellent speech. He paid a tribute to the memory of Paine; hoped for a continued fraternal feeling between Liberals and Spiritualists, and for a steady progression in the cause of Right and Truth.

Mr. Corwin, delegate from Milwaukee, made a few remarks. He had come a long distance to attend this celebration, but would travel ten times as far to witness another.

Dr. H. B. Storer made a good speech. Was rejoiced at the fraternal spirit manifested. He did not want to advertise his personal convictions, but believed Thomas Paine was doing as much, aye, more good to-day, than he did when in the body, for the deliverance of the mind of man from the thralldom of dogmatic superstition. He believed Paine's influence pervaded the country. He congratulated the Liberals of Boston, and Messrs. Mendum and Seaver especially upon the erection of this elegant structure.

(Continued on page 12.)

Elder Zebedee Harkins.

Sermon No. 4.

[Delivered at Mt. Zion Church, near Frog Island, Southern Illinois. Reported by THOMAS A. DIDYMUS.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington, D. C.

Quarterly Conference has just closed here, and the excitement incidental to this important occasion is subsiding, but I assure you we have had a lively time. Elder Slocum, the presiding Elder of this quarterly conference, ably assisted by Elder Harkins (formerly a presiding Elder, but now a circuit rider), were the preachers who conducted the series, and each of them did their tallest preaching.

The result was a revival such as is seldom seen in modern times. There was a wonderful outpouring of grace, and many souls found joy and peace in believing.

The meeting began on Friday, and by Sunday evening the interest and excitement culminated in a scene of the wildest enthusiasm on the part of the saints, and a regular panic in the ranks of the sinners.

Elder Harkins preached one of his most powerful revival sermons, from the following text:

"For, behold, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven and all the proud, and all they that do wickedly shall be as stubble."

"Thus saith the Lord of Hosts by the mouth of the prophet Malachi, the last of the long line of illustrious prophets, who testified to the righteousness of Jehovah, and warned the people of the terrible vengeance that would come upon them if they refused to flee from the wrath of God, and close in with the offers of mercy.

The prophet Malachi died and slept with his fathers, but before he departed he foretold the coming of the Son of God and of the end of the world, and also of the great judgment day, in which the wicked should be burned up as stubble. And now my dying congregation, it is for you to decide whether you will be among the wheat that shall be gathered into the garner of the heavenly kingdom, or whether you will be found with the chaff and stubble, that shall be cast into hell, and burned with the fire of God's eternal vengeance forever and forever.

Now is the day of salvation. Now is the accepted time.

"Stop, poor sinner, stop and think
Before you farther go!
Will you sport upon the brink
Of everlasting woe?"

Yes, poor sinner, I beseech you stop and think before it is everlastingly too late. Too late? What an awful warning is found in these little words, too late! To-morrow may be too late. This may be the last opportunity some of you may ever have to close in with the offers of mercy, the last sermon you may ever be permitted to hear. Then listen to the voice of the Savior to-night. He is waiting to be gracious; yes, the blessed Jesus is whispering in your ear, to-night. He is saying to you, "poor sinner, I died on the cross for you. To secure your salvation I sweat the bloody sweat of Gethsemane. It was the weight of your guilt that bowed my head in grief and agony, as slowly and painfully I climbed the rugged steeps of Calvary. And its expiation on the cross wrung from my agonized soul those groans that rent the veil of the temple, and shook the foundations of the earth.

Sinner, do you believe this? Then confess my name before this congregation, and your sins shall be blotted out; for whoso confesses me before man, him will I confess before my father and all the holy angels. But he that denieth me before man, him will I also deny before my father and the holy angels.

Oh sinner, how can you resist such an appeal? The King of heaven and earth, the Son of God stands with open arms waiting to be gracious; stands pleading with you to come to him and be saved.

But if tender mercy will not move you, remember the words of the text and tremble. For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud and they that so wickedly shall be as stubble.

Oh my dying friends, that will be a terrible day to you, if you are out of the ark of safety. When the Archangel shall stand with one foot on the sea and one on the land, and swear by Him that liveth forever and ever, that time is, and time was, but time shall be no longer. Then shall the solid earth melt with fervent heat, and the heavens be rolled together as a scroll and pass away with a great noise. And the moon shall be turned to blood, and the stars of heaven fall.

Then will the wicked, both great and small, flee from the fate that awaits them and finding no place to hide, they will cry to the rocks and mountains to fall on them and hide them from the wrath of God, and from the face of him that sitteth upon the throne of judgment.

But my poor, lost friends, let me warn you that you cannot escape in that day. The rocks and mountains will refuse to hide you, and your prayers will be in vain, for the day of grace will be past and the day of God's vengeance come.

"And I saw the dead, both small and great, stand before the throne and the books were opened and they whose names were not found in the Lamb's book of life were cast into the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

Poor sinner, its a solemn and awful thing to die; but who can describe the terrors of that second death, the death that never dies. When the soul shall be doomed to endless woe, there to dwell in a sea of red-hot fire beneath the hot and stifling air of hell and mingle your groans of agony with the laughter of heartless devils, and the oaths of the damned.

Oh ye of little faith, and you who are hardened in sin, I beseech you by the mercies of God, and I warn you by the certainty of judgment and the terrors of hell to flee from the wrath to come, and I warn you now that I shall meet you at the judgment seat of Christ on that terrible day that shall burn as an oven, and I shall there present you as brands snatched from the eternal burning, jewels in my crown of glory, or I shall then and there be a swift witness against you for having rejected the gospel.

For how can you escape the damnation of hell if ye reject this great salvation?

Oh sinner, come to Jesus to-night!

Delay not another moment!

Tarry not in all the plains of doubt nor sin! Harken no longer to the voice of the Devil, who tells you there is time enough!

Time enough? Life itself is but a span; time but a fleeting moment compared to eternity.

Cling not to the world and its joys, for they are deceitful and transient.

"This world is but a fleeting show,

For man's illusion given."

Come, sinner; if you are old and hardened in sin and rebellion against God, come and see how merciful he is, how freely he forgives. If you are young and of tender years, come, for it is written, "Thou shalt remember the Creator in the days of thy youth." If you are a moral man, and upright in all your walk and conversation, but have not acknowledged the Lord Jesus Christ, come, for there is no other name given under heaven whereby you can be saved, but the name of Jesus Christ. All your morality and honesty will count for nothing in that day that shall burn as an oven, for the righteousness of man is but as filthy rags in the sight of God.

Sinner, come; start now. The old Ship of Zion is weighing her anchor and spreading her sails. Come on board and register your name for the port of glory before it is too late. This glorious old ship has landed thousands safely on the shores of everlasting deliverance. The passage is free; then come and go with us.

Why will you stay on board the pirate ship of Infidelity; the privateer craft of Science, or the balloon of Spiritualism? I tell you, my friends, these modern ships will go to the bottom sooner or later, and the Spiritual bubble will burst and pass away in God's own good time. But the old ship of Zion will ride the storm and safely land you in the port of glory.

Brethren sing,

"O do not let the ship depart,
And close thine eye against the light,
Poor sinner, harden not thy heart,
Thou wouldst be saved; why not to-night?"

During the singing of this song the Elder's voice could be heard above the roaring waves of heavenly music that surged up from the congregation, exhorting in loud, yet pathetic tones, the sinner to come to Jesus.

Some half-dozen specimens of total depravity walked forward and knelt at the anxious seat.

It was evident that these were but the first fruits of the harvest, and after a prayer, in which the Lord was invited and implored to come right down from heaven in all his power, and majesty, and glory, and make one in their midst—an invitation which was not accepted—Elder Slocum entered upon an exhortation by telling a story, or rather two stories.

I want to appeal to the young men that are here to-night. I want to tell them that they are standing upon the very brink of hell, and there's no telling what minute any one of you may be plunged in that gulf of dark despair. I know you are each saying to yourselves, "there is time enough; I will enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, and then get religion." This is a dangerous course you are pursuing.

I once knew a young man who took this course, and when the pious ministers of God would warn him of his danger, he would say, "O! I don't mean to die without a hope in Christ, but I can't give up the pleasures of the world just yet. When I get older I mean to get married and get religion, and settle down to a steady, pious life."

Remember, my young friends, this young man was not an Infidel. No, indeed; he believed in the Lord Jesus Christ as most of you do, but he was not willing to give up the pleasures of sin and serve the Lord. He put off repentance that he might enjoy this life as long as possible, intending to get religion when the joys of earth should cease to please him, or if suddenly cut off, he meant to repent and call on the Savior in his last moments. But the Lord would not be trifled with in that way for ever, but cut him off suddenly, and he went down to hell with all his sins on his head.

He was on his way home from a horse race one night, being about half drunk, and full of devilish mirth, when suddenly his horse shied to one side of the road and threw him off and broke his neck. He had been heard to say, that if he was ever thrown from his horse, he would say as he fell, "Lord have mercy on my soul," and all would be right.

But what, my dying friends, do you suppose this poor lost young man said as he fell into the open mouth of hell? It is enough to make one's blood curdle in his veins and his hair stand on end to think of it. He found himself falling, and no doubt tried to remember his prayer, but the Devil was there and put these awful words into his mouth: "DEVIL TAKE BODY, SOUL AND ALL."

And his prayer was answered, and to-night his poor lost soul is writhing and shrieking in hell, and if he could come here to-night he would say, "Young man, take warning by my awful fate, and flee from the wrath of God." Now will you do it?

Perhaps some of you are saying, I am honest and upright, and have done nothing to repent of. O! my friends, this is the most awful state of mind you could get into. You may be all that you claim to be, yet you are lost and ruined without faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, for there is no other name given by which you can be saved.

I once knew a man, who was a good man, an honest man, a moral and law-abiding man, and a good-hearted, benevolent man, but he was an Infidel. He denied the Lord, and even doubted the existence of God. I saw this man just before he died. He was then an old man, and his race was almost run—for he was then sick—and I asked him how he felt in view of the near approach of death, and he answered, "Serene and peaceful."

I said, "Do you base your hopes upon the merits of a crucified Redeemer?" And what, my dying friends, do you think was his reply? It's awful to contemplate; it's terrible to repeat. He said:

"No. I have lived as true a life as I could, and if there is a God, I am ready to stand before him and take the consequences of my actions, scorning to beg for mercy, or to shield myself under the skirts of Christ or any other man."

He died only three days after uttering such terrible blasphemy, and of course he went to hell, there to learn that God's vengeance is not to be defied or trifled with. Young man, come to Jesus. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be washed as white as wool in the blood of the Lamb.

"To-day, if you will hear his voice,
Now is the time to make your choice;
Say, will you to Mount Zion go?
Say, will you come to Christ, or no?"

The effect of the Elder's anecdotes was electrical. Young and old of both sexes pressed forward, and prostrated themselves at the foot of the throne—pulpit—and asked to be prayed for.

Elder Harkins led in prayer, and the saints all joined in, and for ten minutes exclamations, ejaculations, pious expletives, adjectives and groans filled the air, and toward the close a number of the penitent mourners began to shout glory and clap their hands, and one young lady danced a minuet and then fell on the floor in a trance.

The Sunday Question in this City.

To the Clergymen of the City of New-York.

DEAR FRIENDS: We may as well have this fight out, first as last. It is you who are opposed to granting people liberty on Sunday. It is you who wish to shut all up to the strict observance of Sunday as a Sabbath. You regret every open door affording them escape from the ministrations which you see fit to provide them in your pulpits. The old-fashioned Sunday has been yours, and you wish to keep it. So we grapple at once with you, and hold you to this public expose of your inevitable weakness and doomed defeat! You will fail, the Sunday will be rescued from your grasp, till there will be no pretense of any such sacred Sabbath as you have claimed! There is no holy Sabbath, there never has been any; and nobody ever dreamed there was, except because it is a Baby-World! There never was a Bible that was the word of God, there never was a God to give a Bible, there never was a God to make a holy Sabbath! You may wriggle and twist, but Science tells you the Universe is infinite, and then it was never created, and there is no Creator, and there never was any Bible, and there never was any Sabbath! Now that is the end of it! Even if the Scientists will not stand to this, they must, they will have to—they can no more get away from their own Science than you can! Once for all, Evolution is true, and this is a Baby-World, and there never was a finite Universe, nor any Creation, nor any Creator, nor any holy Bible, nor any sacred Sabbath—but your whole foundation and superstructure have gone to the bottomless together! And Luther, Calvin, Melancthon and all the other early Reformers, had no sacred Sabbath, they scouted any such institution! But the Puritans were the creators of your strict, holy day, and they went back for it to the old Jewish Book calling itself a Bible, but no more one than any other product of the superstition of all ages, as all Bibles have been simply the product of this superstitious Baby-World!

And these very Sunday statutes on which you have always relied to enforce the observance of the day, so far from being in your favor, are ten thousand times against you, for they are the spawn of the Baby-World, such bald relics of the ancient heathenism and idolatry, that they shall not only, not be suffered to be executed, but they shall not even be allowed to remain on the statute-book, longer to disgrace our civilization! The first heathen, such uncounted thousands of years ago, worshiped fetishes, and you make Sunday a fetish, and these statutes, framed in those days of the Puritans, and handed down till now, require all to make Sunday a fetish, under penalty of fine and imprisonment; but the people of this country, will not submit longer to be insulted by such priestly impositions! The statutes are already obsolete, the people have outgrown them fifty or a hundred years, and now they will sweep them away till there shall no vestige of them be found, except on the same page of history which preserves the shameful record (but no more shameful) that our ancestors offered up human sacrifices! Under this blaze of Science, these laws, these insults and not laws, will be erased from every statute-book in this country within two years [if we only make the strike within our power], and you and we all shall say Amen! For you want the best thing done, and we shall show you by what Science will give in exchange for your holy Sunday, and in exchange for your way of keeping it, how much better all become, how much happier all are, under a rational system of spending that day. We will have nothing immoral on Sunday, for we will not tolerate that on other days, for Science will make the secular stage purer and worthier than it is now; but on Sunday we shall have such scenic representations, and concerts, and lectures, and whatever may be necessary, as shall instruct, entertain and amuse the whole population together, men's moral and spiritual demands attended to and supplied equally with their physical, social and entire self-needs; and you will come in to help, for you will convert your church-edifices into lecture-rooms and halls—temples of Science—so that Sunday will be made a day of universal rest, recreation, enjoyment, intellectual and moral improvement, as the need may be! You dare not say, in the light of Science, this is not good and noble! You dare not go before the country, against us on this issue! You know the people will say this is right, and will sweep you away forever if you oppose! We represent the immense and overwhelming majority, and they will rule and ought to, and you (if you stand out) go to the wall! The newspapers of the country will all be on our side, for they cannot but see—they know this is Science! And you dare not say we who propound this are not good, honest, spotless and holy as yourselves, and doing all this because we must, doing all for the regeneration and salvation of the world! We defy you if you dare pick up the gauntlet, but we know you will not, you will admit all this, and turn in and help us. And so we give you our hands and our hearts, and with you march on to a natural and secular Sunday, as the only thing right, the only thing possible, the infallible dictate of Science, the inevitable fate of Evolution!

In the name of over forty millions of Americans,
Your equal brother,
JOSEPH TREAT.

P. S.—DEAR FRIEND HENDERSON: This very Evolution means to many, the transparent reverse of what you insist on, in your articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It means that since the whole past from which you draw your inference, was one of heathenism, therefore we do not want "priests" and "churches," but only Lecturers and Teachers for Congregations and Meetings, thus letting the old superstition die and be buried out of mind as well as influence! Evolution is good for nothing, is not Evolution, unless it supersedes!—outgrows the old—not only grows out of it but beyond it!

Talmage and Byron's "Childe Harold."

"Childe Harold is adorned with evil till it smiles like a May Queen."—Talmage's Sermon, Jan. 12th.

The imagination of the Rev. Dr. Talmage is truly wonderful! What powerful magnifying glasses he must use that can discern in Byron's "Childe Harold," "adultery until it smiles like a May Queen!"

I have read that beautiful poem so often that I can almost repeat it from memory, and you will allow me to tell Dr. Talmage, that in the whole one hundred and eighty-seven stanzas, there is not one indecorous line, one licentious thought; but he shall find more than he can in any other poem of the same length, that is so pure, so exquisitely refined and beautiful, that Byron might have plucked the pen with which he wrote it from the wing of the angel of Purity! Why does not Dr. Talmage preach a sermon on the commandment, "Bear not false witness," and be sure to press the application home to his own heart, and conscience? But then the ways of the Rev. Gentleman are "not our ways;" "his thoughts are not our thoughts," and I have not the least doubt that to his distorted vision, he sees only in this wonderful poem, impurity and vice. In the second canto we find such lines of beauty as these following (I am quoting from memory, excuse me if I should drop a word):

"Yet if, as holiest men have deemed, there be
A land of souls beyond that sable shore,
To shame the doctrine of the sabbath-keeper,
And sophists madly vain of their uncertain lore!
How sweet it were in concert to adore
With those who make our labors light!
To hear each voice we fear to hear no more!
Behold each mighty shade revealed to sight
The Bactrian, Samaritan sage, and all who taught the right!"

Is there any vice and immorality in those words of thrilling beauty?

"Dear Nature is the kindest mother still.
Tho' always changing, in her aspect mild;
From her bare bosom, let me take my fill,
Her never-weaned, though not her favored child.
Oh! she is fairest in her features wild
Where nothing polished dare pollute her path;
To me by day or night she ever smiled,
Though I have marked her when no other hath,
And sought her more and more, and loved her most in wrath."

This second canto contains also those lines so often used by our buncombe orators:

"Hereditary bondsmen! know ye not,
Who would be free themselves must strike the blow?"

And the whole of the remaining twenty-three stanzas to the end of the second canto are so fringed with beauty, that it will make them as enduring as the language they are written in. Who ever forgets these words:

"Wherever we tread, 'tis haunted, holy ground."
"The sun, the soil, but not the slave the same."

Was Sir Walter Scott a libertine? Did he pander to the "lascivious pleadings of a lute"? He says of the first and second cantos of "Childe Harold," that they place at once on Lord Byron's head the garland, for which other men of genius have toiled long, and which they have gained late.

The third contains the very gems of the English language:

"Stop! for thy tread is on an empire's dust!
An earthquake's spoil is sepulchered below."

I need not quote, but I will write the word Waterloo, and the magnificent stanzas ring in our ears, for memory retains them forever.

Then comes "Lake Leman wooing with its crystal face," and we have in the following fourteen stanzas an avalanche of poetic beauty.

Do give space for these three, that the face of the libeler may be tinged with shame! (That is supposing he has a soul and feelings that can be touched with those exquisite lines of the great Master Artist.)

"All heaven and earth are still, tho' not in sleep.
But breathless as we grow when feeling most,
And silent as we stand in thought too deep:—
All heaven and earth are still: from the high host
Of stars, to the lull'd lake and mountain-coast,
All is concentrated in a life intense,
Where not a beam, nor air, nor leaf is lost,
But hath a part of being, and a sense
Of that which is of all, Creator and defence."

Then stirs the feeling infinite, so-felt
In solitude, where we are least alone;
A truth, which through our being then does melt,
And purifies from self; it is a tone,
The soul and source of music, which makes known
Eternal harmony, and sheds a charm,
Like the fabled Cytherea's zone,
Binding all things with beauty;—'twould disarm
The spectre Death, had he substantial power to charm."

Not vainly did the early Persian make
His altar, the high places and the peak
Of earth-o'er-gazing mountains, and thus take
A fit and unvalled temple, there to seek
The spirit, in whose honor shrines are weak,
Upward of human hands. Come and compare
Columns and idol-dwellings, Goth or Greek,
With nature's realms of worship, earth and air,
Now fix on fond abodes to circumscribe thy prayer."

The fourth and last canto contains that wonderful apostrophe to the Ocean, which every school-boy or girl knows by heart.

Of this fourth canto, Sir E. Bridges says, "It is the fruit of a mind which had stored itself with great care and toil, and had digested with profound reflection and intense vigor what it had learned: the sentiments are not such as lie on the surface (the italicisms are my own) but could be awakened by long meditation."

Whoever reads it, and is not impressed with the many grand virtues as well as the gigantic powers of the mind that wrote it seems to me to afford a proof of insensibility of heart, and great stupidity of intellect!

Oh, Bigotry! How thou canst blind the understanding! How thou canst harden the heart, when thy votary declares that the wonderful poem "Childe Harold," "is adorned with evil till it smiles like a May Queen!"

I have often wondered if Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe ever read those touching lines, breathing such a spirit of loving charity:

"Yet peace be with their ashes,—for by them
If merited, the penalty is paid;
It is not ours to judge,—far less condemn."

Think you that the pen would not have dropped from her clasping fingers; and the cruel and wicked slander, by which the author has forfeited her right forever to the name of woman, would never have been written. Read Byron's justification from the conservative pages of Blackwood in 1825: "Nothing can be more unfair than to give as the personal character of Lord Byron what may be guessed at from his poems. Is there a noble sentiment, a lofty thought, a sublime conception? Yes is the answer, but it is the roue Byron that speaks! Is a kind and generous action of the man mentioned? "Yes, yes," comments the sage, but only remember the atrocities of Don Juan; depend upon it, this is only a bit of caprice or vile hypocrisy. Thus salvation is shut out at either entrance, the poet damns the man, and the man the poet. Was Byron dishonest or dishonorable? Did he ever do anything to forfeit, or even endanger his rank as a gentleman?

No such accusation has ever been maintained against Lord Byron. Was he so profligate in his morals, that his name cannot be mentioned with anything like tolerance? We should like extremely to have the catechising of the individual man who says so. Was he worse than the majority of those who join in the cry of horror at his sensuality? We believe exactly the reverse and we rest our belief on very intelligible grounds. How could sensual profligacy form such a great part of the life and character of the man, who dying at six and thirty, bequeathed such a collection of works as Byron did to the world? Again, looking at the nature of the intellect which generated, and delighted in generating such beautiful and noble conceptions as are to be found in almost every page of Byron's works—we hold it impossible that very many men can be at once capable of comprehending these conceptions and for sensual profligacy to form the principal, or even a principal part of their character. No story of villainous false intrigue, no story of base, unmanly seduction has ever been made against him. No father has ever reproached him with the ruin of his daughter! No husband has ever denounced him as the destroyer of his domestic peace!

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, there is an Eastern proverb that says, "Chickens always come home to roost," and this carrion buzzard chicken you hatched so kindly into life on Lord Byron's grave, now full-fledged, full-grown has returned to its home.

"The mills of the gods grind slow."
"And the measure ye mete to others shall surely be meted to you again."

WM. WILLICOTT.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Educating Children.

"As the twig is bent the tree is inclined," is a self-evident fact. And this fact is, I think, universally known, and is every-where more or less acted upon.

If we desire our children to possess a fine education, we tutor them at an early age. If we want them to follow a certain branch of industry, we direct their attention to it as soon as advisable. If we wish them to become labor-loving men and women, we give them at an early age such employment as will not be too fatiguing, and which will create in them an interest for its accomplishment. If we wish them to love pure morals, we inculcate them at a tender age.

In the religious world, it is well known, that children must be drilled into any desired religious belief, as soon as their prattling tongue can lisp the word "Dad" or "Desus;" hence the Sunday-schools everywhere; and hence the zealous care, and watching, and training which the religious devotee feels it his bounden duty to exercise to the utmost, over the heathenish youth.

Many well-meaning Freethinkers say, they will not ask their children pro or con in regard to religion; and that when they are of age, they shall have the privilege of accepting that which their judgment conceives to be the truth. But, dear parent, are you aware how difficult it is, with religious teachings all about you—in the public schools, in the lecture room, in the three or four churches to a thousand inhabitants, on the street—aye, every-where—to bring up your children to maturity without their having received religious teaching? We can everyday see the sons and daughters of Infidels uniting themselves with this or that creed; and why? because of influence, impressions and teachings received outside of the home-circle.

If Infidelity, so-called, is good enough for parents to live and die by, it certainly ought to be good enough for their children; and I see not why they should hesitate to verse them in its teachings; or, at least impress strongly upon their minds the necessity of keeping aloof until they have made a thorough investigation of the subject, and are capable of comprehending it.

Berlin, Wis., Jan. 24, 1875. J. D. KRUSCHKE.

REV. LUKE MILES, pastor of Zion Methodist church at Norwich, Ct., has decamped with all the Society's funds he could appropriate. There is also said to be some female scandal connected with it.

(Continued from page 9.)

A letter was read from Mrs. Ernestine L. Rose from London, which closed the afternoon meeting.

EVENING SESSION.

The Hall was again crowded. The exercises were opened by an overture from the orchestra, after which a young lady sang two pieces with well cultured and musical voice accompanied on the piano, when B. F. Underwood, the able champion of Free Thought, was introduced, and gave the address of the day. He said:

I understand the object of these exercises is to honor the name of Thomas Paine, and to dedicate this hall to Free Thought. I venerate this object, and I wish Thomas Paine might give us a "materialization" to-night (laughter), so as to look upon this sea of faces before him, to stand up before us, a human being in flesh and blood, and express his gladness at the great progress made since the time in which he lived. I delight to speak the praises of Thomas Paine, not because I agree with him in all his views, but because he was a pioneer in Free Thought, and did great and noble service in his day and generation; and we should be ungrateful if we neglected to give him his just meed of praise. He did a great and noble service for this country in its hour of need, and but for the fact that he went farther and honestly defined his radical creed, he would have occupied a position of great honor among all people to-day. His little book, "Common Sense," was published in 1776. It attacked monarchical governments, portrayed the excellence of Republican institutions, and pointed out the practicability of American independence. When these sentiments were first advanced, it is difficult for us to understand how they were received. The great mass of the American people were shocked; they thought it was premature. At first it created indignation, but soon it spread and the opposition diminished, until from New England to the Carolinas spread the cry for independence. Mr. Underwood depicted Paine's signal services to the country during the dark days of the Revolutionary war. "These are times that try the souls of men," are his own words. (Applause.) But he lived to see the cause so dear to his heart triumphant. Paine's style as a writer has in some respects never been equaled. Every sentence he wrote was stamped with his luminous mind. He was a sagacious and clear-headed man, and he wrote his thoughts in such a lucid and striking way that the most uncultivated person cannot read his works without being struck by the logic and force of his ideas.

This building is dedicated to Free Thought and to universal mental liberty. It has been built by the contributions of many who go much further in their radical ideas than Paine did. We have not accepted Paine as a leader; no person who is entitled to the name of a Free Thinker ever acknowledges any man, living or dead, as his mental leader. (Applause.) This hall ought to be a reminder to us not to accept our beliefs as ultimate truths. We must not ignore the great ocean of truth that lies beyond. Mr. Underwood advocated great courtesy and moderation in setting forth the ideas of Freethinkers, and thought that, thus presented, radical thought would always be received with respect. The editors of the country, he said, were as a rule sufficiently infidel. The largest circulated papers were those which were not afraid to report the most liberal utterances of the platform. Our advances, which this hall marks, have been in every department, in science, in theology, in philology. We have cause for rejoicing over its completion. Mr. Underwood showed at considerable length the immense strides that had been made in skepticism, free thought and free enquiry, and that this was true in the pulpit, in authors and publishers. Literary matter tending to Radicalism was tolerated now, that a few years ago would have been utterly discountenanced. The speaker concluded with a complimentary allusion to the Investigator and its editor and publisher.

At the conclusion of Mr. Underwood's address which was listened to with great interest and attention, Mr. Francis E. Abbot, editor of the Index, was called for, and, stepping to the platform, made a few sensible remarks. Paine, he said, was a great popularizer of free thought, and for this service I think he merits the great credit which has been so long withheld from him. Mr. Abbot referred to the innumerable slanders and calumnies that have been heaped upon Paine's name, and added, this stately hall is to be one of the answers to these foul and baseless calumnies. It is a testimony of the living sentiment we feel toward a great servant of American liberties. Mr. Abbot closed by paying a deserved tribute to the untiring industry and single-hearted devotion of Messrs. Seaver and Mendum to the cause of truth. He was followed by Mr. Barker of California in an eloquent address, in which he referred to the noble bequest of James Lick, who was the first man, he said, who was wise enough to be his own executor.

Mr. G. L. Henderson was the next speaker. He was followed by others in a series of brief addresses, which concluded the evening's exercises. At 9 o'clock the ball opened in the upper hall, where a large company enjoyed the dancing, while yet the exercises continued below. Refreshments were served in the banquet hall, and the crowd in Paine Hall was constantly augmented up to 11 o'clock, at which time the floor presented a very brilliant appearance. At two o'clock the company broke up.

This terminated the exercises of the celebration of the 138th anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday and the dedication of the elegant Hall to his memory. Everything connected with the exercises passed off pleasantly. It was a "feast of reason and a flow of soul" that will not soon be forgotten by those who participated in it.

We hope the time is not far distant when in this city we may witness the dedication of a similar Hall to Free Thought and the best interests of humanity.

We are now getting up a printed list with which to mail THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope to have it ready for our next number. The tabs accompanying the paper will show the time the subscription expires, and will inform those in arrears when their time was out. This improvement has subjected us to considerable expense, but we are satisfied it will be much more perfect than the plan heretofore used, and will tell all patrons when their time terminates, and we hope will alleviate the necessity of so often requesting our readers to remit their dues.

Kind readers, permit us, right here, to request such of you as have not renewed your subscription for Vol. II. of THE TRUTH SEEKER, to do so without further delay. This number completes the first half of Vol. II., and we think it is time every patron who feels like sustaining the efforts we are making in the cause of truth and mental freedom, had sent in his renewal. If there are those who don't wish to continue the paper, we simply ask them to notify us of the fact, and pay us for the time they have received it. We hope there is not a person who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER who feels unwilling to pay for it so long as he receives it and reads it. Those who have not remitted for the second Volume must certainly know it, and as half the Volume has already been sent them, they should not ask us to wait on them longer. We assure our readers we are needing the amounts due us to enable us to meet the bills we are compelled to pay. It has been suggested that we publish the names of those in arrears, and especially those who refuse to pay for the paper after taking it for months from the post-office, but we dislike to take that course. We much prefer that those who are indebted to us will send in the little amounts without such a reminder. Friends, please let us hear from you.

We have to pay the postage on all the papers we send out, which is quite a tax on our limited resources, and ask friends to help us, by sending what they owe us.

We have received from several directions, notices and accounts of Birthday commemorations of Thomas Paine, but the pressure upon our columns will not admit of our giving place to them in this issue. It is gratifying that Liberals and friends of Free Thought in various parts of the country are sufficiently imbued with the memory of this great man to celebrate his birthday when it comes around.

We hope at every future recurring of the 29th of January, the grateful admirers of Thomas Paine may meet in every city and town in the land and commemorate his great services in behalf of both political and mental liberty.

Dr. R. P. Fellows.

This distinguished Magnetic Physician stands to-day without question the most successful Spiritual Physician of the age. He is now treating the sick in almost every State of the Union by his Magnetized Powder with unsurpassed success. The Powder can be procured of the Doctor at Vineland, N. J., at $1 per box.

Notice to the Liberal Public.

M. ALTMAN & Co.,
301 & 303 6th Ave., N. Y.

I have during the last six years kept my name and business constantly before the readers of Liberal papers, and have during that time supplied most of them with merchandize from my establishment, orders in most cases coming through the advertisements published by me.

But the limited space necessarily occupied in a newspaper makes it impossible to enumerate or specify accurately the many articles required by the public and I have been and still am in receipt of many letters begging for a more detailed Price List or Catalogue, I have determined to issue the most complete Price List of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Ladies' and Gent's Undergarments and outfits, Suits, Costumes, Hosiery, Gloves, and the thousand small articles in Millinery, Notions, and Haberdashery, that has ever been circulated, free of cost, to all who may send stamp and address. The matter is now in the hands of the printer and by the time this is read will be ready to mail. Send on your addresses with stamp for return postage. Liberals who may not be able, or who hesitate to send stamp, may simply send their address and I will mail a few for distribution among their friends.

Faternally yours,

MORRIS ALTMAN.

New-York Liberal Club.

JANUARY 29TH, 1875.

The lecture of this evening was by MR. W. L. ORMSBY, JR., Vice-President of the Liberal Club. Subject, "Known Factors in Sociology."

Science is the knowledge of laws. The test of science is prediction—the verification of science the fulfilment of prophecy.

That there is a science of society is now unquestioned; and man, since his appearance upon earth, has been engaged in discovering the laws of his being or the order of nature. We must all of us be prophets for ourselves, and upon the correctness of our prophecies must depend our weal or woe. In our youth our parents must prophecy for us, and surround us with proper conditions for our welfare, and we in our turn for our children. Indeed, in all the relations of life this element of prediction must enter. Pre-vision for the sake of pro-vision. The legislator predicts the result of legislation; the merchant, of commercial venture; the philanthropist, measures of reform; the teacher, the results of education.

I know of one restaurant keeper, who prophecies every day that his patrons will require five hundred baked dumplings on the morrow, and as he is generally correct, so far he is a social scientist. He has discovered that a certain compound will please the average human man, and justly reaps the reward of his discovery. A. T. Stewart is merely a true prophet, who has discovered the operation of certain laws. In trade these laws are simple. The purchaser will invariably buy where he can get the best goods for the least money. Every purchaser will look out for his own interest. Solomon says, "it is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer, but when he hath gone his way he boasteth." That is the explanation of Jay Gould's bearing the stock market.

The object of this lecture is to show what are the known laws of society. Mr. Wakeman, a member of this Club, some years ago made the assertion that there was no such thing as a natural law. Mr. Moran replied that he was prepared to demonstrate that there was one natural law of society, namely, that all mankind are guided by self-interest, and that only in proportion as the self-interest is enlightened, can human happiness be secured.

I am prepared, after years of careful study, to concur with Mr. Moran. The universal desire of mankind to secure his own welfare and happiness is the potent source of human well-being and social progress. Various religious systems and social theories have sought vainly to build a social progress upon the very opposite principles—self-abnegation and self-sacrifice. The Christian system teaches, "If a man take thy coat, give him thy cloak also." But the Christian practice is far different. Christians now a-days won't even allow you to take their umbrellas—unless you leave a better in their place. They don't submit kindly to these things in the Nineteenth Century. If sued for seduction, they will likely employ Mr. Shearman, Judge Porter, Mr. Tracy or Evans to defend them. People whose theory is "live for others," usually look after the main chance like the self-interest groundlings.

This law of Compe didn't even work well in its founder's life, for he took good care to make others live for him. Self-regarding motives lie at the bottom of many acts which seem to be self-sacrificing. "What a devoted woman," you say, "is Florence Nightingale. Here is indeed a life given for others." And yet she herself says: "I give a quarter of a century's European experience when I say, the happiest people, the fondest of their occupation, the most thankful for their lives, are those engaged in sick-nursing. It is a mere abuse of words to represent the life as a self-sacrifice and martyrdom." If a smoker hands a friend a freshly lighted match, it is less from politeness, perhaps, than a dislike to inhaling the brimstone himself. If a man denounces a certain indulgence, you are not sure he is depriving himself of a pleasure, or that he does not, in the words of Hudibras,

"Compound for sins he is inclined to,
By damning those he has no mind to."

But we may believe also a man may serve his own interest and ours at the same time. When we see the Treasury Department at Washington filled with beautiful girls, the gayest of the gay, let us not be so unkind as to imagine there is anything wrong about it. Doubtless each is an efficient government clerk, and the Congressmen who keep them there are actuated by a sense of the strictest public duty. Some years ago, some public-spirited men were active in establishing Central Park. Some of them proved to be owners of vast tracks in the vicinity, which became greatly enhanced in value in consequence.

If we examine we shall find society a vast network of lies, subterfuges and hypocrisies. It was amusing and instructive to listen to the honest indignation of some boys who had expended their hoardings of pocket money at Barnum's. "Why," said they, "It wasn't like the advertisements at all." Like the advertisements indeed! Do you want a housemaid with the qualities of an angel? They will find her. Are you afflicted? they will cure for twenty-five cents a bottle. Do you wish to get married? behold they offer you a paragon of perfection. Your housemaid turns out a slattern; your patent medicine, poison; your wife an adventurer. On all sides you are assailed by the surreptitious advertisement. It gets into the obituary and on the coffin plate. The genius of advertising is too much for us. He puts his signs in the dome of the Capitol, on Washington's tomb, and plasters our most beautiful scenery with medicine cards.

There is a great deal of sympathy wasted on the fact that there are so many wolves in sheep's clothing. Let us not do injustice to the wolf. In the scheme of creation he is a very valuable link. None of the traps and pitfalls of life but are necessary, for the education of the race. We learn by suffering; and he who does not profit by experience is, as Mr. Darwin says, "a perennial perambulating calamity." If people will go through life without using their brains it is surely no great calamity for them to take the consequences. While from the stand-point of humanity we deprecate the wolf, from the stand-point of philosophy we view him complacently. Every Tom Collins is a public benefactor, since he teaches us to be on the alert for myths. Myths have caused a great deal of trouble in the world. The myths of a personal devil and a literal hell, and multifarious Gods. And the day will come when we may appear as foolish for our belief in Tom Collins as do our ancestors for their belief in infant damnation. When happy and prosperous villages are engulfed by the bursting of a dam, humanity bewails, but philosophy points the lesson, which will result in the protection of generations to come.

The Christian system is full of appeals to self-interest, either by promise of reward or threat of punishment. Isaiah says, "do ye what is good, and let your soul delight in fatness." And again, "if they serve Him, they shall spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasure; but if they obey not they shall perish." The Bible and Koran are alike full of threats and promises, appealing to the self-interest of man. The old negro woman's prayer illustrates this, and proves she had hit upon a factor in sociology: "I've got one favor to ask; O Lord, he-abit, he-abit! My tree sons! dems de burden! Trubble 'em, O Lord, trubble 'em! Don't gib 'em no peace 'till deys saved! Gib 'em a rough time, O Jesus, gib 'em a rough time!"

The fear of punishment and the hope of reward have been alternately used by moral teachers to keep men in the paths of morality. The Christian has no right to any especial claim to a high motive, who desires merely to lay up his treasures in heaven. If the joys of heaven are not depicted in sufficiently attractive terms they prove ineffectual.

Most moralists are constantly representing right conduct as a self-denial. Instead of pointing out that there is a legitimate and proper qualification for every human faculty, they represent that certain faculties must be repressed, cut off, extinguished, and that to be a proper person, a man must be something contrary to his nature. The intelligent and educated discover that their own happiness is not inconsistent with that of others, but that both may be secured at once. The mere effort of each individual to better his condition, though it leads to strife and competition, and a struggle which ends in the survival of the fittest, contributes to the progress of the race. If you eradicate from these things, the selfish principle, you destroy the very essence. Take the greatest engines of civilization, printing press, means of locomotion, etc., all have been extended by the greed of man for money making.

The self-interest of man is then the known factor in Sociology. From this we may predict that, in our present state of ignorance, it is unsafe to trust men with unlimited power. You may predict that municipal, State and National jealousies will embroil men for long years yet to come. You may predict that, under the present false relations of the sexes, marriage will continue to be an effort on the part of each to outwit the other, and result in unions of widespread misery.

You may predict that the only way to compel men to do what is for the interest of society, is to prove to them it is for their own interest.

Social and individual interests are identical. Formerly the tutor was a tyrant. Now education is made attractive.

When self-interest becomes enlightened, we shall see the altruist and the egotist shake hands, an amalgamation of individuals and social interests, and all shall join in these beautiful lines of Bryant:

"With light from heaven, a nature pure and great,
Will place its highest bliss in doing good!"

Ministerial Courtesy.

"O ye who are so good yourself,
So pious and so holy;
Ye've naught to do but mark and tell
Your neighbor's faults and follies."

We have been led to ponder seriously lately, on the many instances of discourtesy shown by ministers to each other, and to members of other denominations. And may we not conclude that among the many degrading influences of Christianity, this is getting to be one of the most injurious to public morals, at least among the votaries of the church. We are not inclined to be particularly captious and fault-finding toward this class of misguided souls. We only believe that they should be judged by the rule which is used in estimating common humanity. Because they have set themselves up as teachers of morality, there is even more reason why they should be judged for things which we severely condemn in the ordinary mortal. Among the many noted instances which have occurred lately of gross discourtesy, we would mention first that of Dr. Adams of this city in his uncalled for and ungentlemanly attack on Prof. Tyndall, who, among scientists, occupies so high a position.

Next, that of the Rev. J. S. Glendenning during his trial for the seduction of Mary Pomeroy. Who, that read the account of those proceedings, but felt a shudder of disgust, when this man, on trial for one of the grossest of crimes, rudely laughs in court at some statement of the dying girl? We could hardly conceive of this in a hardened villain, much less in a Christian minister. The displays of Talmage lately of this sort of impertinence, in his attacks on actors and authors, are too well known to need repeating. This man is, in our opinion, almost too contemptible to speak of. If we forget our own early teachings in this criticism, and fail to be polite in our estimate, it is because we feel these fellows must be fought with their own weapons. Hidden behind their sacred cloth, they lash their fellow men unmercifully. It is only, really an evidence of their own inward depravity. They see naught but villainy around them. I would remind them that to the pure in heart all things are pure." Recently Dr. Carroll of Brooklyn made an attack on Liberals. In the course of his remarks he said something like this, "Infidelity and Atheism are synonymous terms with adultery, lying and licentiousness." This man was ejected from his own church some two years ago or more, on the charge of adultery, and his wife left him in consequence. Fine specimens these, to teach the world morality! Last of all the shining light of orthodoxy, in a Friday evening prayer meeting recently, said he had been invited to attend a conference in this city and as he couldn't go, he should substitute his assistant—pausing a moment—"What's his name—anyhow?" "Halliday," was the response of the crowd, laughing. Now this wasn't quite as bad as the foregoing examples; but it was a coarse and rude way to treat a faithful and devoted friend. But like poor Mrs. Tilton, Beecher's friends have a way of being patient under all circumstances. Is it not time that the world divested the church of its halo of sanctity, through which it has so long looked, blinded to its real deformities and shortcomings?

"Our great Congregational preacher,
The Reverend Henry Ward Beecher,"

Gentlemen of the cloth, more courtesy would beget more respect. If you will throw mud, you must not complain if you get besmeared. Remember you have given little cause for charitable treatment.

"Morality, thou deadly bane,
Thy tens o' thousands thou hast slain!
Vain is his hope, whose stay and trust is
In moral mercy, truth, and justice!"

No—stretch a point to catch a plack;
Abuse a brother at his back.

Learn three-mile prayers and half-mile graces,
With well-spread loaves, and long, wry faces;
Grunt up a solemn, lengthened groan,
And damn all parties but your own."

DI VERNON.

PLEASE read our friend Morris Altman's article in another column, in reference to the varied and extensive list of goods he offers at remarkably low prices. Many of our readers have purchased goods of Mr. Altman, and need not be told he sells merchandise of the very best quality, and at the lowest possible prices, and those who have not yet patronized him, just give him a trial.

A CASE OF NEED.—We are acquainted with a worthy Liberal by the name of C. A. Zamzaw, a German by birth, with a wife and child. He has for a year or more been coming down with Pulmonary Consumption, and has become so reduced in health and strength he can no longer work at his trade, and is in absolute want. If there are any friends in our ranks who feel able and disposed to contribute something toward this friend's necessities this cold winter, and will remit such sums to us, we will see that the same are placed in his hands. He has no relatives to call upon, and needs the help of sympathetic friends.—[Ed. T. S.]

Friendly Correspondence.

HENRY CASEY, Ashland, Oregon, writes: I send you two dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a "nipper."

MISS CORA E. STONE, Crab Orchard, Neb., writes: My father has been reading your paper over a year, and thinks there is nothing like it. I also prize it highly myself; it is good.

DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, N. J., writes: I am much pleased with the neat appearance of your paper as well as the grand and noble utterances within its pages. I predict for it, success.

EX-REV. A. B. WHIG, Vandalia, Mich., writes: I am so highly pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER I shall do all in my power to give it a wide circulation. I think all who can be induced to read it three months will be likely to want it longer.

JAS. R. BIRGE, Creston, Iowa, writes: None of the club whose names I sent you regret the investment. They like the paper well. I again send you a few more names. Please also send a copy of THE HEATHENS OF THE HEATH to Mrs. F. A. C. Fitzmaurice, Princeton, Ill. I have with much pleasure read the copy you sent me, and think it the best book of the kind I ever read. I wish it could be placed in the hands of all.

D. R. SPARKS, Alton, Ill., writes: My beloved sister, Mrs. Mary S. Coon, of Staunton, Ill., while at my house on a visit this winter, found THE TRUTH SEEKER among others of my papers and was delighted with its bold and free religious thought. I promised to make her a present of a copy for a year. Enclosed find two dollars to pay for the same. Never mind the change—that will pay for the postage. May your list gradually grow until it really becomes a power in the land.

DR. C. D. GRIMES, Kalamazoo, Mich., writes: Your paper still comes to me, and I delight to devour it, for my soul delights to feast on fat things, and watch the unfoldings of God in the new revelations of Science. I am sustained as I revel in the new light which is bursting upon us in this much favored era, and hail it as the harbinger of a clearer day, which "kings and prophets waited for and sought but never found." Be thankful, brother, that it is yours, not only to strike herculean blows, that will tell on the hydra-headed monster of ignorance, bigotry and superstition; but to blaze the trees through the dark forests of the world, that the millions that are to follow after may clearly see their way.

L. W. BILLINGSBY, Lincoln, Neb., writes: On Thomas Paine's birthday we organized a Liberal Club in our city. We think we can get as many as one hundred members and chiefly of our best citizens. We have a "broad-gauge" religious society here with a lecture each Sunday to crowded houses by Professor Copeland, who is very liberal, endorsing Abbott's nine propositions or demands. These lectures or services we are supporting at an expense of $1,600 per year. Our Orthodox divines have opened upon our young society all their heavy artillery, but we enjoy it. Underwood is to be here in a few weeks, from whom we will doubtless have some fine addresses.

DAVID PORTER, Salem, O., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is invulnerable and mighty in pulling down the strongholds of superstition; it is "a power in the land" for good; it furnishes food for reflection; it brushes away the veil of Moses; it annihilates the old Jewish Jehovah; it furnishes its readers with arguments to defend common sense; it gives us history in a nut-shell; it keeps us posted with the progress of the age; it gives us a catalogue of good books; it is not only a truth seeker but a truth finder; it is easy to read and understand; it is a school-teacher to instruct us in our duty, and it surely ought to be sustained.

JACOB W. GREENE, Chillicothe, Mo., writes: Please send me a bound copy of The Heathens of the Heath. I have carefully read the copy in paper you sent me and wish one for my library. I consider it a most masterly stroke at superstitious teachings, religious bigotry, intolerance, political oppression, social disorder, and an uncommon move toward disenthralment from mental slavery. It is truly multum in parvo—a hundred volumes in one, and it would indeed be a deeply anchored faith and devotion to "things as they are" that would not be shaken from centre to circumference by its careful perusal. No work I have ever read is so well calculated to remove moral cowardice as this.

Many other letters and communications are unavoidably crowded out.

Wonders of Nature and Art.

How few seem to learn of them! True, the great mass seem to want the time, or lack the curiosity or determination to learn even the origin of the common pin, how made, or the struggles of genius to produce them, stuck on paper by machinery as now sold, the only attention it requires being a supply of paper and pins into the cylinder, to furnish eight to ten tons a week in the United States alone.

The making of needles is a still more delicate and difficult process, yet one person handles 4000 every hour, each needle going through many manipulations in its make. How few can tell the operation or where made! Glass is in advance of any other material of man's invention in its service to humanity, especially in the aid it has given to chemistry and astronomy; yet, how few seem to know of what materials it is composed, how made, or manifest a determination to learn.

Few, I presume, know of the great heat required, the quick, and nice movements, of the variety of forms produced, and how easily put in any form desired.

If we reflect what is necessary for a good telescope, the lenses of optical instruments—for photographic purposes, or even the common spectacle, it must be evident that somebody's thinking powers have been exercised in their production, as also of thousands of articles not here named. In connection with this, think of the study necessary to produce the beautiful pictures of many, many kinds seen every-where, showing every iota placed in the focus of the camera.

Of iron, how few know the process of its manufacture in bars, etc.; of heavy masses almost reduced to a liquid condition, being seized, and though red hot, conveyed with ease and dumped into a machine that rolls it round and round to its exit, being some two feet long, and one foot in diameter, when it again is seized, and placed in fluted rollers moved by machinery, the process repeated until the size wished for is obtained, requiring less time than to write about it. Of the thousands upon thousands conveyed by steam power, how few take the trouble to learn how it is applied, or to learn of the trials and struggles of the inventors of the steam engine—of the printing press, of the telegraph, and many other things of daily use; how little also, are their labors properly appreciated.

Of the nature and habits of the animal creation, how little is really known! Of the sky lark for instance, in its wonderful ascent spirally, or perpendicularly, commencing its song at the start, continuing it to a great height, it being heard for several minutes after being lost to view, its song when descending being different; and never roosting on a tree. The stormy petrel is another curious bird, being continually on the wing far out to sea, never going on land except to continue its race.

The kingfisher is another, depending on fish for its food, pouncing down upon them with unerring aim from quite a distance. These wonders are as nothing compared to snails and shell-fish, the former having its eyes on the point of its longest horns, and each being both male and female, impregnating each other, each hiding their eggs in the earth with great attention and industry.

The oyster is equally curious, each having two ovaries as a female appendage, and two seminal vessels as a male appendage; yet each impregnates itself alone, by having this self-creating power, though as dependent for its food as all other animated life. More wonderful still are the zoöplyte, and polypus. The former if divided in two or more parts, the head part shoots forth a tail and the tail part a head, each in time becoming as perfect as the original. More surprising yet is the Polypus, with several young growing out from its body, and they also having young growing to, or from the their body all at the same time, and all produced naturally without any union of sex or previous act of nature, each dropping from the parent stem without any known cause, or time necessary, and more wonderful still, for, if cut into ten, a hundred, or a thousand pieces, and even turned inside out it will continue to move, seek its food, and soon attain its original perfect form, and becomes as industrious and voracious as ever. While the land polypus are small, being often seen in a wet ditch, or in stagnant water in the mud, those of the sea are from two to four feet long. For the truth of the foregoing, examine Goldsmith, who informs us that naturalists have spent months and years examining into the nature and habits of the animal creation.

In my younger days I lived some time with a family whose son spent day after day for a long time, secret-ing himself in the branches of a tree hanging over the water, so as to learn the habits and actions of fishes, Seth Green by name, now famous for the knowledge he then obtained, and he is yet living to benefit others by it.

Other wonders are learned from history—viz: that in 1721, John Baratar was born, and at four years of age would talk French to his mother, Latin to his father, and high Dutch to the servant girl without ever being instructed, or any confusion of the languages. He understood Greek when six years old, and Hebrew at eight years, and could translate from the Hebrew bible into Latin or French the moment he opened the book. When fifteen, he applied for the degree of Master of Arts, drawing up fourteen theses in one night, defending them next day before 2000 hearers who were amazed with a universal astonishment, and also delighted.

The King of Prussia assisted him with money, tools, books, etc., but his powers gave way, he dying at nineteen, after experiencing great suffering.

The same year was born Henry Heinecker, a still greater prodigy. I omit his biography thinking many readers would view it as incredible; the same as many do of the items called spirit doings published by those having the grit to do so.

I have a neighbor who visited a writing medium, and says he received a communication from his deceased wife, that was impossible for the medium to know of, but there it was on the slate, and how it got there without hands is past his comprehension, and was no humbug, let the people call it what they please.

Now let us reflect a moment on existing facts, and the inconsistency of calling them humbugs, when so many believe the power that created all things went into the "overshadowing" business with a Jew girl, the result being a baby God, born in an ox manger December 25, at three o'clock P. M., 1874 years ago last Christmas at the town of Bethlehem in Judea, Tarus the bull being the zodiacal sign of his heavenly parentage, the witnesses being wise men presenting it perfumes and sugar plums. Where the wisdom in such presents to a squalling young one is, is not apparent unless to dissipate the odor of the stable.

Now Mr. Editor, I infer from the heading of THE TRUTH SEEKER it is to embrace all useful topics that "tend to emancipate and elevate the human race;" hence it must prove itself as a great, glorious, enlightened, and active missionary, ready to glean and make known facts in history, philosophy, physiology, psychology, the arts and sciences, political economy of nature and human industry, of noted characters conferring benefits to humanity, the claims of sects of Materialists, and Spiritualists, and also all possible respecting deity, religion, and human destiny.

Much is said about a "free press," and I feel confident yours will prove one, but in general I feel sure they are no more "free" than a fox in a trap. The editor of a paper in this place has no confidence in sectarian dogmas; yet, for his bread and butter, feels compelled to pander to it; such being the condition of our boasted free press all over our land; such aid to its continuance, and a suppression of free speech and of free press. Many conceal their convictions from fear of being called an Infidel, and their views being unpopular deter them from free speech. Out upon all such—for all humanity of any sense always honors and respects an honest man, far, far more than a hypocrite.

It should be widely known, that those having power, or wishing for it over the human intellect, are mum respecting absolute truth, its effects being what they fear. A few words more respecting spiritual items. Sectarians raise a Babel sound, calling them "all humbugs, or of the devil." Well, they believe Jesus was both God and a man, and that John xx: 19 tells the truth in his appearing to his disciples, the doors being closed, Luke confirming it in xxiv: 36 and yet he calls the people fools, "fools and slow of heart" to believe the prophets—see v. 25—and yet the sects believe the prophets foretold the coming of Jesus, one of them being "with child as a woman"—see Isaiah xxvi: 17, 18; that barren women can have children by the million—Gen. xxiv. 60—that Elijah went to heaven in a chariot of fire, and that God is a consuming fire—see Heb. xii: 29—and yet taunt Spiritualists with being credulous fools. They also believe the Apostles were all filled with the Holy Ghost, or the spirit, and could talk all the languages of the earth—see Act. ii—and yet they soon forget it all, for chapters 4-13 say, "they were unlearned and ignorant." So let all those who rant about imposition in mediums, asserting they were "ignorant of their sayings when in a trance," etc., for, if they assert an untruth, let fault-finders acknowledge that Acts ii: 20, and the prophet Joel, are less to be depended on than these "devilish mediums." Ranters against them show themselves as devoid of good manners as the Apostles did when the third person in the Trinity made them a visit, viz: sitting—Acts ii: 2—and doubting and mocking—12 and 13 vs.—not so much as bidding him welcome to instruct them, the same as sectarians act to-day. To show the ignorance existing a few years ago, I quote: "The Rev. Mr. Marsh, a preacher in New Hartford, prayed that Satan's kingdom might be destroyed, thus raising the wrath of one of his hearers to a high degree, because he owned land so nick-named, which Mr. Marsh was not aware of. He damned the preacher for praying for the destruction of his property."

Another of a different kind entirely, in the person of an English clergyman by name of John Henly, too independent to submit to Church discipline and the orders of his Bishop. So he preaches on his own hook for thirty years outside of church government, publishing a paper, "The Hyp Doctor," filled with burlesque and nonsense to ridicule his opponents, issuing at times ridiculous advertisements, such as "A short way for shoemakers to make shoes. By cutting off the tops of ready made boots," or "To make monkeys laugh, let them listen to the speeches of opponents," and at times in verse, as

"O great restorer of the good old sage,
Preachers at once, and Zany of the age—"

O those of Egypt, wise abode in bogs.
Decent priests, where monkeys are the Gods."

The history shows this was as far as he dare go to keep from prison and save his life. Well, Mr. Editor, this I admit is an odd communication, but the fact is with me, papers having the same old story over and over, they soon become stale, and devoid of interest, while those filled with variety, having spice and vim, and good sense manifested, then each issue becomes of interest, and is eagerly looked for by all wide-awake people. As nature is exhaustless and never can be fully learned, or the arts and sciences become generally known, it appears to me that if your readers generally would communicate facts of general interest, that it would help much to extend useful information. That is the reason of this article. As "variety is the spice of life," I send this dose; which you can consign to the waste basket, or the fire, if deemed unworthy of an appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours very truly, A. B. CHURCH.

[To show the spirit of intolerance that exists in various parts of the country, we lay before our readers the following communication from the Whitewater (Wis.) Sentinel, which was sent us by a friend,

Ed. T. S.]

Religious Intolerance.

A Recent Instance at the Whitewater (Wis.) Normal School.

WHITEWATER, Dec. 11.—B. F. Underwood, of Boston, recently gave a lecture in this village on Evolution. Many of the students of the State Normal School intended to hear the lecture, to which for several days they had looked forward in expectation of an intellectual treat. This coming to the knowledge of President Arey, he requested them not to attend Underwood's lecture, giving as a reason that Underwood was an Infidel. Some of the students came to Mr. Underwood full of indignation and complained bitterly of the bigotry and tyranny of the President. But since they could not attend the lecture they gave their attention the same evening to the President, and his course was discussed in the society. But they had not the backbone to vindicate their cause to the end, as the next issue of The Whitewater Register shows the following:

"The following resolution was unanimously adopted at a recent meeting of the young men's Literary Society in connection with the Normal School:

"Whereas, We, the members of the Lincolnian Literary Society, having learned that the action of President Arey in requesting us not to attend the lecture of B. F. Underwood, delivered in the village on last Friday evening, has been severely criticised by certain parties, and we being deeply sensible of the conscientiousness and faithfulness of President Arey, do hereby Resolve, That, in our opinion, his action was reasonable and proper, under the circumstances, and we do hereby extend to him our sincere thanks for his kind and salutary counsel in relation thereto, and the expression of our gratitude for his continued efforts to promote our moral and intellectual welfare."

Comment is unnecessary. The bigotry and intolerance of President Arey deserves a rebuke. What right has he to dictate to the students what church or lectures they shall attend? The school is supported by the state. The students ought to be free to attend a scientific lecture if they wish to do so, if it did not happen to be just his own religious notion.

I hope the people of Wisconsin will give their attention to this matter. I see Mr. Underwood's lectures were given at Milwaukee, and are spoken of in high terms by the daily press. They all say Mr. Underwood is a thorough master of his subject, and made the discourse very interesting to the highly intellectual audience with which he was favored. Again, "The lecturer contrived to crowd into the lecture of last evening the greatest mass of information, well digested, which it has ever been one's good fortune to hear on the same topic in one evening, and he rendered his summary acceptable, as well as clear to most of his hearers."

Yet such a lecture must not be listened to by the students of the State Normal School. It has the appearance that he feared they might hear something he did not know anything about, and they might ask questions he could not answer.

In this village Mr. Underwood had a large and intelligent audience. There is no difference of opinion as to President Arey's course among liberal-minded men, and the time is not far distant when such men will not be allowed to control our State Institutions. Mr. Underwood is engaged to return here at his earliest convenience, when he will give a course of scientific lectures.

SOMEBODY has figured out the interesting fact that the total amount of State, county, city, and town taxes collected in the United States in 1870 was $280,591,000, which was about $7 a head for the entire population. The total amount of these taxes collected in 1860 was $94,186,000, which was about $3 a head for the entire population. It cost, therefore, more than twice as much to take care of a man in his State, county, and municipal relations in 1870 as it did ten years before. This does not include the Federal taxation.

GOLDEN AGE.

Capital Stock $100,000.

Enlargement of Circulation, Improvement in Form, Increase of Attractions.

On the first of January, the financial and business management of the Golden Age passed into the hands of the GOLDEN AGE PUBLISHING COMPANY, which is composed of enterprising and energetic gentlemen of experience, who will spare no pains to extend its circulation, and give it a leading place among the weekly journals of the country.

The Golden Age will be the organ of no man, party or sect, but a broad, progressive, undenominational paper, representing the most advanced thought of the age, devoted to politics, science, religion and society.

WILLIAM T. CLARKE,

its editor-in-chief, is widely and favorably known as one of the most able, brilliant, and forcible writers in the country. Mr. Clarke will be assisted by a corps of famous contributors, and the literary department of the Golden Age will be of such a character as to insure its careful perusal by wide-awake readers, well-to-do families, and enterprising business men.

KID GLOVES GRATIS.

The Golden Age offers the most liberal premium ever before presented, viz:

A pair of Ladies' Elegant Two-Button Kid Gloves to every new subscriber.

Thousands of people from all sections of the country appreciate this generous inducement, and the subscription list is rapidly increasing.

We also offer to new subscribers who may prefer them, the two elegant chromos: "The Falls of Minnehaha," and "The Gorges of the Yo-Semite," or the handsome "FLOWER PIECE," the best chromos ever produced.

Terms of the Golden Age, post-paid, $3.00

The Golden Age, one year, including a beautiful pair of Ladies' Two-Button Kid Gloves, any size or color, $3.25.

The Golden Age, one year, including the Flower Piece, or both the landscape chromos, unmounted, $3.00.

The Golden Age, one year, including mounted chromos, $3.50.

Address,

GOLDEN AGE,
Box 2848 New York.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE;

A Wide-awake Spiritualistic and Social Reform Journal.

Prominent among the reforms advocated in HULL'S CRUCIBLE are the following:

1. REFORMS IN RELIGION, such as shall do away with many of the outward forms and restore the power of godliness.

2. REFORMS IN THE GOVERNMENT, such as shall do away with the Rings, Cliques and Monopolies, and put all matters concerning the Government of the People into the hands of the People.

3. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, such as shall secure to Labor, the producer of Capital, the control of Capital.

4. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF THE SEXES TO EACH OTHER, such as shall secure to every member of each sex the entire control of their own person, and place Prostitution in or out of Marriage for money or any other cause, out of the question.

Any thought calculated to benefit humanity, whether coming under any of the above, or any other propositions, will find a cordial welcome in the columns of HULL'S CRUCIBLE.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE joins hands with all Reforms and Reformers of whatever School, and welcomes any ideas, however unpopular, calculated to benefit humanity.

Those interested in a live Reformatory Journal, are invited to hand in their subscriptions.

TERMS:

One Subscription, 52 numbers - - - $2.50
" " 26 " - - - 1.25
" " 13 " - - - 0.65

All Letters, Money Orders and Drafts should be addressed,

MOSES HULL & CO.,
24 Newcomb St., Boston.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER.

Buy the Best.

Price $7.50.

SIXTY THOUSAND SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

Medal awarded at the N. Y. State Fair, 1874; First Premium at Western N. Y. Fair, 1874; 12 State Fair Premiums taken the past year; also, Silver Medal of Honor at Penn. State Fair, 1874.

This gem of a Washing Machine has claims on public attention that few machines possess.

We have tried it and find it all that it is claimed for it.—West Rural.

We have thoroughly tested the Calkins' Champion Washer and find it in all respects simple, durable and cheap; efficient in its work, and capable of doing all that is claimed for it. We endorse the Champion and recommend the firm.—Prairie Farmer.

We have seen the machine in operation, and feel safe in recommending it to our readers.—Moore's Rural New Yorker.

Almost every family will buy it, after seeing it in use. Send for descriptive Circulars and Terms to Canvassers.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER CO.,

106 Chambers Street, New York, and 207 South Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

Having made special arrangements with the Company, we can send it by Express to all parts of the country, at the Company's price. In connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER, we send it at a greatly reduced price.

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York

SPIRITUALISM.

The recent extraordinary attention the subject is attracting, and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless and widely-circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

Religio-Philosophical Journal

3 MONTHS FOR 30 CENTS.

POSTAGE FREE AFTER JANUARY 1st.

The JOURNAL is a large 8-page weekly paper, regular price $3 per year, now in its Ninth Year. Address S. S. JONES, Editor, 180 E. Adam St., Chicago.

N. B.—State where you saw this advertisement.

Scottish Western Loan Co.,

G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,

Bankers,

Le Roy, Minnesota,

BRANCH OFFICE, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner.

10 per cent. paid on receipt of money at the Bank, or in New York until invested. For full particulars, send for Circular. To Jan. 1, 1875.

J. M. FOLLETT.

E. B. HILL.

SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid:

Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz.

Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz.

All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles, Oils, etc., etc.,

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.

BEST AND CHEAPESTSEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

till Apr. 15.

R. H. SHUMWAY,
Rockford, Ill.No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Free-thought and Miscellaneous Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty. Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole,
Bronson, Mich.

D.M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED,
AND PRICED
SEED ANNUAL
1875

Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.

Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

"Common Sense."

A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.

A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, Etc., Etc.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors.

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions.

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per Annum, Post-paid. Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,

236 Montgomery St.,

San Francisco, Cal.

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN

Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Eating For Strength.

A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

Odds and Ends.

How much cloth is required to make a spirit wrapper? About a medium pattern.

PEOPLE who travel barefooted in the dark around a newly-carpeted bed-room often find themselves on the wrong tack.

"PAPA, are you growing taller all the time?" "No, my child, why do you ask?" "'Cause the top of your head is poking through your hair."

"WHERE do people go to who deceive their fellow-men?" asked a Sunday-school teacher of a pupil. "To Europe," was the prompt reply.

AN Illinois woman has sued for divorce because her husband made her eat for her supper a loaf of sour bread she had set before him.

THERE is a good supply of fruit hanging on the trees of Texas at all seasons of the year. The fruits of iniquity—horsethieves and such.

IF you don't like your neighbor, buy his child a small drum. But not your next door neighbor. If you don't like him, raise chickens.

A WESTERN paper decides that, from the darkness of his epidermis, King Kalakaua is a descendant of Ham. He is therefore a member of the Ham-Sandwich family.

"YOUR feet are not very stylish," said a man to his friend whose feet covered with bunions. "No, not very stylish, but exceedingly nobby," was the good natured reply.

MRS. PARTINGTON, reading of the strike of the wire drawers, remarked: "Ah, me! what new fangled things won't they wear next?"

ENCOURAGE her to take her beau into the house, and our grown-up sons and daughters won't have so many severe colds. And yet it's a funny feeling—this kissing when both noses are cold.

THE New Orleans Times, speaking of a man who had lately died, says that he has "passed to his sempiternal heritage." This is a good phrase, but, after all, it leaves a torturing doubt.

"ONLY a woman's hair," remarked Spivens, musingly, as he gazed down into his plate; "a red haired woman at that! It may be very sentimental, but it somehow gets away with my appetite."

THEY tried to scare a man in Missouri by threatening to tar and feather him; but he replied, "Come on with your old tar? I've been there six times, and I've got a recipe for washing it off."

"WELL, how do you get along?" inquired a country landlord, one rainy morning, of a guest whom he had put in a top floor room under a leaky roof. "Oh, swimmingly," was the reply.

"SIR," said a Yankee, "you promised to vote for my bill. 'Vell," said the Dutch member, "vat if I did!" "Well, sir, you voted against it." "Vell, vat if I did?" "Well, sir, you lied!" "Vell, vat if I did?"

BAGGS got up too early one morning, and began to scold the servant girl. His little six year old, who had been listening very attentively during the conversation, broke in with, "Father, stop scolding; you needn't think that Jane's your wife."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher remarked:—"You must recollect that all I am telling you happened one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four years ago." "Lor, miss, how the time do slip away," was little Sallie's comment.

SCENE, a court room.—Seedy individual arraigned for theft. Question by the judge—Did you steal the complainant's coat? Seedy individual—I decline to gratify the morbid curiosity of the public by answering that interrogatory.

A YOUNG man of Marshall, Mich., has received a gift of seven shirt bosoms from his sweetheart, with her photograph on each, so that he will wear her next to his heart. Is that young lady warranted to wash?

A WOULD-BE school teacher in Toledo recently replied to a question by one of the examiners: "Do you think the world is round or flat?" by saying: "Well, some people think one way and some another, and I'll teach round or flat just as the parents please."

THERE is a gruff old party who lives opposite to a church, where the members of the choir met twice a week to practice, and who says if the singing affects heaven as it affects him, there'll be no use going there for happiness.

A THOMAS street school boy had just got his face fixed to sing, "Let us love one another," when a snow-ball hit him in the mouth and so confused him that he yelled: "Bill Sykes, just do that agin and I'll chew your ear off."

"Ah! Sam, so you've been in trouble, hab you?" "Yes, Jim, yes." "Well, well, cheer up, man; adversity tries us, and shows up our best qualities." "Ah! but adversity didn't try me; it was an old wag-abond of a judge, and he showed up my worst qualities."

"GIVE us a copper, yer honor?" cried a little street Arab of ten years, recently. "Be off with you!" replied the gentlemen; "I have no change." "Please, sir," continued the urchin in the same nasal voice, "do give us a half-penny; I've lost half an hour running after yer!"

"JOHN, stop your crying," said an enraged father to his son, who had kept up an intolerable yell for the last five minutes. "Stop, I say, do you hear?" again repeated the father after a few minutes, the boy still crying. "You don't suppose I can choke off in a minute, do you?" cried the urchin.

A GENTLEMAN whose house was repairing went one day to see how the job was getting on, and observing a quantity of nails lying about, said to the carpenter: "Why don't you take care of these nails? They'll certainly be lost." "No fear of that," was the reply; "you'll find them all in the bill."

A LITTLE boy of six Summers was sent one morning to call his grandfather to breakfast. The old gentleman was in the habit of snoring very loud, and as the boy pushed open the door he was frightened at the unusual noise. He rushed back to his mother, exclaiming: "Ma! grandpa's been barking at me!"

"Now then," said a physician, cheerily, to a patient, "you have got along far enough to indulge in a little animal food, and—" "No you don't, doctor," interrupted the patient; "I've suffered long enough on your gruel and slops, and I'd starve sooner than begin on hay and oats."

A COUNTRY deacon went home one evening and complained to his wife that he had been abused down at the store shamefully. One of the neighbors, he said, called him a liar. Her eyes flashed with indignation. "Why didn't you tell him to prove it?" she exclaimed. "That's the very thing—that's the trouble," replied the husband; "I told him to prove it, and he did."

AN industrious citizen of San Juan arose a few mornings ago, and with a tin bucket under his arm, went to the barn to milk the family cow. It was dark and rainy, and in fumbling about for old Brindle he got into the wrong pew and began to pull the off mule of his wagon team. He can't remember which side of the roof he went out at, but his recollection of alighting on the picket fence is very vivid. He expects the bucket down in a few days.

THE following love letter is published as the production of a North Carolina boy, nine years old:

WILMINGTON, July 5.

MY DARLING LUCY: I must leave you tomorrow, you used to love me but your love for me is gone but my love for you is just the same just think lucy how your words cut my heart i would give you things too as well as Robert but if you want to see your love for two or three apples go ahead i dont care a straw lucy i love the ground you walk on i would die for you i love you lucy please receive my vow.

FRANK J. E.

P. S. if you here of me being found dead you drove me to it R. says he dont care a fig for you more the rest.

For Winter Evenings. PLAYING CARDS.

Fancy, Transparent, Illustrated.

THE LATEST OUT.

Sent Post-paid by Mail, for $1. Address,

E. M. McDONALD & CO.,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sexual Physiology.

BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. With eighty fine engravings. AGENTS WANTED.

SYNOPSIS OF TABLE OF CONTENTS.

The Male Organs of Generation.
The Female Organs of Generation.
The Origin of Life.
Sexual Generation.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Impregnation.
Pregnancy.
Embryology.
Parturition.
Lactation.
The Law of Sex.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Theory of Population.
The Law of Sexual Intercourse.
Hereditary Transmission.
Philosophy of Marriage.

This work has rapidly passed through twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Prof. Wilder, of Cornell University, says it is the best work of its kind published.

Price, by mail, $2.00. Sold by
D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE
Heathens of the Heath,
A ROMANCE,
Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH
PRIESTCRAFT, THE MISSION-
ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shown up.

A perusal of it will open

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will Regret the Investment.

It contains nearly 450 pages. 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper,
and gotten up in excellent style.
Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00

In Cloth, neatly bound.....1.50

Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
New York.

DR. WM. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMP-
TIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH,

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere.
Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING
AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.
CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.
CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.
CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.
CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.
Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S OXYGENATED BITTERS.

THE OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSLEY'S

Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in
One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,

Proprietors,
8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. A. B. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO.

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION, FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.
"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 13. { D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, MARCH 1, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY. } $1.75 per Year.
{ SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. }

The Truth Seeker,

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

MR. GLADSTONE has published another pamphlet, entitled "Vaticanism," in reply to Rev. Dr. Newman and Archbishop Manning. He maintains his original assertions, and eulogizes Dr. Newman, whose secession, he says, is the greatest loss to the English Church since Wesley's.

HOME TESTIMONY.—It is, perhaps, a coincidence that while Mr. Beecher's sister, Mrs. Isabella Beecher Hooker, has all along been fully convinced of her brother's guilt, Mrs. Tilton's brother, Mr. Richards, has had grounds for entertaining the same opinion with respect to her. It is honest conviction, truly, that brings out such reluctant admissions.

CHARLES LYELL, the greatest Geologist of this or any other age, has recently died in London at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. His investigations and sound reasoning have done much to destroy the confidence of the intelligent portion of mankind in the fables of the creation, and the age of our planet as given in the Bible. His works will long survive him.

STILL MORE.—The Rev. Mr. Deardoff, of the United Brethren denomination, recently held a protracted meeting near Yates City, Ill., and was invited by one of the sisters to spend the night at her house. Soon after being ensconced in the comfortable quarters, and they being alone, he said: "We are commanded to greet each other with a holy kiss." She was not in the humor for familiarities, and tearing herself away from the clergyman, rushed to one of the neighbors. It is almost needless to say the protracted meeting was not longer continued.

STILL ANOTHER.—The Rev. Mr. Curtis, not long since met with a slight accident. He had been conducting a revival meeting at Plano, Ill., and had been living on "chicken fixings" and everything nice, as the pious friends there knew how to prepare them. Business called him to the village of Blackberry a few days ago, and he put up at the hotel and staid over night. When he retired, he was either so sleepy or so "full of the spirit," he got into bed with a woman who was not his wife. He was so absorbed in his devotions he did not change his location, until he was discovered by some over-inquisitive persons. He insisted the matter was entirely an accident. Is it not a little singular how many such accidents are recently befalling our good clergymen?

BEECHER TO MOULTON.—In 1873 Mr. Beecher thus wrote to Moulton: "Oh! that I could put in golden letters my deep sense of your faithful, truthful, earnest, undying fidelity, your disinterested friendship. Your noble wife, too, has been to me one of God's comforters. It is such as she that renews my waning faith in womanhood."

"For a thousand encouragements—for services that no one can appreciate who has not been as sore-hearted as I have been, for your honorable delicacy, for confidence and affection—I owe you so much that I can neither express nor pay it. Not the least has been the great-hearted kindness and trust which your noble wife has shown, and which have lifted me out of despondencies often, though sometimes her clear truthfulness has laid me pretty flat."

How are such protestations to be reconciled with claims that both Mr. and Mrs. Moulton were at that time engaged in a damnable conspiracy to ruin the trusting pastor who had not the sagacity to discover their base designs?

Mr. Beecher, in his Friday night and Sunday talks to his devoted flock, continues about as jovial and rollicking as ever. He abounds in witticisms, fun and mimicry, and he has a great deal to say about God and Christ, and the excellence of prayer. He has concluded that if God is on his side, it matters not if all else are opposed to him. In this way he may become reconciled to the fact, that thousands who have heretofore sympathized with him, are now losing confidence in his innocence. He probably needs to have God on his side.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, one of the ablest women in this country, knows a great deal about the Beecher-Tilton business, and while she declines to say to a Chicago interviewer he is guilty, she is decided that "in Mr. Beecher's defense, his attempt to establish his own innocence by pulling down the character of many noble people, is alike unmanly and contemptible." Of Tilton she says: "He is one of the best-hearted men I ever knew, but like all men of genius he has weak points." Of the Tilton home, she says: "One hardly ever meets with a better-ordered household, or a husband and wife who lived in such harmony as did Mr. and Mrs. Tilton." [Was it not a crime to destroy such a home?] Of Moulton, she says: "I know him to be a gentleman in every sense of the word—a man of honor and honesty." Of Tracy she says: "I think his position is as dishonorable as it is lacking in legal etiquette."

REV. DR. FISKE, upon trial in Michigan, honestly "owned up" as follows: "I frankly confess to the fearful sin of which I am charged, and will not be a coward to lie or seek a palliation of my weakness and guilt. I can only crave the pity and compassion of the world I have offended, and the forgiveness which my sincere and profound repentance before man and God calls for. I have returned my letter of fellowship to the denomination I have so grievously stricken, and abandoned the profession I have so deplorably shamed. May God and man pity and forgive me, and aid me to do some humble work yet in life for the good of society. I am not a coward or a sneak to make Adam's plea that a woman did it. It was my own weak and unguarded soul that in a moment of frenzy and passion wrought my downfall." If some of the clergymen in our midst hereabouts, would be half as honest as this one, and if not so self-condemning, they would to-day stand far better in the estimation of thousands. Persistent lying and perjury are a far greater sin than the original offense. Some think us rather severe upon weak, fallible clergymen, but so long as they do wrong, so long as they persist in lying egregiously about it, and so long as an equally corrupt church holds them up as models and paragons of perfection and morality, so long we shall not hold our peace.

THE BEECHER TRIAL slowly drags its tedious length along. The eighth week (we think it is) as we write, is nearly completed. Very damaging testimony against the defendant has been presented. We recapitulate: Moulton stated that Beecher on many occasions admitted the crime of adultery with Mrs. Tilton, and numerous letters were read confirming the same. Tilton testified Beecher admitted his crime in his presence on different occasions. Mrs. Moulton stated Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton had both confessed their crime to her on more than one occasion, and she detailed long conversations held with Mr. Beecher on the subject. She stated that Mrs. Tilton had said to her that in an examination she should turn against her husband, tell a falsehood, and do all she could to exonerate Mr. Beecher, and she thought it would be right for her to do so. Mrs. Tilton's brother testified to seeing Mr. Beecher and Mrs. Tilton in close and improper proximity. Mrs. Cary did the same. The plaintiff has rested his case. Gen. Tracy has read his long opening speech, giving the plan of the defense. He of course made Tilton a base man and Beecher a paragon of virtue. The skill with which cunning lawyers construct the most ingenious defense for vile, abandoned criminals is well known, and on this occasion we must look for an extra effort in this direction. One side in this extraordinary case has perjured himself in the most fearful manner; which side is it? From the testimony now in, it would seem a clear case had been established; and that a verdict accordingly must be rendered; but we must remember the party being tried is a Christian Clergyman; a Christian Church worth millions of dollars is at his back, ready to spend any needed amount to clear their favorite; Christian lawyers are defending him, and a Christian jury is to judge him. We need not be surprised, then, if we obtain a Christian verdict—guilt pronounced innocence.

A LARGE majority of the American people appear to be settling down in the conviction that Henry Ward Beecher is guilty of the charges preferred against him; that he is involved in such a complete net-work of complications and suspicious circumstance, that his own letters are so self-condemnatory, and the mass of testimony is so strong against him, as to preclude the possibility of his innocence. In this view of the case we ought to be lenient toward him, and not bear too heavily upon him. He is only a man with the temptations and infirmities incident to his species. If he is susceptible to the charms of the opposite sex, if his own domestic conditions have not been just as happy as might be desired, if he found abroad that sympathy and love that were denied him at home, if he found others who fondly administered to his earthly bliss, can we wonder at his cultivating their acquaintance, or blame him for doing that which is perfectly natural for a man to do? Perhaps not. His offense is not so bad as his defense. Falsehood and perjury are infinitely worse than yielding to the wants and incentives of human nature. This can be excused and overlooked, but that, never. A mean and despicable feature in the defense is, that the virtuous Mr. Beecher was beset and importuned by both Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Moulton; that they loved and adored him and were willing to do almost anything in the world for him, but Joseph-like, he turned his back to them and said unto them nay. This defense in reference to Mrs. Tilton was made in his statement before the Church Committee last summer, and as to Mrs. Moulton, it is made now; and by this ignoble, false claim it is hoped to neutralize her damaging evidence. Will it succeed?

THE New York Herald, after admitting Mr. Beecher's great talent and ability, says: "His recent pulpit displays are as indecorous as his extraordinary letters to Moulton and others were unwise. While this scandalous trial is pending, it would have become him to subordinate personal considerations to the honor of the Church. No judicious person can believe the cause of religion is promoted by the preaching of a man who stands in the equivocal position of Mr. Beecher. The honor of the Church, public respect for religion, and a decent regard for morals would forbid the entrance into a Christian pulpit, of a man whose purity was impugned, however brilliant his talents. His usefulness in the great cause of religion is totally impaired, until he can vindicate his character. His weekly demonstrations that he is a brilliant and unequalled preacher, prove his talents, but not his innocence, and an attempt to make it such would seem to display a consciousness that he cannot stand on the result of an impartial investigation. Nothing is more delusive than the idea that a man who makes eloquent discourses on virtue, is therefore virtuous. Mr. Beecher must be judged by the evidence of facts, and neither his eloquence nor his popularity can avail him, unless he can confute the testimony of his accusers. He must stand or fall by the evidence in the case, and the great display of eloquence which he makes in his pulpit, is quite as likely to be interpreted against him as in his favor. If he felt sure of his ground of defense, it would seem a becoming act of dignity and respect for religion, to suspend his pulpit labors until his character is cleared of unjust reproach."

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XII.

When the two fugitives found themselves alone with Firefly, on the departure of Red Wing and all the Indians save two, they began to experience some uneasiness. What if the Fanatic and his crew should again procure some clue to their retreat, or what was to be their ultimate fate?

These reflections pressed heavily upon them, and the more so as they now found themselves without anything like adequate protection, should they again be assailed by their enemies.

They were surprised to perceive the cheerfulness that characterized Firefly, although she, too, was in a measure an outlaw, and liable to be pounced upon by the emissaries of the government. Her husband and tribe were under a ban; and now that he had ventured within the very lines of the enemy, so to speak, she, in her unprotected state, seemed to be in as great danger as they were themselves.

They could not, therefore, comprehend the confidence that she displayed; for it was obvious that the merest accident might betray her into the hands of the whites. They therefore asked her why she evinced so little fear in the absence of the chief and so many of the red men, while almost in the very grasp of her foes. To this the beautiful squaw replied:

"Great Spirit now come and watch over Firefly! She no want 'um so much watch when Red Wing in 'um wigwam with her. Red Wing watch then, and save her from white mans. Red man no want Great Spirit to do 'um work when 'um can do it 'umself. White mans make too much ask Great Spirit eberything."

This was a philosophy that struck both the maidens as not only consoling in the extreme, but exalted in no ordinary degree. Here were they, brought up in what they were taught to consider the purest and most enlightened of all beliefs—in fact, one stamped with the very signet of the Creator himself—put to the blush by a person whom they had been told to consider an untutored savage plunged in both mental and moral darkness the most profound.

That God exacts no particular religious belief at the hands of his creatures is evident from the fact, that the world has, for ages upon ages, been filled with conflicting religious theories, and that there are to-day as many shades of Christianity as there are days in the year. Strange, if he favored any peculiar system of belief that he did not attach some symbol by which we should become satisfied of its genuineness and comprehend that it alone was worthy his unqualified approbation. The members of all creeds are subject alike to the laws of nature. There is, we apprehend, but very little difference between a Methodist and a Mohammedan toothache; and medical men have not yet been able to classify the decay of the human body as Baptist or Presbyterian. The beggar outlives the rich man and the rich man outlives the beggar. All die alike and suffer from the same causes. The sun shines for all; the rain falls for all; the wind blows for all, and the earth yields fruit for all whatever the zone. In all physical things we share alike at the hands of the giver of all good. There are no two opinions on this subject. And why? Simply because these facts are demonstrated in every-day life and in every portion of the habitable globe. No one disputes them. Their existence is constantly before our eyes, and we therefore accept them as true.

But see what becomes of us the moment we enter a field of a more metaphysical character, where demonstration is completely out of the question. Then we forsake the impartial physical basis upon which God has manifested himself to us in his goodness, and assume that we are no longer a universal family, all sharing his care and love alike, but that Brown is more favored than Jones, or Jones than Robinson. So that on the one hand we declare the Great Father to deal impartially with his creatures, while on the other we assert that he does what is diametrically the opposite.

This latter is as illogical a feature of our existence as could possibly obtain in any relation. There is, therefore, no partial revelation. God speaks to all creatures alike, and in a language that transcends the petty creeds that dot the earth. No book is inspired whose contents are not known and comprehended by all; for it would be injustice and tyranny to exact obedience on the part of any individual to a law of which he had no perception. In relation to things truly divine and essential to man's happiness and elevation in this world or the world to come, all intelligent beings must think mainly and fundamentally alike. Hence, the only truths to be found in creeds are those which are common to all and consistent with the manifestations of nature.

When the Fanatic parted from his two companions after the horrible scene mentioned in the last chapter, he regained his lonely dwelling in the gloomy and deserted hollow, and entering it, closed and bolted the heavy door that shut him in from the world.

This done, he gained the apartment in which we found him seated in deep thought on the previous night, and throwing himself into the chair already alluded to, began ruminating aloud upon the probable success of the nefarious project that he had concocted, and that he now hoped should be consummated before another sun rose.

"Yes," he muttered as if in answer to some enquiry from within. "I can manage it! Once surrounded by these walls, she shall never see the light of day again, save through these dim windows, invisible to the outer world. I can never trust her! Were she out of my sight a single moment, she would betray me, and I should be lost."

As he spoke he looked up to a couple of skylights by which only this inner apartment was made sensible of the day. There were along the sides some narrow loopholes that had been securely boarded, and that, although once affording light and air, were now blind as midnight. Along these his eyes ran also, as if to detect whether there was any tell-tale crevices in them. Finding them all safe as he supposed, he once more fell into his train of self-communing, and in a voice that could not be heard by any one who happened to be in the apartment close by, continued:

"The Noose knows too much of me," he mused, "and so does the half-breed! I wish they were both out of the way—although I am less anxious on that score about the latter than I am about the former. Madge, old Madge, however, will be here ere long, and to her I will hand over the proud beauty. She'll know how to manage her; for she is the only person on this earth that I can now trust implicitly."

Madge Gordon was not only a fanatic of the most hopeless character, but was one of the most cruel and reckless creatures in the whole settlement. She had only one virtue, if it could be called such, and that was her blind adherence to Sloucher, and a confidence that nothing could shake, in his divine mission and powers. His will with her was law, and under his influence she would, it was said, use the knife or the poisoned bowl in the carrying out of his commands, as though these were the most divinely appointed agents that ever effected a noble purpose.

On more than one occasion rumor had it, she silenced a poor innocent creature who happened to provoke his malice, or who stood in the way of one of his criminal designs. And now that he had determined to seize upon Alice and bear her to this forbidding retreat, he determined to place her, "until she came to her senses," as he termed it, in the hands of this remorseless woman, without letting his confederates know of his intention in this relation.

Everything was in readiness for the evening. The soldiers were to be secretly stationed near the ravine, where the two Indians were to be betrayed into their hands—the half-breed promising that they should capture the chief and a dozen besides; although well aware of the number left to guard the whites and Firefly.

The Fanatic and the Noose, it was decided, should be waiting near the wigwam, into which the half-breed should rush, after the capture of the Indians, and warn the inmates to fly as the witch-finder and his men were upon them.

When once outside the lodge they were to be seized and bound—Nat bearing off Martha whither he would, and the half-breed carrying off Firefly into the depths of the forest or to any point he deemed safest. The Fanatic knew, of course, what line he was to pursue, and was, therefore, not much perplexed as to the final destination of his prize; and, moreover, circumstance favored him so far, that, with ordinary caution, he should be able to bear his captive to her prison without the possibility of detection, as the path from the ravine to the hollow was one almost wholly unfrequented even in daylight. Already three stout horses in a barnyard on the verge of the town, had been secretly pitched upon by the Noose and the half-breed as necessary to the furtherance of their conspiracy. These were to be led into the woods after nightfall and held convenient to the wigwam of the chief. They were to serve in bearing away the intended victims to their points of destination, upon which the animals were to be turned loose.

The three scoundrels agreed to bind and gag their victims lest there should be any cry for help, or any effective resistance. This they thought could be done without any serious injury to them, while their helpless forms could then be hastily swung on the horses and ridden away with.

All this, or a great portion of it, had been passing through the mind of Sloucher, when he was aroused from his reverie by a loud knocking at the outer door. He instantly arose from his chair and going to the apartment in which we first encountered him with his two fellow conspirators, he demanded who it was that knocked, and was answered in a hollow voice:

"Madge Gordon, a hand-maiden of the Lord, and the servant of his servant, Solomon Sloucher!"

A hideous grin overspread the forbidding face of the Fanatic as he drew the heavy bolts and admitted the tall, gaunt figure of a woman, wearing a long, grey mantle, with the hood thrown over her head, and with a long oak staff in her hand.

As she entered she threw back the hood and revealed a face never to be forgotten. She had been once remarkably handsome, and even now, while her white hair hung in hopeless tangles about her shoulders, and her eyes blazed with unnatural fire, there was, as she stood erect, a ruined Juno about her look and mien that was terribly fascinating. Her features, though weather beaten and wrinkled, were singularly regular; and to those who were given to analyze the human face, there was sometimes a tenderness in their expression and a far off look in her eyes that seemed as if she was struggling to regain some long lost memory that had once been heaven to her.

When she perceived the Fanatic, she at first recoiled from him with an expression of horror; but the involuntary spasm, as it were, passing away instantly, without his having observed it, he extended his huge, bony hand to her, which she kissed reverently, while he closed and bolted the door with the other.

"Well, faithful servant of the Lord," he drawled out, as he led her into the room in which he had just been seated, "the Children of Zion are sorely tried in these times, and his servant has had a narrow escape from the spells of the woman Ravenswood, who is now proven to be an emissary of the Evil One."

The new-comer stood silent for a moment, then leaning upon her staff, she looked into the Fanatic's long and solemn face, and exclaimed in a strange though not unmusical voice:

"The fagot or the rope! The rope or the fagot for Alice Ravenswood! She is doomed! A most beautiful witch, and a most dangerous witch! She is doomed! She is doomed! The fagot or the rope! The rope or the fagot!"

"No, not yet," returned Sloucher. "I have had a vision warning me not to be too hasty, but to seize upon the witch, and place her in your charge, in your secret charge, in this very apartment, until certain things are brought to light. No one is to suspect that she is beneath this roof! Not a whisper of it even to Peter Huskins. So says the vision. She will be brought hither to-night, and the will of the Lord be done."

"Amen!" ejaculated Madge, an expression of awe passing over her countenance, which was quickly succeeded by the same singular, far-off, lost look that bespoke her what she really was, a lunatic that seemed completely swallowed up in the terrible superstition of the day.

She now divested herself of her cloak, and at the instance of Sloucher, laid aside her staff and took a seat by a clear fire that was blazing in the chimney, the flue of which joined that of the fireplace in the other apartment, so that but one column of smoke issued from the building.

Sloucher now instructed her with great minuteness and emphasis as to the strict watch and ward she was to keep over her prisoner when she arrived; and that in case of her attempting to make any outcry, she was to threaten her with instant death; although, except under circumstances yet to be explained, she was not to put her threat into execution. The villain would, however, not have called in the poor lost creature to assist him in his insane design of ultimately procuring the forgiveness of Alice and coercing her into a union with him, could he have accomplished it unaided. But perceiving at a glance, that the poor fugitive could not with safety be left alone for a single moment, and that without attracting suspicion he could not remain shut up with her for one day even, he struck upon the plan of placing her under his faithful dupe, and of diverting attention from her place of confinement, by being seen constantly abroad himself.

When night set in, everything was in order. During the day the half-breed visited the ravine, where he soon fell in with the two Indians who, believing him their friend, and as he spoke their language, were glad to see him. They walked with him a good way along the bottom of the glen in the direction of the town. Here they parted at a certain huge elm—the half-breed suggesting that if they met him at the same point an hour after night-fall, he should bring them some trifles from his own house that he knew they stood in need of.

The red men were delighted and promised to be at the trysting place to the moment, and so they separated. The Fanatic and the Noose were apprised of this, and now that it was dark and Lightfoot had previously instructed Sloucher as to where the soldiers were to be posted, all three set out—the Fanatic for the ravine, and the Noose and the half-breed to secure the horses and lead them by a circuitous route to the edge of the glen where Nat was to hold them in readiness while his treacherous companion was away disposing of the two unsuspecting red men.

The horses were to be kept on hand by the side of a track, along which the half-breed was to lead Firefly and her companions when he bounded into the wigwam and warned them to fly, to which point the Fanatic was to make his way also.

The times, as we remarked in a former chapter, were stirring and dangerous. On the one side were the wild and superstitious whites, consigning both men and women of their own race to the rope and the fagot, in accordance with the most debasing law and improbable theory that had ever been propounded; while on the other, were the Indians ready to take the scalp of any settler who happened to stray a single yard beyond the range of his own property without being well armed.

This feeling of insecurity and a sense that an enemy lurked in every corner, made the carrying of weapons, both offensive and defensive, a necessity upon the part of the sober-minded colonists, whatever their sex; so that both Martha and Alice had for many a day concealed about their persons individually a small keen poniard, unknown to any living soul save themselves respectively.

Singularly enough, while Sloucher was approaching the point of rendezvous, where the Noose had already arrived with the horses, and while the half-breed was off to betray the red men into the hands of the soldiers who were ready to pounce on them, Martha and Alice were exhibiting to Firefly the two weapons just alluded to, either of which might prove deadly enough in even feeble hands.

The squaw examined them with great interest, and returning them to their respective owners, remarked: "Um kill berry soon, dead! 'Um like 'um for bad white mans, or 'um like 'um for bad Injuns. 'Um kill berry quick!"

In the mean-time, the two Indians had arrived at the spot where they were to meet Lightfoot, and were now awaiting his appearance. They soon heard his step and the signal he was to give them on his approach. They moved forward to meet him, but ere they had proceeded a dozen yards, they were surrounded by the soldiers and hurried off toward the town—the party being somewhat disappointed on learning from the half-breed, that the chief and the rest of the Indians had discovered the ambush, and fled.

However, as it was supposed that some important information might be extracted from the two prisoners, no more was said on the subject; and Lightfoot being satisfied that the coast was clear, now retraced his steps along the edge of the ravine until he came to the point where Sloucher and the Noose were waiting with the horses, but a short distance from where the fugitives were still conversing with their dusky hostess.

On learning that the two red men were prisoners, the Fanatic advised instant action in relation to the fugitives; upon which the half-breed turned toward the wigwam of the chief, but first informing his fellow conspirators, that Firefly and her two companions would be flying before him or with him along the track in a few moments. Upon this he disappeared, leaving the Noose and Sloucher in a state of the most anxious expectation.

On gaining the wigwam, and hearing its three inmates conversing without any apprehension of immediate danger, he paused for a moment and then, at a single bound, was in among its startled occupants.

"Fly! fly!" he exclaimed in a voice of well-feigned alarm. "The witch-finder and his soldiers are upon you! Follow me! Follow me!" he exclaimed, "there's not a moment to lose!"

Firefly, who knew the half-breed and who always believed him to be friendly, did not hesitate a moment, but sprang to her feet and counseled her companions to follow his advice. Bewildered and not knowing anything of the villain, they were instantly by her side, and preparing to rush out into the night, the half-breed waiting to lead the way.

The betrayed fugitives equipped themselves hastily to meet the growing coldness of the season; and the squaw, without being noticed by Lightfoot, thrust a deer knife into her girdle as she threw her fur mantle about her shoulders, so that, like her companion, she also was armed.

Martha, great as was her danger, felt no small repugnance to leaving her father's fine bundle of furs to the tender mercies of the party she supposed now all but within grasp of her; but the love of life, overruling every other sentiment, she soon dismissed the subject from her mind.

The three conspirators had provided themselves ropes and gags, which in the latest consultation they had held they determined to use, lest the cries of the victims should possibly attract attention, or that the difficulty of carrying them off should be insurmountable. They were, of course, powerful and agile themselves; but then Firefly and Martha and Alice were no dwarfs; and the strength of a woman, when that which is dearer to her than life is in danger, was not to be underrated.

Once outside the wigwam, the half-breed, who had been a few steps in advance, fell back and walked besides Firefly, with whom he conversed freely, although what he said was in a low and seemingly agitated voice. As the path was narrow and difficult up the ascent to where the horses and the two villains were standing, Alice and Martha followed, one after the other, until the party arrived within a single pace of the infamous ambush. Here the half-breed paused, when there was a suppressed cry, and a momentary struggle, and then all was silence! Firefly and her two fair companions were securely gagged and bound, and in a few minutes afterward, Lightfoot and Nat the Noose were riding away, they scarcely knew whither, with Firefly and Martha supported by one arm before them on their respective horses, while Sloucher, who had not been recognized by Alice, began making the best of his way with her to the gloomy retreat where Madge Gordon was awaiting her arrival, and which she was soon approaching while lying helpless and almost insensible in the powerful arms of the Fanatic, who managed to sustain her weight, and guide his peaceable and sturdy animal at the same time.

It was now eight o'clock; and Titmouse, who, as previously observed, secretly resolved to revisit the ravine for the purpose of enlightening the chief as to what had again befallen Alice, found himself in the wigwam once more. It was deserted, and hastily, as he could perceive, for there lay a bundle of furs and several articles that would have been removed, had not the chief and his party been surprised. He stood for a moment bewildered and disappointed; but as no one appeared, and as there was nothing to be gained while there might be something lost by delay, he sprang into the night once again, and soon stood at the door of old Giles the ferryman.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Orthodox Musings.

I don't want to know anything about science. Science is all about matter and force, and nothing about the soul. It tells about rocks and bugs, and all kinds of animals, from tadpoles to horses. These new-fangled scientists say that man is only a high kind of animal, that he is an improved edition of the monkey. This is all nonsense, for how could there be even a calf if there wasn't first a cow for it to suck? A calf is always preceded by a cow. That's a law of nature. Calves don't grow around on bushes. But they say that life started in a mere bag of jelly that took in food without any mouth. That's contrary to Genesis. Now, when I was young they squared science by the Bible, not the Bible by science.

But suppose life is transmogrified, where did the matter come from? There can't anything be eternal, for then it would exist without a cause, which is contrary to reason. Something can't come out of nothing, therefore God made matter. He made it so that it produces plants, bugs, and all the other things that worded folks call phenomena. Besides, suppose matter is eternal, any fool knows that it could not move unless somebody moved it.

Science is of no use unless it brings in money. In this material world we want material things. We want hundred thousand dollar churches, rich clothing and jewelry and five hundred dollar carriages to go to therein. It is true that millions of heathen are going to hell annually for want of missionaries, but, then men should go to them like the old apostles, without purse or scrip. In this land want and poverty abound, but that's an inscrutable Providence.

I am on the safe side. I enjoy the good things of this life, and by believing the Church dogmas I shall gain an eternity of spiritual joys. If I should die while digging potatoes I should go straight to heaven and be equal to the angels. I pity the poor Infidels. There's neighbor A. His mind is so obscured by the phantoms of human reason that I fear he'll be eternally lost. He does not know that he ought to be baptized; he does not know that men's souls

Rise to good with holy yeast

When soured in water by a priest.

He's a born skeptic; he can't help it, but he'll be damned if he don't believe. "Has not the potter power over the clay to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor?" That proves election. There's a text somewhere that proves free-will. True, there's a text somewhere that proves astrology, for it says, "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." But exegesis explains all difficulties. Exegesis explains one text literally, another figuratively, and where a text is too tough to agree with either, you strike an average.

A is a good man in some respects. He is very careful about the right of other people. He don't order his wife and children about in a tone of voice that would jar the sensitive nerves of a mule. But I don't believe women and children ought to have personalities. They ought to be kept in awe. Being descended from an ancestry in whom the devil was kept down by force instead of ideas, if force is removed, the devil is raised. The devil is hereditary—clear from Adam. But angels come through grace.

A believes something, but it ain't what we believe, which alone is true. He has never wronged any one, nor done anything for which the civil law can punish him, but if he dies before he is converted he must go to hell. This looks hard, but, as Mahomet said, "It is for God alone to punish man with fire."

A is sunk in vulgar materialism. Still he seems to be pure-minded; he never speaks a vulgar word, or reads it, except in the newspapers, or some parts of the Bible. I delight to saturate my mind with the criminal record. It proves natural depravity, and shows me that by the grace of God I am better than people. He seems fond of intellectual pursuits, and I can't see how he can be such a fool about theology. But the Bible and the newspapers are enough for me. In the time of the Beecher furore to read his trial in connection with those vigorous old patriarchs was extremely refreshing.

A talks of enjoying this life in a rational manner, and then going back calmly to nature from whence he came. That'll never do for me. I am John Smith, and John Smith I want to be forever. He will merge his individuality into that of all humanity. Now, if I was famous as Washington, it wouldn't do me any good if I didn't know anything about it. Jones' bacon don't do me any good when he eats it himself.

Solomon's nor Brigham Young's wives never gave me any satisfaction. I believe in salvation by proxy, but I prefer to exist as John Smith.

If A can bear to go unprepared to the judgment, he's got stronger nerves than I have. His talk about morality, and principles, and justice, won't avail him then. All the desperate wickedness of his skeptical heart will come to light then. If he does not believe the Church dogmas, nothing will save him. Can he withstand the awful vengeance? Why, how I used to quake at the awful voice of my father when he roared out, John, come here, sir! and the withy hickory produced its salutary effect on my immaterial soul. Yes, I am on the safe side. By believing I live to the glory of God, and receive eternal happiness as my reward. It is true that for every one in heaven a million or two are roasting in hell. But that won't hurt John Smith. If it don't help me when Jones eats his bacon, it won't hurt me when he gets his hide scorched. No, one, say I. "The devil take," etc. Amen. J. E. P.

Du Quoin, Ill.

"Clever Devils."

"Educate men without religion, and you only make them clever Devils."—A Christian Aphorism.

Beginning with the history of that most successful of all devils, Satan, in the Garden of Eden, where he took our great progenitor, Adam, from the hands of his Creator, an absolute moral and intellectual failure, a total idiot, and taught him knowledge like unto the gods, and reviewing all the great inventions and grand schemes for the enlightenment and happiness of mankind which have been accredited to his wonderful genius for eighteen centuries, the question may well be asked, "Who would not be a 'clever devil,' and with such devils dwell?"

According to religious authorities, contemporary with their lives, the following great men have been "possessed of devils," which the world must acknowledge have been very "clever devils" indeed: Socrates had a "just and virtuous" devil, Christ had a "meek and forgiving" devil, Spinoza had a "rationalistic" devil, Galileo had a "mechanical" and "astronomical" devil, Faust had a "printer's" devil, Milton had "Lucifer" and a "hell" devil, Harvey had a "blooded" devil, Brunel had an "engineering" devil, Stephenson had a "devil on wheels," Watt had a powerful "steam" devil, Franklin had an "electro-magnetic" devil as high as a kite, Evans had a "Orukter Amphibolos," which was the most unsightly devil that ever "materialized" on this favored planet; Fulton had a "walk-in-the-water" devil, Whitney had a "gin" devil, "with teeth like a saw," Morse had a "telegraphic" devil with a "lightning tongue," Good-year had an "India-rubber" devil, and his was the only devil on record that was actually made better by "fire and brimstone" treatment; Ericsson had an "iron-clad" devil, (so the Chaplain on the Merrimac said,) Howe had a little devil, with the "eye in the point," and General Grant had some "devilish whiskey" in the rear of Vicksburg.

To this list of personal devils there might be added a thousand more, to say nothing of that great "Devil of Progress," which the age has placed on the throne of the world's thought, and yet we find that the only utterly worthless devils in the whole catalogue have been those "possessed" by Milton and the "God-like John Calvin."

Has it not been a good thing for the world—though a poor thing for religion—that there has been so much of this "clever devilry" going on amongst men? These "Christian aphorisms" look very well in Christian almanacs, but they don't "ventilate" worth a cent. A. FORREST.

Sioux City, Iowa.

THE UNHONORED DEAD.—It is sad to think of the multitude of good and true men and women who, in the reign of superstition, now happily declining to its death, have been during their lives (if permitted to live) branded and ostracised as felons, and who, when dead, were consigned, by religious bigotry, to unknown graves, "unkept, unhonored and unsung."

Among this noble army of martyrs, there lived about forty years since in New Rochelle, N. Y., Captain Daniel Pelton, a neighbor and disciple of Thomas Paine, who, for his heretical opinions and attachment to Paine, was refused burial in the public cemetery, and whose remains were in consequence consigned to the earth in the burial ground of the Friends, where it lies without even a slab to mark the spot.

The following incident is related of him by an old resident still living there: During a very severe winter, a vessel was frozen on the sound opposite New Rochelle, about two miles from shore. The ice was not in some places thick enough to bear the weight of a man, and the crew being out of provisions, after many day's delay raised a flag of distress. No one dared venture to the rescue, the risk was so great. Finally our hero, providing himself with a plank, on which he placed some provisions, and arrived with two iron-pointed sticks, propelled himself and load over the treacherous ice, and after incredible labor and risk of the ice breaking up, reached the famished crew and saved their lives. Honor to the brave.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.
No. 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XXII.

When Moses, after forty years of wandering with the Children of Israel in the wilderness between the Red Sea and the river Jordan, (which is but a few hundred miles in distance,) and becoming aged in making a journey that could be performed in a few weeks, at length died without entering the promised land, Joshua, the son of Nun, became his successor. It seems the Lord sought an early opportunity to hold a conversation with the new general, in which he informed Joshua that Moses was dead, and that he, Joshua, must assume the leadership of the only people in the world for whom he, the Lord, had any special regard. He made munificent bequests of territory to the descendants of Abraham, and gave them the homes of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Hivites, the Perizites, the Girgashites, the Amorites and the Jebusites; "even unto the great river Euphrates and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun." He repeatedly enjoined Joshua to be strong, courageous and valorous in driving out the luckless inhabitants of the countries the Israelites were to become possessed of. It seems most clear, the Lord was extremely partial in his preference toward the Jews and favored the filibusters which Joshua led, far before those who had been born and raised in the land of Canaan.

Joshua sent out a reconnoitering party of two, to spy the city of Jericho, not far from the Jordan. They arrived there a little before nightfall, and put up at the house of a prostitute named Rahab. The officers of the king, learning of the presence of the strangers, enquired of Rahab in reference to them; but she being in the interest of the Lord, resorted to falsehood and made statements at utter variance with the truth. Before morning she let them down from her dwelling, which was on the top of the wall, so they landed outside of it. For the services thus rendered, she subsequently received great favors from Joshua.

Forty thousand of the warriors of Israel crossed the Jordan in the same remarkable manner in which forty years before their fathers had crossed the Red Sea, upon their escape from Pharaoh. The manner in which the waters of the Jordan were parted is thus described: "The waters which came down from above stood and rose upon a heap very far from the city of Adam, and those that came down toward the sea failed and were cut off; and the people passed over right against Jericho."

God's way of doing things at different times is very noticeable. Thus when Joshua with 40,000 men wished to cross the small river Jordan, God saw fit to pile the waters up in a heap, so this comparatively small army could pass over; but a few hundred years later, when Xerxes with near 2,000,000 of men wished to cross the Hellespont or the Dardanelles, a strait or arm of the sea, and probably containing one hundred times as much water as the Jordan, he did not see fit to lend his aid. But Xerxes managed it extremely well, and by a system of pontoons, constructed a bridge over which his immense army passed, thus performing one of the greatest feats of the kind the world has ever known. In our late war many of our rivers, larger than the Jordan, were successfully spanned with pontoon bridges over which our armies and their artillery and baggage easily passed. God left our generals to their own resources and they seemed to get along pretty well. It is a natural question to ask, if God does not now pile up waters to aid armies in crossing rivers, have we any reason to suppose he ever did? If he did it 4,000 years ago, why not later?

There have been many instances where armies would have been extremely glad to have had the waters thus piled up for them, but it was not done. Even our own sainted Washington, when in winter he wished to cross the Delaware, when large bodies of ice made crossing in boats extremely hazardous, would doubtless have been very glad to have the water or the ice piled up so he could pass safely; but he evidently was not the favorite Joshua was, and the Americans were not the Jews, and he had to pick his way among the huge masses of ice the best way he could. This crossing of Jordan when the waters were piled up was only effected by the 40,000 warriors; how the old men, women, children and cattle afterward got over we are not informed. Possibly the river parted again for them, or a boat or boats were constructed for them. That the warriors were passed over so that fighting and bloodshed could be taking place was, perhaps, the main necessity.

As remarkable as Joshua's style of crossing rivers appears to us in this unmiraculous age of the world, his manner of taking a walled city and throwing down its walls by blowing on rams' horns and shouting, was a feat in acoustics quite as wonderful. It seems the Lord told him just how to do it. Seven priests with seven trumpets of rams' horns for seven days to march around the doomed city, and then when they blew a long blast on their rams' horns and the people at the same time all shouted, the heavy stone walls of the city were to fall like a cob-house; and verily thus it came to pass. This story sounds a good deal like the hocus-pocus tales of the nursery, but it is in the Bible, and every one has a right to believe it who can and wishes to.

Priests have been noted for making a great noise in nearly all ages of the world, and if they have not done it by blowing rams' horns they have by blowing their own; but this is the most remarkable account of the effectiveness of their blowing that has ever been written. Those seven priests evidently were extraordinary "blow-hards." Whether the tumbling of those walls was the result of the sapping and mining which Joshua might secretly have prosecuted during the seven days of waiting; whether it really was the rams' horns that did it, or whether it ever occurred at all, every person is probably at liberty to believe, as to him seems most likely.

The mercy and kindness (?) of the Lord which are ever extended to all of his creatures, were exemplified by the manner in which the citizens of Jericho were treated. Every man, woman and child were put to death for no other offense than staying at home and minding their own business. Not one escaped except the woman of easy virtue already mentioned, and her household. God doubtless attended to it that she was not forgotten for the favors she had done the two spies.

One noticeable feature in the conduct of the soldiers at the fall of Jericho, was the carefulness with which they took charge of the gold and silver and all the valuables of the slain Jerichoites, and these were all added to "the treasury of the Lord." What an honest way of acquiring wealth, to cruelly murder the possessors and then steal their treasures and jewels! but this is the manner in which God and his chosen people worked in those days, and they were always careful after killing all the men, women and children, to gather up all the gold, silver and wealth of all kinds and carry it off. Such conduct would now be considered low and barbarous in the extreme, and would hardly be tolerated by the most savage. We must remember, however, these things, according to the Bible, were done under the immediate command and inspection of God, and however monstrous it may appear to us now, we have only to raise our hands in admiration and exclaim: holy! holy!! holy!!!

After the city was burned with fire, Joshua pronounced a curse upon any one who should ever rebuild it, but it is not known that this curse ever amounted to anything. The city was afterward rebuilt in greater splendor than ever before, and existed to the time that Vespasian visited it, when he destroyed it, many centuries after. It was subsequently rebuilt, and as a small village, by another name, it exists to this day. That cursing of Joshua was, doubtless, entirely thrown away.

There is one consolation growing out of all this, and it is that God has grown much more mild, peaceful and benignant, than he was in former times. Then he seemed to delight in partiality, cruelty and carnage more than anything else. Now he has become less warlike, less malicious, less revengeful, less destructive and more forgiving, more amiable, more unobtrusive, more fair and even-handed with all the different nations of the earth, and more inclined to not interfere unduly, or to take sides with one against another, and to let every nation manage their own affairs to suit themselves. Verily, with the many advances made in the world, in the fields of science, art and progress, it is gratifying in the extreme, to see that God also reforms and improves. In fact, in the histories of the gods of the past it is very noticeable that the character of such deities always corresponded with the peculiarity of the nations who worshiped them. The tribes who were ignorant and debased, had a coarse, crude god. Barbarous and warlike nations had gods that were great for battles, butchery and bloodshed. Nations more advanced in the intelligent scale, created or took unto themselves a god that partook of such intelligence. The Jews were no exception to this rule. They were a barbarous, marauding, quarrelsome, aggressive, warlike people, and it is not strange their God should also partake of their characteristics. Possibly the day may come when all those murders and abhorrent traits which the Bible wrongfully attributes to Deity, will be accorded to unprogressed mankind, where they doubtless belong, when the Supreme Power of the Universe will not be believed to be such a cruel, vindictive being as the Bible represents him.

Visit to Dr. H. Slade.

There have recently appeared in the Herald and other papers, some accounts unfavorable to this gentleman, as a medium, and though we have lived in this city some fifteen months without calling upon him, we decided a few days ago, to pay a visit at his residence on Twenty-first street, and see for ourselves the nature of the manifestations which occur in his presence. It is not unknown to many of our friends that we are rather materialistic, and not a very strong believer in the endless existence of beings who had a beginning only fifty or seventy-five years ago. We, nevertheless, have a "warm side" for our Spiritualistic friends, believing they have done much towards breaking down the walls of superstition and bigotry which have so long encircled mankind, and we really hope their theory of the continued existence of the human race is true. Albeit, we think we are able to give an unprejudiced and truthful statement of what we witnessed at Dr. Slade's.

We met there, by appointment, a friend, and after a few minutes' conversation with the Doctor, we entered his back parlor, some twenty feet square, and lighted by two large windows. Near the centre of the room was a good sized walnut breakfast-table. We examined it closely, and found no machinery nor wires about it. With the leaves opened, its surface is some five by five and a half feet square. This is the table at which the Doctor and his visitors sit. We at once took our positions, Dr. Slade on our left and our friend on our right, occupying a side each. The Doctor sat near our corner, and somewhat sideways, with his feet toward us and in our sight. When he had them under the table, our feet were placed upon his, so that we might be assured he was not using them.

We each placed our hands in the centre part of the table, and touching each other. Within a minute a sensation somewhat similar to a current of magnetism from a magnetic machine was perceptible; light and heavy raps occurred, apparently on the under side of the table, some of them were so heavy as to visibly jar it. In response to questions, raps were promptly given, indicating yes or no, in answer to questions.

Dr. Slade handed us an ordinary slate; we examined it closely, and found it clean, and without any writing on it, and we held it under the table, firmly up to the leaf, no hand touching it but our own, and a sound like writing with a pencil was distinctly heard. Upon looking at it, a few lines of writing were plainly visible. This was repeated two or three times, and at no time when writing on the slate occurred, did Dr. Slade touch it at all. On one occasion it lay on the table, three feet from either of us, but plainly in our sight, and we heard the pencil writing as before. Upon reading the message, it was in reference to ourselves, saying several of our friends were present and would be pleased to communicate with us if we would call another day. As the slate was held under the table by myself it was nearly wrenched from our grasp by a force we could not see. Once it was taken from our hands and it immediately appeared on the opposite side of the table, where no one was sitting, and stood in the air in a perpendicular position and disconnected with anything, and at least five feet from us, after which it returned under the table to our hands.

An accordeon was handed us. It was not unlike an ordinary instrument of the kind. We held the lower part with one hand, and some invisible force pulled the other part, it seemed to us with a force of five or ten pounds; the keys were manipulated, and music from it was discoursed, with no hand touching it but our own, and that not within several inches of the keys. A popular air was played—we cannot play a tune ourselves were we to use both hands.

We frequently felt gentle but distinct tappings upon our knees and other parts, once our coat was forcibly pulled, and twice the chair in which we sat was pulled suddenly back from the table and turned nearly quarter around by an unseen force. An easy chair several feet from the table and from us, was suddenly moved around, and a centre-table, with marble top, standing apart by itself, wheeled around in a curious manner.

We then placed our hands upon the table again, and it raised immediately twelve inches from the floor, remaining thus suspended some seconds. It next tipped toward us, and while all our hands were still upon it, it continued tipping until exactly bottom upwards, the legs pointing up, after which it returned to its position without our aid or dropping to the floor. The table is rather heavy, and this operation seemed rather curious. We know not what force produced the results we have mentioned. We say not that it was spirits, or that it was not. It may have been odic force or od force for ought we know, and that it seemed decidedly odd to us, we will not deny. This, we assert, it was in daytime, the room was light, we saw or touched the Doctor's hands and feet all the while, and we are sure no trickery was used in our presence. We think of paying another visit to Dr. Slade when we can spare the time.

Christianity Examined.

NO. VI.

The desultory remarks we have made upon this subject up to this time, cover but a small portion of the ground we propose to occupy, but as it has perhaps been indifferently said, we will for a few moments review the ground thus gone over. We have seen, first, that there have been very few original religions or systems of faith in the world. One creed has evolved from another, or patterned after it, sometimes being improved by the change, and sometimes not. In primitive times, when man occupied a much lower mental grade than now, his religion was in keeping, his views were crude, his God was a monster, and his worship fetichism. As he advanced in civilization, his religious views advanced also. We said Christianity offered no exception to this rule. We find while it is claimed by its devotees that it is superior to all other systems of religion that have preceded it, that it is not new in any particular.

We have said, and assert again, that every dogma in its list of dogmas has been borrowed from systems that existed in the world long before it did. Its whole story of the miraculous conception and birth of its reputed founder, the events of his life, his teachings, his conduct toward his direct followers, the manner of his death are all so completely plagiarisms of religions and creeds thousands of years older, that the most fair conclusion that can be arrived at is, that the reputed founder of Christianity—Jesus Christ—was a myth, and never had an existence save in the imaginations of his deluded followers, or, that if such a man as Jesus did live he was begotten just as other persons are, and possessed the same amount of divinity that every human being does. The tale is such a complete copy of the story of the heathen god of India, Krishna, Christna, or Jezeus Christna as the name is differently rendered, who was half God and half man—that several nations prior to Christianity borrowed the same fable from India. These facts, we say, coupled with the entire lack of proof that there ever lived such a person as Jesus of Nazareth, begotten without a natural father, that it becomes us as honest enquirers, to examine the subject closely, and be sure we have due grounds for such belief before we yield implicit assent to its demands.

The accepted account of the origin of Christianity is either true or it is not. Jesus Christ was an original character or simply a revision of his prototype—the Hindoo savior. It is strictly right every person should look closely into this subject, and be sure he is founding his belief upon the truth. If the story Christians are insisting upon is true, we want to know it. On the other hand, if it is false and untenable it is quite time we are apprised of it, and that the delusion under which Christendom is laboring is made apparent. We wish not to shock any honest, sincere person, but the truth is what we are seeking, and we shall continue the search and to give utterance to our convictions as we progress onward.

Nothing is more susceptible of proof than the fact that India is the great source from whence the whole world has obtained its religious and theological dogmas. The Sanskrit is the oldest human language known to man. It went out of use more than two thousand years ago, and consequently before the dawn of the Christian religion; but by authors of the highest respectability, both Christian and Infidel, and who by the learned men of the day are regarded truthful and reliable in the first degree, assure us in that language is found written, not only the whole story of Jesus Christ, but the foundation for an important portion of the Jewish Scriptures. They demonstrate positively that the writings possess an antiquity greater than the Old Testament and consequently far greater than the New.

Sir William Jones, an English Christian scholar, spent many years in India pouring over the voluminous literature of that ancient country, and he positively asserts that their mythology contains a character closely resembling the Christian semi-deity in all the essential particulars, and that this doctrine was taught a thousand years before the story of Jesus Christ had an existence. Max Muller, probably the most learned Sanskrit scholar now alive, has been for several years delving in the lore of the olden world, and he bears testimony extremely similar. Jacolliot, the learned French author, has given years of study in the same direction, and has written elaborately upon the subject. We will make here a few quotations from this author:

"India is the world's cradle; thence it is that the common mother, in sending forth her children, even to the utmost West, has, in unfading testimony of our origin, bequeathed us the legacy of her language, her laws, her morale, her literature and her religion.

"Science now admits, as a truth needing no further demonstration, that all the idioms of antiquity were derived from the far East; and thanks to the labors of Indian philologists, our modern languages have there found their derivation and their roots.

"Having exhibited conspicuously the influence of ancient India on all the societies of antiquity, proven the moral, philosophic, historic and religious traditions of Persia, of Egypt, of Judea, of Greece, and of Rome, to have been drawn from that great primitive fountain, exposed the work of Moses as derived from the sacred books of Egypt and of the extreme East, we shall now see Christ and his apostles recover, whether from Asia or from Egypt, the primitive traditions of the Vedas, the morale and teachings of Christna, and, with the aid of those sublime and pure principles, attempt regeneration of the ancient world which was everywhere crumbling under decrepitude and corruption.

"We have recounted simply and faithfully the Hindoo Genesis, the conception of the Virgin, the life and death of the redeemer Christna, reserving, as far as possible, all reflections and all commentary.

"Christna appears, proclaims himself the promised Redeemer, the offspring of God, and the entire of India recognizes and worships him as such."

In giving in detail the Indian mythology Jacolliot continues thus:

"The Hindoo's Redeemer, son of Devanaguy, is named Christna, and later his disciple decreed him the title of Jezeus.

"The son of Mary, the Christian Redeemer, is named Jesus, or rather Jeosuah—and later his disciples gave him the title of Christ!

"The two mothers of the Redeemers conceive by divine intervention, and remain virgin, maugre their maternity. To which assign priority? To which the reproach of imitation? To ask the question is to answer it. Devanaguy and Christna preceded Mary and Christ at least three thousand years; the antique civilization of India resulted from that incarnation; all sacred books, all works of philosophy, morale, history and poetry, have made it a point of honor to rest upon it. To suppress Christna, would be to suppress ancient India.

"The tradition of the Virgin-Mother, brought from India is common to the whole of the East—in Birmah, China and Japan—the apostles have but recovered and applied it to their doctrine."

We will not quote farther from this author at this time, though we might go on almost indefinitely. We will give a simple quotation from Rev. Father Dubois, for thirty years a Christian missionary in India, and noted alike, for his purity and intelligence.

"Justice, humanity, good faith, compassion, disinterestedness; in fact, all the virtues were familiar to them, and taught by them to others, both by precept and example; hence the Hindoos profess, speculatively at least, nearly the same principles of morality as ourselves."

There can hardly be a doubt of the "second-hand" character of the Christian mythology when it is so thoroughly demonstrated that the same incidents, the same characteristics and the same essential details were taught in the East thousands of years earlier than its birth. There is no room for a question as to which is the original and which the copy.

To show that Christian authorities even, were in doubt about the authenticity of their system, we will, in our next, quote from the early Christian Fathers upon the subject.

Our Delinquent Readers.

When we commenced the second volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we deemed it best to continue sending the paper "right along," hoping our friends would promptly renew, as they found their time had expired. To encourage this, we have made several appeals to our friends, and have endeavored to explain our necessities. Many responded promptly, while numerous others have, even until the present, failed to respond. Many thanked us for continuing their papers, and others thought we ought to stop when their time had expired. We have repeatedly asked such of our readers as did not wish to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER to either inform us by postal card or get their postmaster to do so for them, but many hundreds still—though the second volume is more than half expired—have neither remitted for it, nor notified us they wished the paper discontinued.

We have recently sent notices by mail to such persons as are in arrears, requesting them to send the price of the second volume, $1.75, or at least for the half that has been sent them, and to notify us if they wished the paper stopped. We are sorry to say these notices have received far less attention than they should. We hardly know what to make of a portion of our readers. We are loth to believe we ought to publish the paper and send it to them, post-paid, for nothing. If they think it is just and equitable that we should do so, they view the matter differently from ourselves. They are such curiosities that we seriously think of publishing their names, and if they deem their course strictly honorable and right, they cannot complain if we do so.

We have made considerable sacrifice to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a success, and have toiled almost unremittently in that direction, and if those whose names are on our list feel willing to contribute their small share—the price of the paper—there will be no doubt of its success. We will be glad to continue sending the paper to all who have heretofore received it, but we cannot longer do so unless it is paid for. We are not able to publish it and send it, post-paid, without pay. There are numbers we shall be compelled to cross off, unless we hear from them soon; and if they still refuse to pay for the thirteen numbers of the

(Cont. next on page 8.)

The Jews and their God.

BY ISAAC PADEN.

CHAPTER V.—CONTINUED.

The whole end and aim of the Jewish God, (a spiritual personage, as we have no doubt he was), was to create and get to himself a great name among the nations and their gods. This accounts for his jealousy, as he had many to compete with, and thus every Jew, that would not acknowledge him to be greater than all other gods, was put to death. I will here say, he has got bravely over his jealousy, or lost his power, or lacks executioners. Yet there are many priests who would now do it, but they lack the power. Whom shall we thank for these priceless blessings, the Jewish God or the Jewish Devil? I propose thanks to the god of progression for the religious liberty we now enjoy. It is said, God told Moses he could not see his face (he must have been making believe as he did to Abraham, when he commanded him to kill his son, when he did not intend to have him do it, which proves he did not know the confidence Abraham had in him until after the experiment. He was then satisfied and said so) as Moses had before that, talked face to face with him, and so had others.

But our Christian friends claim he was now in a halo of glory. We are ready to admit this, but what does it prove? He was only in the same condition in which Moses himself appeared in company with the prophet Elias (Elijah) on the Mount, a thousand years after their decease, which proves the spirit of this heathen king could assume a glorious body, the same as Moses and Elias. The assuming of this glorious body, seen by Moses, did not make a god of him, any more than did Moses and Elias. As to what he said to Moses, it only showed the position he claimed.

We now pass over many facts recorded, co-operating with our views, proving the Jewish God to be none other than the living spirit of a heathen monarch, as can be seen in the offerings of animals as sacrifices, commanded by him, with their dung, their entrails or inwards, their galls, cauls, livers, shoulders and blood; pigeons, turtles, doves, bulls and heifers, (can a heifer represent the same sacrifice as is claimed for a he-goat) rams, lambs, oxen and sheep; all these go to show he was of heathen origin, and delighted in the shedding of blood, uncivilized and savage in all his requirements. Our position is sustained on almost every page of the Bible. Dear reader, if you have never realized the silly rites and ceremonies of the heathens and savage nations, in their zeal and religious exercises, just read Leviticus, or the twelfth chapter, if no more; "A woman having a child born, a sin-offering was required, and this heathenish idea was held sacred even at the birth of Jesus, who is claimed to be God in human flesh; yet it was a sin for his mother to be delivered, and an offering of a pair of turtledoves or two young pigeons was required to satisfy the law of this Jewish God.

As for the conception, birth, and all things pertaining to Jesus' nativity, without doubt, it was managed by angels or spirits, but God, as a person, is denied in the New Testament—see Tim. vi. 16. But the spiritual personages spoken of are in perfect keeping with our position from the beginning—an angel proper is a spiritual personage. Moses and Elias, when seen on the Mount, were angels in a full sense. The Holy Ghost is a spirit. Your dictionary will tell you a ghost is a dead man's spirit, and these spirits vary in character, in the same proportion as when in the flesh. This accounts why so many of the Jewish prophets were deceived, believing as they did, they supposed it was God that deceived them, and it was their God that did it; but who having common sense, can believe the God of the Universe uses deception; but as the Jewish God claimed the exclusive right of communicating, the prophets were justified in charging him as they did, and of being the author of evil, acting direct in all the domestic affairs of life. If there was evil in the city, it was their God that did it. If a prophet was deceived, it was his God that deceived him. If they prophesied lies, it was their God that put lies into their mouth.

If a man at any time was influenced by a good spirit, and on the morrow by a vicious and revengeful spirit, it was said of him, an evil spirit of God troubled him. And should a prophet's vision or sight be such as to enable him to see spirits, and should in open vision see them in council, having an object in view, he would suppose the chief spirit or the one who conducted the council was God. Thus the prophet Micah says, "I saw the Lord (God) sitting on his throne, and all the host of heaven (perhaps one hundred) on his right hand and on his left (which council was and is a common thing). The object of concourse of spirits being made known by the chief, one said on this manner, another on that, (each one made his proposition) and there came forth a spirit and made his, (the fact was, they were all spirits, and could talk, and did counsel together, and the Lord (the chief) being satisfied with the plan proposed by this one, commissioned him to execute it. Thus the prophet exclaims after seeing what he did, "Now therefore, behold the Lord (Israel's God) hath put a lying spirit in the mouths of all these prophets. We have called the reader's attention to a few facts recorded by the Jews. We think enough to satisfy a reasonable mind, one free from religious prejudice, that our position is fully sustained. It is an undeniable fact, that the actions of the person claimed by Moses to be his god, and the council seen by Maah, and the actions of angels in general, fully corresponded with the low, savage, and revengeful condition of man at that day, which in fact, sets the question at rest, that our position accords with the facts in the case.

CHAPTER VI.

We now propose to look after spiritual mediums, and the present condition of man, as well as the former, which shows man in his earthly career, has been traveling on the path of progression, the same as an individual, from conception to embryo, infancy and childhood to youth, and is now becoming as it were twenty-one, a proper age to do our own individual thinking, living as we are upon a plane of eternal progression. This present period was faintly seen by many who mediumistically saw our day, and rejoiced that religious freedom, as well as political, would be tolerated, and every man be permitted to sit under his own fig-tree [in his own house] and none should make him afraid, and be permitted to worship him who is spirit power, and the life of all existing things, and do it in spirit and truth; and this beautiful theory will increase till it covers the whole earth, thereby uniting and binding together all nations in love for one Father and one universal brotherhood, and learn war no more. This is the age of man we are now entering; and it was seen by many (mediums) out from under a dark cloud of despair, when dens and caves in the earth were the only places of safety from the savage disposition once the ruling power over man, when ignorance and the God of the Jews ruled the nations. But, thanks be to the god of progression, love and humanity, brotherly kindness will in time supersede the present religious superstition, which claims that moral goodness is inferior and worthless in the absence of Church membership.

We find their gods were of the same disposition, character and temperament as the people, and it could not be otherwise; a savage people always had a savage God, and all spiritual communications were the same, while the present communications are now more or less seasoned with universal love and brotherly kindness, similar to the greetings of the heavenly hosts at the birth of Jesus, yet more mild. Hell fire, and endless damnation, and the surging billows of a lake burning with fire and brimstone are not now the teachings from the spirit world, and it is a fact this doctrine is not heard from the pulpit, as was fifty years ago; it was then the hue and cry from the tall steeples to the shanty. I will venture to say at this day and age, a man cannot be found on earth (a lunatic or savage excepted) that he having the power to save or destroy in endless misery, would do the latter, independent of ancient precepts and examples. Let every man test this question by divesting himself of religious prejudice and pass judgment in the case. Therefore, looking back upon the past life of man, under our present developed condition, we are not justified in condemning our forefathers and their God, neither are we justified in worshipping the same God. In fact, there is no such a god now in existence; such a god as the Jews worshiped is inconsistent, and must have been more or less imaginary, and will pass away like all other heathen gods.

As for mediums, they are a class of men and women designated and known as prophets, seers, revelators and men of God in past ages, female included. All of these, both male and female, who acknowledged the authority of the priesthood and the divine right of kings, were more or less connected with in all important matters, but should any speak against those in authority, they were punished with death as blasphemers and seditious. For it was written in the law of the Lord, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of my people." What tyranny! Yet there were a few whose development and mediumistic powers were sufficient to sustain and protect themselves by spirit power, as Elijah did when he destroyed the fifties sent to him by the king, and others of the same development and power. Jesus had this same power, and could have protected himself the same way, but refused to exercise it, choosing rather to suffer, than to revenge himself upon his enemies. There were others who did not acknowledge the Pharisee's order. These were looked upon as outcasts, and were held under condemnation, and by the priest, called neromancers, witches, wizards that peep, and those having familiar spirits, such as the woman of Endor.

Taking a retrospective view of the ancient mediums in all their grades of development, we naturally conclude, if we were in possession of all that was said and done by them, it would not add to the credit or respectability of that which is recorded. In addition to the foregoing, many of the prophets, rulers and priests, of Israel were bribed and hired to lie, while others were honest, yet directed by lying spirits, and charged to their God, though he may have been innocent. Others acting under the influence of wine and strong drink; upon the whole things were badly mixed up at times. Those who were bribed and those who acted under the influence of wine or any other spirit, except himself, were condemned. We also call the reader's attention to the mediums of other nations, all having mediums and their gods, from whom the people received communications, whose powers were equal to the power of the Jewish mediums, and about the same with their gods, which gave rise to jealousy. Balaam was a heathen medium, whose powers were not surpassed by any of the Jewish prophets, and to his credit he could not be bribed. As for the Gentiles as a race of people they were more honest than the Jews. As for priests, prophet, seers, revelators and mediums, they were all similar. They were all religious and devotional. The Jews, as to immortality, had no preference—Moses not being a teacher of immortality, it not being congenial to the position he held. Therefore, in a manner, they were disbelievers in man's immortality (see Josephus' Wars of the Jews, Book 7, chapter 8, ph. 7).

Then Jesus came, who was a teacher of immortality, and through his teaching it was brought to light, but the Jewish priests claimed he was in league with the Devil, the same as the priests now say of spiritual mediums. Socrates was a medium, and talked with spirits; Confucius was one, and taught the principle involved in the "Golden Rule." Plato was a medium, and talked with spirits. It is in perfect keeping with my position for the followers of Jesus, who believe in him to hold him as their god, and offer prayers and worship to him as such. The Catholic offers prayers not only to him, but to Mary his mother and other saints, and it is consistent with past ages.

Swedenborg was a medium, and an honorable, truth-telling man, and we give credit to his statements, not claiming for him nor any others infallibility. Perfection in its full sense lies far above man's first sphere in spirit life. Judge Edmonds, of New York, whose character was unimpeachable, saw and conversed with the spirits of the dead, recognizing them. There are now in the United States about 9,000,000, besides a vast number in other countries, who are convinced of the fact of an intercourse between earth and spirit life, and of this class of thinkers are mediums. But here is a wide difference between the Jewish mediums and those of our day, and it is worthy of notice. The Jewish mediums, when once deceived, accused their God of deceiving them, and of putting lying spirits into their mouths, and that evil spirits from their God troubled them, and if evil was done in the city, the Lord did it. Not so with our mediums. They have a higher and more exalted opinion of a god of justice and the father of mankind. They discard the idea of such a god. How do our present mediums stand in the estimation of those who hold the present priesthood? They are held and looked upon as the Jewish priests looked upon the class of mediums to whom Jesus and the woman of Endor belonged, and those who suffered death and banishment at their hands, from Abel to Jesus, whom they nailed to the cross. Comment is not needed on this point. Yet it is a well-known fact, many of our present priests, had they the power, would willingly do honor to the Jewish God by executing his wrath upon spiritual heretics (mediums). [TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Devil Still Ahead!

BY JOHN SYPHERS.

According to the teachings of old, rotten theology, there are at least two gods in this great Universe. They are represented as being of about equal power. It is true they call one of them "the Devil," but it makes no difference what they call him; their own history of him shows that he is a being of as much power, and even greater in some things than his opponent, and much better success attends many of his operations. If God is God, then the Devil is God too. No one can do what they say he has done, and is still doing, unless he be possessed of goddish attributes and powers. They say these two gods are at war with each other—perfectly antagonistic in all their operations. When one says yes the other says no. When one pulls up the other pulls down; but the downward pull seems to be the long pull, the strong pull, the pull all together, and takes the crowd.

The upward-pulling God, although all-powerful, finds it an up-hill business, and the consequence is that his gospel net is taking, and has taken but very few fish from the great ocean of humanity, and those generally of a very small fry! One of these Deities they call God, the other the Devil, but both they say are real persons. Both great, big masculines, but not supposed to have any wives. One of these Deities they say has had children, at least an only begotten son, and this said son often spoke of his brothers and sisters, which leads one to infer that this god-family embraced quite a number of persons.

But Mr. Deity No. 2 had something of a family too, that is, if a certain ancient writer is to be believed, for I remember that he on one occasion, when he wished to spit a little fire and be unusually severe on his enemies, said to them, "You are of your father, the Devil, and his works will ye do." But then there is no ancient or even modern writer who has ever affirmed that this creature of orthodoxy, the Devil, was ever engaged in the regular, natural, old-fashioned, begetting business! His children, according to the heathen writer mentioned above, are only his because they work for him. "His works will ye do," etc. But if God never had any wife, how could he have an only begotten son? The only reasonable, natural conclusion must be that he used somebody else's wife. Born out of wedlock, 'tis monstrous, oh 'tis monstrous; what an example! But the idea of big masculines, without any feminines—only think what an anomaly in nature.

They say that one of these gods is very good, while the other is very bad, and that one is very black, while the other is very white. Theology represents these two great antagonistic gods as having set out on a very long race many thousand years ago. The prize for which they run is the human race, a race for the human race. The thing is laughable. Theology also demonstrates that in this race the Devil is still ahead! It is now demonstrated by a little close figuring, that if theology be true, the Devil will get, and has already got, about nine out of ten of the entire human family. Rather a losing game that, and to be played too by an Almighty player on the losing side. He had better invest his almighty power and material used in making men and women in something else than to make them, and then have them gobbled up by a cunning Devil, who invariably beats him at his own game. It don't pay. If God represents good, and the Devil represents evil, then the great question before the world is to tell why it is that good is so continually outstripped by evil, especially when everybody knows that good is the most powerful principle of the two.

Why don't the Lord exchange positions with the Devil, and get the down-hill side of the question himself? If he is as all-wise and all-powerful as he is represented, why does he let the Devil outwit him and get the advantage of him in every case? Why did he not have the advantage of the broad, smooth and down-grade road for his followers at the start, and not have his friends going around through this world all the while singing the doleful songs, "How tedious and tasteless the hours," "Jordan is a hard road to travel," and that "Sweet prospects, sweet birds and sweet flowers, have lost all their sweetness," etc.

Why should this be the condition of the special favorites of an Almighty? If God is all-mighty, of course he could have had everything his own way. If he has not, there is nobody to blame but himself. Why does he allow himself to be thus beaten in everything, even on grades, and per consequence lose ninety per cent of the whole human family, all of whom naturally belong to him by the rite of creation? Why build so great a house of many mansions in the heavens, and then be cheated out of men and women to occupy them? But why ask questions? I could ask ten thousand right here, not one of which old theology could answer to the satisfaction even of a man possessing only an ounce of brains. Such doctrines are ridiculous. They are awful. They are old reminders of heathenism. How humiliating and derogatory to the character of the great God to thus suffer himself to be beaten at his own game by a subordinate being of his own creating. How very like a God!

But O! methinks I now see how this matter all is. I have discovered the key that unlocks the whole mystery. God is sick. If not so, why do they have so many Doctors of Divinity? The D.D.'s have been at work on their patient for thousands of years, and still he is neither healthy nor happy. No being can be happy while he is angry, and God's doctors say that he is angry with the wicked every day. I pity him, or any other being in a like state of mind. But the god-doctors are too much divided among themselves to accomplish anything. They represent too many schools of medicine. They have too many plans of salvation. Methodists feel certain that God is a Methodist and the author of the Methodist plan of salvation; Presbyterians are just as certain that their peculiar plan is God-given; Catholics think the same of theirs.

These are the old regular allopaths in religion, and believe in giving strong medicine, and lots of it. They administer to sinners tremendous doses of hell fire and damnation.

Universalists and Unitarians are Homœopaths. They use small pills, sugar-coated.

The Campbellites and Baptists are Hydropaths, and believe in sacred hydraulics and hydropathic salvation, using rivers of water, applied externally. But if Deity is not sick, his affairs on earth are. He has got things into a pretty pickle by entrusting them to the hands of those different orders of priests. His kingdom, which should be a unit, is all cut up into sectarian factions, rival institutions, presenting the finest specimen of a house divided against itself that the world ever saw. The kingdom of the Lord is now fearfully demoralized, and sadly needs reconstructing. He must either come himself, or send another only begotten son, clothed with full powers, as minister plenipotentiary direct from the High Court of Heaven. His present corps of ministers (carpet-baggers) have made merchandise of his gospel, and think only of ways and means whereby they may be able to filch substance out of the people.

This demoralized condition of affairs pertaining to the Lord's kingdom, has brought his religion into general disrepute with all the thinking, progressive minds of the age, giving the Devil all the best minds—the very flower of the intellect of Christendom, leaving all the imbeciles and fools for the Lord.

What a singular mystery this great system of theology is, anyhow! What great effects, without any natural, appropriate cause! Nature teaches us that all effects must have natural causes sufficient to produce them. This is reason and philosophy. It follows, then, that the great systems of theology now in existence, being founded on no natural principles whatever, are purely imaginary and superlatively bogus. Now what is the cause of this great loss of so large a per cent of the whole human family? Analyze the whole bogus system down to first principles, and we will easily discover that it all resolves itself into this silly story, laughable as it is. That Adam and Eve made a slight mistake in a garden, and ate a few apples from off the wrong tree. A certain walking, talking serpent persuaded them to just nibble a little, if nothing more, at that forbidden fruit, whose mortal taste brought death into our world, with all our woe. A religion that has nothing better to present to the thinking, reasoning mind of this Nineteenth Century, should not be astonished that the whole world is fast running into Infidelity. Our present theological systems, based as they are upon the ignorant, superstitious stories of a dark and by-gone age, are a disgrace to the present light, knowledge and intellect of the age. The sectarian Infidelity of the churches is the meanest Infidelity that was ever born from the great kingdom of darkness. The only hope of the world is now centered in the success of the new dispensation, now being ushered in, full of science, light, progress and spiritual salvation.

Woman's Rights in the Ancient Roman Senate.

BY JOHN ALBERGER.

No just person can deny woman her rights; no generous person will refuse to accord and vindicate them. The only question which may embarrass a just and generous personage is, what are her rights? This problem once solved to his satisfaction, he would be more likely to err in exceeding them than diminishing them; and feel prompted, in proportion to her weakness, to commit this magnanimous fault. But should a barbarous and antiquated superstition so far degrade and obdurate the public mind, as to induce it to withhold what should be accorded woman unasked, then common justice requires that she should be invested with all the political power necessary for their acquisition and vindication. My object is not to examine the question, but simply to submit to your readers a discussion which occurred in the Roman Senate under the reign of Tiberius, at the time it is alleged Christ was on earth, elicited by a motion made by Cæcilius Servus, forbidding governors of provinces in future to be accompanied by their wives. The discussion is recorded in Tacitus' Annals, Book III, Tet. XXXIII, XXXIV, XXXV. It is interesting as it shows the status of woman in the Roman Pagan world at that period.

In support of his motion, Cæcilius said: "It is with good reason, that in former times, women were neither allowed to visit the allies of Rome, nor to have any intercourse with foreign nations. The softer sex brought many inconveniences; in time of peace they were prone to luxury; and in war, easily alarmed. A female train, in the march of a Roman army, presented an image of savage manners; it had the appearance of barbarians going to battle.

That women are by nature feeble, and soon overcome by hardships, was not the only objection: other qualities entered into the female character; such as pride, revenge, cruelty and ambition. The love of power is the predominant passion of the sex, and in the exercise of it they know no bounds. They appear in the ranks; they march with the troops; they rule the centurion of their party. We have seen, in a late instance, a woman reviewing the cohorts, and directing the exercise of the cegeons. Have we forgot, that as often as rapacity and extortion have been laid to the charge of the husband, the wife has proved the principal offender? She no sooner enters the province than her party is formed. The unprincipled attend to pay her homage. She becomes a politician; she takes the lead in business, and gives a separate audience. The husband and wife appear in public with their distinct train of attendants. The tribunals are established, and the female edict, dictated by caprice and tyranny, is sure to be obeyed. By the Oppian and other laws, the wife was formerly restrained within due bounds; at present all decorum is laid aside; women give the law in families; they preside in the tribunal of justice, and aspire to be commander-in-chief."

To this speech, Valerius Messatinus, an orator of no inconsiderable eloquence, replied: "The rigor of ancient manners has taken a milder tone. The enemy is not at the gates of Rome, and the provinces have no hostile intentions. In favor of the tender sex some concession ought to be made, since it is now known by experience that the wife, so far from being a burden to the province, is scarcely felt in the private economy of the husband. She is no more than a sharer in his splendor and dignity. In time of peace what danger from her presence? War, indeed, calls for vigor; and men should go unencumbered to the field. When the campaign is over, where can the general so well repose from toil and labor as in the bosom of his wife, whose tenderness relieves his pain, and sweetens every care? But women, it has been said, are prone to avarice and ambition; but what shall be said of the magistrates? Have they always been free from irregular passions? and if not, will it follow that men are no longer to be trusted with the administration of the provinces? We are told that the vices of the wife have their influence on the manners of the husband; and it is therefore true, in a life of celibacy we are sure to find a life of unblemished honor?

"The Oppian laws were formerly deemed expedient; the policy of the times required them; but the manners have varied since, and with the manners the law has been modified. We strive in vain, under borrowed terms to hide our own defects. The truth is, if the wife exceeds the bounds of the female character, the blame falls on her husband. In two or three instances we may have seen that the men were weak and too luxurious; and shall we for that reason take from the commander of armies the most endearing comforts of marriage, the mutual joy in prosperity, and in affliction, the balm that heals his sorrows? By the restraint now proposed, the weaker sex will be left in a state of destitution, the sport of their own caprice, and a prey to the passions of the profligate seducer. The presence of the husband is scarce sufficient to guard the sanctity of the marriage bed; what must be the consequence if they are separated, and as it were, divorced for a number of years? In that interval, the nuptial union may be obliterated from the mind. Let us, if we can, prevent disorders in the provinces; but let us not forget the manners of the capital."

Drusus followed in the same strain. A few consented to the proposition of Cæcilius, but in consequence of the arguments of the opponents, it fell to the ground by an overwhelming defeat.

Woman and the Church.

It is frequently thrown out by Liberals, and with reason, that women are the chief supporters of the Church. It is said, and justly, that they are, generally speaking, the bitter denouncers of Free Thought and liberality of religious sentiment. Every now and then we hear of some woman who violently opposes the reading of the Investigator by her husband, because it is an "Infidel paper." A Christian woman not long ago, told me, with much bitterness, that said paper was "rank poison." In her opinion THE TRUTH SEEKER would be regarded no better.

But who is to blame for this sad state of things? Surely the subject is worthy of investigation. It is a palpable fact that woman has never been permitted to enjoy a very wide range of thought upon any subject whatever. For ages she has been driven in a certain groove, and taught that outside of that limited space for her were only disgrace and dishonor. She accepted man as her teacher, guide, controller and protector, and most shamefully and to his discredit has he abused the position he assumed. A "strong-minded woman" was the special abhorrence of man, and an object shunned by her own sex. Man demanded woman as a plaything for his leisure hours, a household drudge, a nurse for his children. The supply has been equal to the demand. Shut out from everything else but the house of her husband and the "house of God," it is any wonder that woman has lived, and so lives to-day, almost entirely in her affectional and devotional nature?

This was the boundary of her world, the extent of her latitude, according to her teachers, her minister and male relations. She was taught that she must be silent, and only those having a woman's tongue may know the full meaning of that word. Subjection has been the great lesson of her life, engrafted in her nature before she was born. Hence the great faculties of her being, that she possesses equally with man, have, from disuse, become dulled and morbid, and ceased to run into the broad channels of life and thought. She is not to blame. She is not to blame. She could not help it. She has been educated to believe that she has no part nor lot in the business affairs of the world; that the original woman was only a miserable bone abstracted from the anatomy of man, whose first business was to get her lord and master into trouble, in which his descendants have been wallowing ever since; and to try to remove the curse imposed, woman meekly accepted a subordinate position in the Church.

To remedy the effects of long years of false teaching, let woman have the benefit of the true. Give her a chance to unfold and develop the noble principles of her nature that are not dead, only dormant. Make her an independent citizen in reality; let her choose freely her own work in any department, and give her a chance to do the best she can. Permit her to think for herself. Make her free and equal before the law. Show her that she is expected to be familiar with the live issues of the day, and she will not disappoint your expectations. Let her understand that the fossil teachings of St. Paul, in regard to woman, are behind the age, and tinctured with a cynical old-bachelordom foreign to our time and institutions. Let her have an interest in the body politic, as well as the body religious, and see how quickly she will outgrow the falsities of the past. Man has made the mischief in bending woman to himself and the Church, let him be quick to undo it.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Full River, Mass., Feb., 1875.

second volume we have issued, and they received, we hope they will not complain if we feel impelled to publish their names.

The notices we have sent out in some instances have inadvertently been directed to subscribers who have already renewed for the second volume. We beg pardon of such. We do not wish to dun those who have already paid. We are content to collect once, and don't mean to ask any one to pay the second time.

Hoping the great bulk of our delinquent readers will decide to continue on with us, and promptly send in the sum of $1.75 for the year, we will for the present subside.

Renewed Offers.

We are anxious to extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER so far as possible, and are disposed to give all the encouragement we can to the movement.

For $1.75 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER post-paid for one year, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For $2 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles," and either of the following works: "Lamb's Essays of Elia," Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," "Sentimental Journal," "Colleen Bawn," "Robinson Crusoe," "Gulliver's Travels," "Arabian Nights," "Burns' Poems," "Moore's Poems," "Milton's Poems," "Vicar of Wakefield," "Bell-ringer of Notre Dame," "Scottish Chiefs," or either of Marryat's Novels.

For $2.25 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Riddles," and Byron's complete works.

For $2.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, "Blakeman's Riddles," Shakespeare's complete works, and either of the works named in the paragraph above.

For $2.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," paper.

For $3.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," cloth.

For $3.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, Shakespeare's, Byron's, Goldsmith's and Milton's complete works.

For $3.00 THE TRUTH SEEKER and a set of Roger's best silver-plated Tea-spoons, which retail at $3.50.

For $3.75 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and a set of Rogers' best silver-plated table-spoons, which sell at $5.00.

For $5.50 THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and one of "Calkin's Champion Washing Machines," which the Company invariably sell at $7.50. They are decidedly one of the best washing machines in use. Over 60,000 have been sold within two years—more than have been sold of any other washer in the same time. For representation and description see 14th page. The papers and premiums sent to one or more parties as desired. The papers and books always sent post-paid by mail; the washer and spoons by express.

Here, friends, are liberal offers. Those who accept them will obtain more than their money's worth in every instance. We hope every friend of the cause will take interest enough in THE TRUTH SEEKER to send us a few names, at least, upon some of the above propositions.

TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS.

We will still send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months to trial subscribers for 25 cents.

For 35 cents the Paper three months, and a copy of "Blakeman's 200 Poetical Riddles."

For 50 cents the Paper three months, and either of the works mentioned in paragraph third, up above.

For 65 cents the Paper three months, and Goldsmith's Works, complete, illustrated, 375 pages.

For 75 cents the Paper three months, and either Byron's complete works, 650 pages, and 21 illustrations, or Shakespeare's complete works, 1000 pages and 36 illustrations.

All postage prepaid.

Here is a fine opportunity to obtain standard works at half price, and THE TRUTH SEEKER three months included. The names of many trial subscribers have been received, and we are anxious for thousands more. Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, please make a little effort to send us all the trial subscribers you can. The outlay is very small, and the good resulting from it may be considerable. Let us hear from you.

True, "the times are hard;" we are in a position to realize it. While all are struggling to get through "the pinch," let THE TRUTH SEEKER not be forgotten.

Owing to an accident which occurred to the engine or machinery where THE TRUTH SEEKER is printed, this number is a few days late. We hope a similar accident will not again occur, and that we hereafter may be promptly on time.

CORRESPONDENTS will please bear with us patiently. Several articles we would gladly find room for if possible, we are compelled to defer. Writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER will please aim to be brief. Short articles suit everybody best, and are the ones first read.

THOSE who in connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER have subscribed for The Ladies' Own and The Herald of Health, and fail to receive them regularly, are requested to address their letters concerning them to the publishers themselves. This course will save us some labor, and insure more prompt attention.

THE CROSS AND THE STEEPLE, a little pamphlet of sixteen pages, by Hudson Tuttle, and published by Bateson & Tuttle, Toledo, O., has been sent us. It gives the origin of the Cross and the Steeple as symbols derived from the ancient sex-worship. It is a curious little work, and very cheap at ten cents.

We would again recommend to our patrons, Koch's Patent Binder for THE TRUTH SEEKER. It holds the papers as securely as a bound book, keeps them from being lost or soiled, and the numbers are easily inserted. It is the best thing out for the purpose. The words, THE TRUTH SEEKER, are in gold on the front cover, and it looks as well as a neatly bound volume. Sent post-paid by mail for $1.10. Address this office.

We would again call the attention of our readers to the Spring Price List of goods to be found in another column, of our enterprising and Liberal friends, G. L. Henderson and associates. Also to his spicy and instructive letter from the West, where he is now sojourning on business connected with his Banking and Purchasing Agency. Our friend while conducting a large and flourishing business, does not forget the claims of humanity nor the cause of progress and free thought. We can cheerfully recommend to our readers both his services and his ideas, believing they will be of benefit to all who use the one, or accept the other.

GARDEN SEEDS. The winter is now nearly spent, and soon the warm, cheering days of Spring will be upon us, when sowing and planting will be the business to be attended to. It is time that every farmer and gardener had supplied himself with such seeds as he will need. Two reliable seed firms are advertising in our columns, and being somewhat acquainted with them and the business they are transacting, we take pleasure in recommending them.

D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., probably do the most extensive seed business in the United States, and their seeds are well known to hundreds of thousands of America's husbandmen. Their extensive seed farms in the immediate vicinity of Detroit comprise several hundred acres, where seeds of vegetables and flowering plants are produced in immense quantities, and of the best possible quality. They issue a magnificent illustrated catalogue of 218 pages, gotten up in the very best style, representing all varieties of vegetables, and the principal kinds of flowers. These are mailed free to all applicants. Send to them for a catalogue. If you send to them also for seeds you will not regret it.

R. H. Shumway, Rockford, Ill., is also an extensive grower of seeds, giving his personal attention to it. When we were in the seed business we bought and planted many seeds of his growing, and found them reliable and satisfactory in every instance. His prices are also very reasonable. He furnishes a catalogue free. He is a good Liberal besides being a good seedsman. Send to him for catalogue and seeds.

Letter from the West.

MILWAUKEE, Feb. 21st, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: By missing the train, I lie over here to-day, and have the pleasure of meeting with the German Freethinkers, or rather the Positive-thinkers of this city, who have an organization incorporated under the name of Bundperer Gemeinden of North America, of which J. E. Louis is President; A. Keye, Vice-President; E. Solomon, Secretary; Otto Kaiross, Book-keeper; and Wm. Hoeckler, Treasurer. They have a fine hall, 50x100x26, which cost $18,000. They employ Freitz Schuettez as lecturer, who, this forenoon, addressed an intelligent and thoughtful audience, on Physiology, which he handled with skill and some humor, and at the close was highly applauded.

J. E. Louis received me as a friend and brother, and is an earnest and positive thinker, and has cut loose from superstition in every form, but has not for that reason cut loose from the world and its great interests. He is desirous of seeing the German and English-speaking people of this continent more firmly united together, in order to resist the encroachment of Evangelical sectarianism, and also to increase their own happiness and extend the knowledge of science, which is the redeemer of the world from ignorance, poverty and crime.

Milwaukee is the centre of a social and scientific organization, of which there are several in Wisconsin, and quite a number scattered throughout the United States. The Provincial societies pay into the general fund $1 for each paying member, and this is used for a lecture fund. The society in this city has over 300 members. The choir, consisting of fifty ladies and gentlemen, are led by Prof. Bach, one of the ablest musicians of the city. They have also a select committee of sixty ladies; who have general supervision over their special entertainments at parties, and also provide the money—for ladies are in every society, the best agents to find a way to the heart and the purse of the male members.

They have a debating society, where young men and women discuss every question which can interest a rational being. They have a fine scientific library and a museum, where the student of natural history will find specimens of nearly everything, from the shell-fish up to man. Back of the speaker's desk there is a fine bust of Humboldt, the greatest German scientist of this century. On the wall there is a fine picture of the Paine Memorial Hall of Boston. In the library they have a portrait of J. J. Loubenheimer, one of the founders of the society, who, though dead, now holds a subjective existence in the Temple, which, while living, he had helped to rear.

"This," said Mr. Louis, "is the knell of immortality only, which falls to him who serves well the human race." This is indeed a society of brave men, noble women, and broad thinkers. They are ready to accept cremation, or any cheap and inoffensive mode of disposing of the dead. But they are desirous of preserving the memory of the just, and will give them a place in the temple where the living meet for social purposes, both to commemorate the deserving dead and devise new methods of increasing the happiness of the living.

I hope soon to see a temple of science in New York city erected by the industrial and professional men, where the truth as it is in nature, will be taught to the million, and where the brotherhood of man will be enjoined, and where a great furnace will reduce the body to ashes, so that the organic remains of the wise and the foolish, the rich and the poor, will be consigned to a common democratic grave, but where the memories and features of the good, the wise and the noble, will be enshrined in grateful hearts, and preserved by the art of man.

There are now millions of rational thinkers in the United States. Their influence for good is felt even now, scattered and divided though they be. But let this force unite, and their power will be irresistible. Thrones, both temporal and spiritual, will, at their touch, crumble into dust. A crowned humanity, wise, beautiful and rich, will rise Phoenix-like out of the ashes. The laborer will occupy the palace; the paupers, known as kings, princes, popes, bishops and priests, will disappear. The cathedrals, churches and colleges will then be filled by a new order of men—men who will know about what they reason, and reason about what they know, men who will explore the earth where they live before they attempt to explore a world they have not yet discovered, men who will first serve man, whom they know, before they serve the gods, of whom they know nothing. They will furnish every human being with fresh objects and motives for love. The suicide will disappear, because life will then be worth preserving. Regicide will cease, for there will be no kings to kill. Prostitution will be impossible, for to be human will be to be noble, and to be a mother of what is noble will be the desire of woman. To be loved by such a woman will be the ambition of man. Therefore there will be no child without love, and no mother not a wife, and neither wife nor child without husband and father.

O! glorious future, come quickly! Men of science, work bravely! O humanity! rise proudly and demand the worship and service of all thy children!

Yours till death, for such a work,

G. L. HENDERSON.

MONDAY, Feb. 22d, 1875.

Last evening after I wrote you, I went to Plymouth church (not Beecher's, but J. L. Dudley's, and at least as good). I listened to an excellent lecture, the gist of which was, that humanity, like a volcano, was bubbling and throbbing and struggling upward to the light, not by the help of churches, and priests and kings, but in spite of them.

That Luther, Voltaire and Rousseau have not lived, and written and battled in vain. Their works live after them, in a vastly improved social condition for man. "Away with your salvation for the future. What man needs is to be saved now! Give him rather, a nobler aim in life, a higher culture, and all-controlling reason. The grandest palace is none too good for the humblest being that bears the human form. Improve the home, surround it with flowers, flood it with light, purify it and put the redeemed humanity therein, and let him occupy it as a god."

Such is a specimen of the gospel preached in Plymouth church of Milwaukee. I have hope for man when the priesthood are prepared to do such work. I was delighted with the whole discourse, and wish I could send it to you. I hope he will send you some of his sermons for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER. He is ready to go hand in hand with us. I went home with him, and passed a very pleasant evening. Mrs. Dudley is a woman of extraordinary power of mind and goodness. She said not very much, but what she did say was pointed and effective. Such a pair might revolutionize a continent.

They, Mr. and Mrs. Dudley, offered a plea for the human Christ. Thus I asked: "How about his specific gravity? was he lighter than water? could he pass through oak doors and stone walls?" Mrs. D. quietly remarked: "That is what they said of him, and not he of himself." "Ah, true," said I, "but where is there anything he did say about himself? Who can separate the false from the true amid such a cloud of fable and parable?" Her answer was: "The authority is in the thing said, and does not depend upon whom or when it was said."

She was right, for when it is said, "The sun shines upon the good and the evil, and the rain falls upon the just and the unjust," it matters not whether Christ or Confucius uttered it, since it is demonstrably true.

Since I have met Mr. and Mrs. Dudley, I now think a good thing may "come out of Nazareth." Yours for the truth and THE TRUTH SEEKER. G. L. H.

Precedents.

MR. EDITOR: I have been waiting some time in hopes that some one would point the way for an easy and proper solution of the Tilton-Beecher scandal. Let it be taken out of the hands of sinners, and be treated as a parallel case was, by the "man after God's own heart." Beecher should get some member of Plymouth Church to kill Tilton, and then have God kill the boy Ralph, who is of doubtful paternity, and then Beecher can take Elizabeth and raise up another Solomon, who, with such parentage, would doubtless eclipse the glories of his father in as great a degree as did the ancient Solomon his, as recorded in the word of God. I fail to see the use of a word of God, if it is only to be preached about and not practiced.

The only other way that I can see to settle it, is for some Jesus of the present day to scratch in the sand with his finger, and then say, "go and sin no more." If he dare not adopt God's first way out of the difficulty, let him adopt the second way, as it is in Jesus. H. SEVERENCE.

Dunkirk, Feb. 18th, 1875.

God and Science.

BY T. B. TAYLOR, A.M., M.D.

I am utterly unable to understand what is meant by the use of such terms as "God," "the Great First Cause," "the Creator," "the Unknown and Unknowable," and such like terms, that I find in the writings of Theodore Parker, Herbert Spencer, Mr. Darwin, and men of like scientific and philosophical thought.

When I find such terms in the writings of Drs. Lightfoot, Clarke, Bickersteth, Newman Hall, Bishop Simpson and Henry Ward Beecher, I understand perfectly what they are "driving at." They mean to refer to that imaginary or real intelligence spoken of in the Old and New Testaments, called sometimes "God," "Lord God," "Jah," "Jehovah," "I Am," etc. But surely the scientists named above do not mean to refer to, and have us believe in, that character as the "Original Creator" of matter, as the author of a work called "The Genesis of Species," would have us to believe. They surely do not mean to say that an intelligence, in the form of a man, having "feet," as when he was seen standing on a brick pavement upon the top of Mount Sinai; "legs," "body," "heart," "bowels," "head," "eyes," "ears," "face," "hands," etc., for these terms are applied to that personage, who, in his persona propria, seemed to be tinkering around on the hill-sides of Judea, in the "wilderness," and other very small and limited sections of the country, the whole extent of which was not larger than the little State of Connecticut, or of this and Rhode Island combined, at the outside, working "miracles" for the space of 1,500 years, or 1,800 at the greatest extent, and then all of a sudden quitting off, as it is claimed by theologians, as with the death of Christ and his apostles, "all miracles ceased."

I say our scientists can scarcely mean this character when they use the terms referred to above. Whom then do they mean? If you ask them if they believe in the "God of creation," such as is popularly addressed in public prayers, referred to by our Presidents, Governors, Mayors, etc., in their "proclamations," and claimed to be "the author and giver of every good and perfect gift," the Bible amongst them, they, the scientists aforesaid, simply smile an incredulous smile, or sneer at an idea so absurd and ridiculous. Yet they do all of them use the words I have quoted at the head of this article.

Some of them essay to tell us that he is a "force," or an "unknown property in matter, operating through molecular particles to form specific animals and plants." One man, claiming to be quite a scientific thinker, Mr. J. J. Murphy, "Habits and Intelligence," Vol. i., p. 348, says: "There is something in organic progress which mere 'natural selection' among spontaneous variations will not account for, and this something is that organic intelligence which guides the actions of the inorganic forces, which neither 'natural selection' nor any other unintelligent agency could form." So he, Mr. Murphy, would make out that the "force" spoken of by Spencer, is an "intelligent force," and this he calls God—so determined is he with others to have a God—even if it be one whose head they can pinch off with finger and thumb, as I will show you in a moment. This "intelligent force," however, Mr. Murphy considers—be it said to his shame, or the shame of his prejudice and superstition, as a defender of a position that has no show in science, but is only a "sop" handed out to orthodoxy—"this force, though intelligent, may be unconscious." The italics are mine. Loc. cit. p. 348-9.

Now, reader, the truth is, these scientific gentlemen have whittled the "Divine Being" down to so small a point, that he is utterly undiscoverable in nature, and absolutely annihilated as to "Providential dealings." As a being fit to worship, an entity to be feared, or loved, or honored, he does not amount to "the end of a burnt straw."

If the scientists and philosophers of the present age have discovered, by actual research and disquisition, that there was and is a world of philosophy in the answer of that little kinky-headed darkey Topsy, in her answer to Miss Ophelia ("Uncle Tom's Cabin"), why do they not say so, frankly and candidly say so, and have done with it? Miss Ophelia stamped her foot down upon the floor and screeched out to the little negress, "Topsy, who made you?"

The child answered very serenely, "Lo'd bless yo' so'l, Miss 'Phelia, I wan't made at all! I des growed!" Now I ask, if these gentlemen have found that the world, and all that is therein, have "des growed,"—and that is really what they say—why in the name of common sense and good English do they not tell us so, and there stop? Not state a given proposition, and go on to prove it, and then to conciliate the churches, "sugar-coat" it, and throw it as a "sop" to orthodoxy! I am sick of this contemptible catering. It may be admissible in a Socialist, but in a Scientist never.

I can't believe that anything is gained by avoiding the naked truth. "The truth shall make you free!" Now let us look at a few aspects of truth, as developed by science.

1. As to the existence of a Creator. Science leaves no room in the universe for such a being, that is, a personality outside of Nature. Even Mirvart, an advocate of Evolution, but a believer in God as a creator, says, p. 289, "The Genesis of Species": "Some persons seem to object to the term 'creation' being applied to evolution, because evolution is an exceedingly slow and gradual process." "The terms 'slow and gradual' are simply relative, and the evolution of a specific form in 10,000 years would be instantaneous to a being whose days were as hundreds of millions."

Did you ever see such a begging of the question? Everybody knows that the doctrine of "Creation," as taught by the gospel expounders, is like this; and I hold that the conception is grand and glorious, poetical and full of rhetoric; and the only trouble in the case is, it is not true. Viz.: He spoke, and it was done! He commanded, and it stood fast! He said: "Let there be light," and there was light! "Let there be a firmament," and immediately the blue curtains floated aloft in the sky! "Let the sea bring forth, and the dry land!" and immediately the great whale, the leviathan, the shark and the ten thousand forms of life, on land and sea, sprung into existence, and that since then no animal, or plant, great or small, has ever been created. "For in six days God created the heavens and the earth and rested on the seventh;" and they tell us he has never resumed operations. Why not "tell the truth and shame the devil?"

2. Science demonstrates that nature is a slow and gradual process of growth. This is a fact and a truth! Now then, what and where is the use of talking of a force or power outside of nature. Why we are told in reply: "That such exquisite skill and workmanship as are displayed in the mechanism of the human eye must show a wisdom and skill superior to man and nature!" Yet a modern German philosopher has recently published to the world that if an optician should construct an optical instrument for him, with so many imperfections in it, as the human eye, he would send it back and refuse to pay for it. See Prof. Tyndall's Lecture on Light.

But admitting that there are many beautiful and useful things in nature, shall we plead these as evidence of a personal Creator? If so, as a candid man, I am bound to check-mate that idea with the fact that Nature teems with monstrosities and nevis-materne. I can fill volumes with these and not exhaust nature.

"The goodness of God" is urged from the fact that there is so much "more of good than evil in the world!" But that is a mistake and a mere assumption! "Where is there a closet without a skeleton?" "And every heart knows its own bitterness." And if God is still creating by and through the laws of evolution, as some of our Scientists seem to contend, why does he not stop the evil and create only the good? Let us have at least a new Theodicy.

Chicago.

Radical Fragments.

NO. I.

MR. EDITOR: The scraps here commended for your columns, are from the pen of one no longer young, but for half a century in the same field of enquiry, now occupied by THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will say he must have been a dull scholar indeed, if he has not arrived at some definite conclusion respecting some of the problems of human life.

For the last twenty-five years an earnest investigator of mediumistic phenomena, known under the name of Spiritualism, and yet leaving condition after death still an open question! And for twenty years a "revival" minister, under the auspices of ancient mediumism, and yet to this day the personality of the Deity is an open question, and still undecided. But here is a question that has been fully settled in my own mind for many years, settled beyond all doubt, and it is this:

I was not consulted as to the matter of my own birth, and there is no good reason why I should feel any more concern in respect to my future after death, than there was why I should have felt concerned about this present life, before I had been born into it. And now upon the threshold of an acquaintance with a large circle of truth seekers, whose faces I have never seen, it may be well for me to premise a few words of explanation:

What is the correct idea of religion?

Religion, from ligo, to bind, and re, again or anew, signified among the heathens, by whom this term was originated, a constant sense of obligation to the god. And Christians, having borrowed this word from the heathen, have misapplied it to signify faith in dogmatic theology and mystical phenomena; whereas, when used in its legitimate import, it signifies that innate sense of obligation that binds us to the fulfilment of the relations of life in human conduct.

Hence we find this sense of obligation in the first dawn of emotion and consciousness, which is manifested in the infant's mind as it hangs upon the mother's breast.

What is "saving faith?"

It is that mental act which creates for itself the "evidence" in regard to invisibilities (God or ghosts), upon which the mind implicitly relies. See Heb. xi: 1. This faith is a paramount power, and in certain temperaments it cures diseases, induces the "trance," converts the sinner, and "sees" what otherwise cannot be seen. It is the motive power of Christianity, modern Mediumism (Spiritualism) and Mesmerism, and without which these movements would—each of them—collapse like the empty balloon when its gas is spent.

TRUTH TELLER.

Quincy, Mass.

The Wordy Torrent.

"Men, from the wordy torrent fly"—can't say how it is with other folks.

Many years ago, I attended a meeting, as I did, sometimes, in those days. The preacher for nearly an hour, had been toiling to say something. I occupied a seat near the door, endeavoring to reconcile myself to the situation with, "what can't be cured must be endured."

An Irish lady approached me, and with a graceful bow, said: "Can you tell me, sir, who is that preacher?" I respectfully gave the name. "And sure it takes that gentleman to say nothing." With another bow that would do honor to a queen, the lady withdrew.

When I open a paper, I cast my eye over the titles, and read the short articles. Articles occupying over a column I pass by as wordy torrents, taking for granted that if a man has something to say—we know how it is with the ladies—we appreciate their brevity—if he has something to say, he can say it without using up all the dictionaries. If he has nothing to say, of course, what he lacks in substance he tries to make up in wind.

We are not disposed to take issue on a talker's or a writer's right to spin out of nothing, a yarn for his own edification. In this fast age, we respectfully decline to be audience. PRENTISS.

Elder Zebedee Harkins.

A Class-meeting.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the office of the Librarian of Congress at Washington, D. C.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Dear Sir: The great revival meeting on the first ult., resulted in a large number of conversions, and yesterday a number of the new converts attended class-meeting, and gave their experiences. It was a solemn and interesting occasion, and I am quite sure that a brief report of what was said will be accepted by your readers as a substitute for one of the Elder's sermons. You and your readers will please remember that this is not a fashionable church, but one of the primitive type. The people here are not trammelled in their manners by forms of etiquette, nor by the rules of grammar in their speech: On the contrary, they act out their natures, and express their feelings with a rude sincerity that would shock a city Christian of the regulation type.

The Elder led the class personally, and after singing a song and offering a prayer, he said: "I hope the young converts will not be bashful or backward, but boldly stand up for Jesus and tell what he has done for their souls; for remember that if you are ashamed of Jesus now, he will be ashamed of you in the great day of his glory and power." The Elder had scarcely ceased to speak, when sister Nancy Bryant arose, and said: "Bless God, I've been married to Jesus, and I want to tell all the world how good I feel." A suppressed smile rambled over more than one saintly face at this announcement; for this good sister is a maiden of forty summers—or was until joined to this illustrious bridegroom. "Yes, glory be to God, I'm not going to be a foolish virgin any longer, but, by the help of the Lord, I'll keep my lamp trimmed and burnin', and be ready for my heavenly bridegroom whenever he comes. My young sisters, let us all keep our lamps a-burnin', and then we need not be ashamed nor afraid to see the bridegroom a comin', nor there won't be no danger of him a catchin' of us asleep if he should even come at the dark hour of midnight. I've fixed my affections on Jesus, and I feel in my very soul that I am accepted and I am on the road to glory."

The newly-made bride resumed her seat, and Elder Harkins commenced singing:

"Prone to wonder, Lord, I feel it,
Prone to leave the God I love;
Here's my heart, Lord, take and seal it,
Seal it for thy courts above."

As this appropriate stanza was concluded, our Teutonic friend, Hans Snyder, arose and gave his experience:

"Mine frines, you all knows dot old Hans vas shust so vicked as never vas. I drinks lager bier unt rein vine, unt somedimes viskey, unt I gets drunk, den I swears, unt my frow, Catrine, she gries, unt den I gets mad unt dells Catrine to go mit the tife, unt all dot. Bimeby somedimes one day, Catrine she comes home, singin' shust like von leetle angel, unt she say, 'Hans, I lofes you shust so goot as never vas,' den she butts her leetle arms around mine neck shust like she used to do ven I vent a sparkin'; to see her ven she vas Catrine Swartz, I dells you, mine frines, dot vos burty goot, unt I said, Catrine, mine frow, I loves you shust a right smart goot deal, unt den Catrine, she say, 'Hans, vont you go mit me to hear de breachin' at de Zion meetin'-house to-night?' unt I gissed her, unt bromised to go mit her to de breachin', unt ven I got to de meetin'-house de breacher he vas a breachin' about de tyfel unt de hel lire, unt all dem dings, unt I got skeered so bad as never vas in mine porn days afore, unt ven I vent home mit Catrine, she dalks to to me unt dells me dot if I not got converted, de tyfel vill get me shure, unt he vill pitch me into dot hell. Vell den I vas so skeered dot I never sleep von vink dot night, unt de next day Catrine unt me vent back to hear sum more about dot hell unt dot old tyfel, unt ven dey sing de song about de poor sinner a gowin' to Jesus, I vent up unt I got down on mine knees, unt I brayed unt I brayed, unt I feel so bad as never vas. Bimeby, somedime all at vonce I dink somebody just bour more as two gallons of varm milk all over me, unt I felt so goot dot I shust jump up unt slap mine hands togedder, unt say glory, unt den de breacher he say, 'you all right now, you got religion,' unt mine frines, I ain't afraid of de tyfel eny more, unt I don't drink no more lager so long as vot I lives, unt Catrine she is so glad as never vas, and vc all go to de himmels togedder; dot's so!"

Amen! Thank the Lord! responded the Elder. Brother Snyder, you have witnessed a good confession. May the Lord bless you, and keep you in the hollow of his hand.

"Oh to grace, how great a debtor,
Daily I'm constrained to be;
Let thy goodness like a fetter
Bind my wandering heart to thee."

It is the invariable custom to sing one verse of some emotional hymn or chorus of an inspiring song between the speeches of the saints—who are alone permitted to speak in class-meeting.

As the above musical interlude closed, Miss Sally

Bowers—the young lady who fell into a trance during the time of the late revival—arose and in a timid manner and modest voice began the relation of her experience:

"Aunt Sally Barnes says as how I ort to speak in this meetin', and tell what great thngs the Lord has done for my soul."

"That's right, bless God; go on, my young sister."

Thus encouraged by the Elder, the young lady proceeded to relate the following remarkable experience:

"I've bin awful wicked all my life. Ever since I was big enough, I've loved to dance and go to parties. I knowed it was wrong, 'cause mammy told me so, but I just couldn't help dancin' and goin' to parties. But one night, about three weeks ago, me and Andy Simpson was a goin' to a dance over to Squire Young's, and we had to go rite past the meetin'-house, and the big meetin' was a goin' on, and just as we got fernenst the door, I heard somebody say, 'Sally Bowers, turn from your wicked ways to-night or you will never have another chance.' I said, Andy, did you hear that? and he said 'what?' and then I told him what I heard, and I told him I was a goin' to meetin', and he said 'all right; I expect we can have as much fun there as anywhere.' So we both went in, and when the time come for mourners to go up and be prayed for, I wish I may never breathe again if that same voice didn't tell me to go to the mourner's bench."

"Well, I went because I couldn't help it, and I knelt down and began to pray, when something said 'I want to dance with you,' and before I knowed what I was a doin' I was a dancin' as hard as I could. I didn't want to do it, but I couldn't help it, and when I tried to quit, I fell down and didn't know ennything, only I thought I was in heaven, and they had a big dance going on, and somebody asked me to jine in, but I said I'm goin' to quit dancin' and jine meetin', and then the angel said, 'it's no harm to dance, we dance as much as we please here,' and after a little persuasion, I jined in and danced like sixty, and then they all went to dinner in a great, big room, and of all the good things I ever hearn tell on, that beat all, and I was as happy as a lark, and everybody else was happy, and wanted to stop there allers; but they told me I wan't ready to come yet, and all of a sudden I waked up a shoutin', and that's all I can tell about it, but I know I've got religion, for I'm chuck full of glory."

During the recital of Miss Sally's remarkable experience, profound silence prevailed, but a close observer could detect looks of incredulity and disapprobation on the faces of the older brethren and sisters. The Elder looked puzzled, but as Sally resumed her seat, he arose and said:

"The sister who spoke last has had a wonderful experience; and some things about it is hard to understand, but I believe she is soundly converted. We should all remember that God works in a mysterious way his wonders to perform. You all know I'm down on dancing, that is, such sinful dancing as the young folks of this wicked generation engage in; but it is written that David danced before the Lord, and he was a man after God's own heart; and there may be dancing in heaven for all we know to the contrary; but if there is, it's a holy dance, and the music is sacred music."

The Elder's argument produced quite a change in the minds of the merely doubtful, but after class was over one man there and an old lady were heard to say, I don't keer what Elder Harkins says, I never will believe there's dancin' in heaven; and as for that story, Sal Bowers allers could tell whoppers when she got started, and it's my opinion she just made up the most of this yarn about going to heaven and seein' em a dancin' just to justify herself in her wickedness. The idea of folks a dancin' and havin' a good time in heaven, why it's perfectly ridiculous. Why, they do nothin' but hold prayer-meetings and love feasts there, and if enybody was to offer to git up a dance, the angel Gabriel would put him out o' doors so quick it would make his head swim. Don't tell me!

The greatest triumph of grace over depravity that ever occurred in this neighborhood, is conceded to be found in the conversion of old Dick Hatfield, who got hauled in during the late revival. Dick is a queer fish. Few men have stronger points of character, but he seemed to run to depravity naturally. He could lie with Longbow or Sinbad, utter more oaths to the minute than Captain Kid, drink whiskey with an Irish squire, and beer with a Dutch Alderman; and drunk or sober, he was as pugnacious as a bull fiste. For years he was the terror of the itinerant preachers, some three or four of whom he waylaid and whipped most soundly.

He was the terror of the camp-meeting managers, for he never failed to come down upon the meeting at exactly the wrong time, bringing the spirit of Belzebub to supplant the holy influences that had been invoked.

On one occasion he captured a hornet's nest, and carefully closing the opening, he hid it in the straw that lay scattered about between the benches reserved for the mourners. The result can be imagined. The Elder had preached one of his most terrible and exciting sermons, and the alarmed sinners crowded the altar by scores. Of course the hornet's nest was smashed, and the unsanctified but patriotic insects avenged the destruction of their house in their peculiarly vigorous manner. A panic ensued, and worship suspended for that day.

When, therefore, old Dick Hatfield, popularly known as Old Sinner, went up to be prayed for, there was great rejoicing in the camp of Gideon's Band, and his conversion was regarded as a great triumph for the Lord.

Expectation was on the qui vive yesterday in the class-meeting, on the occasion of the ex-sinner's first attendance upon this means of grace. Won't brother Hatfield favor us with his experience? said the Elder.

Dick arose to his feet rather gingerly, and cast about him a glance of embarrassed suspicion, and thus began:

"This tawkin' in meetin's a leetle grain outer my line, but as how old Dick's broke with the Devil and jined meetin', I spose he ort to say sothin' just to show that he ain't afear'd or ashamed. You know it ain't my way to be afear'd of nothin'. I swow I don't scacely know what to say, but here goes fur a ventur'. The night I got religion I'd bin to town, and was just a little 'how cum ye so,' and was a comin' home a leetle arter dark, and jest as I struck Mud Creek bottom, who should I see but Old Split-foot hisself a standin' rite afore me. He was the homeliest critter I ever sot eyes on, and he looked as cross as a meat-ax. I begun to think Old Sinner's time had come shure enuff, and I got weak in the knees, especially when Old Roan snorted and reared up and nearly throwed me off, but I stuck to the saddle like a mud turtle to a nigger's toe, and the old mar' reared up a time or too, and then set to runnin' like all sin, and the fust thing I knowed I was rite furenst the meetin'-house, and I sed to myself, says I, Old Sinner, it's about the rite time for you to repent and get religion; so I went in, and jest as I got in they was a singin' and a callin' for mourners, and you bet I didn't waste no time. I tell you, I felt a mity site safer then than out in Mud Creek bottom, and I kept on a feelin' better till I thought I should bust with real glory, and I told Elder Slocum how I felt, and he said, 'you'se got religion, shure,' and by this time the old ooman got her eye on me, and she went fur me, and hugged me, and cried and shouted over me awhile, and then the meetin' broke up and we went home, and I told Sally I had turned over a new leaf, and she sed she thought it was about time I had, and she was awful glad ov it."

"I never believed the yarns about the Devil before; but I've seen him, and I don't fancy his looks; and he ain't a goin' to git his clinchers on me if I can help it; and as I haven't seen him since, I'm in hopes I've got the start on him, and if you'll all pray fur me, I think I'll git to heaven yet, as hard an old sinner as I've been."

Old Dick was listened to with close attention, and when he resumed his seat, the Elder said, "Let us pray." He then gave an exhortation, and dismissed the class.

Be True.

BY MRS. JACOB MARTIN.

Public good-will is a nice thing to have,
I neither despise nor defy it;
But I'd rather lose the respect of mankind
Than sell out my own to buy it.

And though I'm a "horrible infidel,"
(How they sneer who thus express it.)
And Suffragist and Spiritualist,
I'm one that's proud to confess it.

For with hated name does glorious truth
Perch high on fair reason's steeple;
Though scorned by progression's enemies,
The world's respectable (?) people.

Persons opposed to my ways and belief,
Can drop me without any trouble;
The event will not cause in the ocean of life,
I dare say, a ripple or bubble.

Should I lie to please a fastidious world,
And nature's sweet counsels smother,
My outraged conscience would be no friend,
And I might lose every other.

Were I vile, dishonest and wicked—peace
Would fly like a frightened swallow;
While I could not run so far nor so fast,
But my sins would also follow.

So it's to my interest to strive for the right,
While reason and honor guide me;
If in aught I fail, I'll be glad to know
There's no one to blame beside me.

While many may fawn for favor and show,
And cower to fashion and pelf;
I'll try to be true, and oh, above all,
I'll try to be true to myself!

Cairo, Ill.

Religious Frauds Exposed;
The Missionary System Exposed;
Beecherism of the Clergy Exposed,
In The Heathens of the Heath.
Send to this Office for a Copy. Paper $1; Cloth $1.50.

New-York Liberal Club.

FEBRUARY 5TH, 1875.

The lecture this evening was by JAMES PARTON, the honored President of the Liberal Club. The subject, "Who are the Vulgar?"

It was such a masterpiece of wit, wisdom, and literary gems as is but seldom listened to from the platform, and we regret we are not able to present our readers a more perfect report of it.

He stated that until the last century there had always been attached unto the mechanical and industrial callings a degree of reproach; and in evidence of this he quoted from Plato, Shakespeare, and other authors. The first had implied that for shoemakers, makers of pickles and other laborers there could not be much respect. The latter in his characters, that farmers and clowns were synonymous. The names even of his mechanics were suggestive of the low estimation in which they were held, thus, Snug the carpenter, Bottom the weaver, a starveling for a tailor, and others were mentioned. To such extent did Shakespeare carry his disrespect for laboring classes that the late Horace Greeley had justly pronounced him a Tory. Passing over the twenty centuries from Plato to our own time, we still perceived the same discrimination against labor. Even our own Washington had spoken of gentlemen in contradistinction to those who labored, and he had given orders on certain occasions that none "but gentlemen be in charge." In Europe the same sentiments prevail. A lady of wealth in England is shocked if she thinks her daughter in the boarding-school comes in contact with the daughter of her grocer.

Ignorance is the real vulgar, and ignorance is the past. While civilization is indebted to those who have leisure to study and think, and while perhaps it would not exist to-day but for these men of leisure, labor is becoming more and more to be respected, especially in this country. How often when we hear honest toil sneered at as degrading, we characterize it as "British vulgarity." The old idea of vulgarity is fast becoming obsolete.

In olden times it required the labor of hundreds to maintain a few families in ease and leisure. Social society was then in its infancy—it had not become of age. Various authors were quoted to show the meaning of vulgarity. In a book he found in a bookstore he had read, "nothing can be more vulgar than for a lady to present her guests with soup uncomfortably hot." By some the art of fencing was esteemed a high mark of gentility—as with Claude Melnotte in the "Lady of Lyons." Chesterfield had laid it down as an axiom that nothing was more vulgar than immoderate and loud laughter, and gave reasons why a gentleman should never be heard to laugh aloud.

In religion there was the reputable and the disreputable side. Charles II. said, "Presbyterianism was no religion for a gentleman." Walter Scott even gave as a reason why he changed his religion, that "Episcopalianism was more refined than the religion of the dissenters."

Ruskin held that the stain from the battle field was more respectable than the smurched from the forge or the kitchen. The lecturer dissented from this; he believed the honest toil of the farmer, the mechanic or the cook in the kitchen ranked far above the occupation of the soldier, whose trade is to kill his fellows.

A century ago the queue was thought to be a great mark of respectability. It was thought, in the time when James Madison was selected for President, a great shame that "such men as Daggett of Connecticut, or Stockton of New Jersey—either of whom had queues as big as your arm—should be set aside for such a man as Jimmy Madison, who had a small queue not half as large as your wrist." Mrs. Somerville relates when she remonstrated with her father against wearing a queue, he said emphatically: "If his queue must be cut off, his head should go with it."

In alluding to the aristocratic feelings of the Virginians of former times, he mentioned John Randolph, who had no sympathy for a laboring man, and who had a special hatred for sheep. He said he would any time go out of his way to kick a sheep. He hated a sheep because its wool was made into cloth and the manufacture gave employment to the laboring man.

Among the Indians it was considered respectable for a young warrior to have a good string of scalps on their belts, and if he has the scalps of young ladies thus to exhibit, it raises him in the eyes of his people far above the vulgar.

He said all trades are partial to their own. With a shoemaker there was nothing like leather. The tailor believed in cloth, the book-worm like himself, thought more of books than anything else, though he had noticed many who read the most really knew the least.

With some, respectability was gauged by the quantity and value of the jewelry worn. Some men assert they can tell a lady at once by the jewelry she wears, and can in a few moments take an inventory of the value of her outfit. If it only amounts to a few dollars, she is not accounted a lady.

Speaking of the devotion to fashion which exists in our country, he said within one or two weeks after a new fashion in bonnets or dress appeared in Harper's Bazaar it would be worn in the prairie towns of the far West. Money has a great deal to do in making up respectability, and it seems to matter but little in the general estimation how the money is obtained. Tweed, who stole $5,000,000 from the people and gave back $50,000 to the poor of his ward, was counted generous. Peabody spent fifty years of toil, twisting, screwing and making every possible exertion, in old age to go over the world to scatter it again. The better way is not to aim to accumulate such vast sums, but to make the best use while we live of such means as we have in our reach.

Some hold it very respectable to have late dinners. In Kansas he met an Englishman engaged in stock raising, and he gloried in dining at half-past seven at night the same as he used to in his father's house in London. Dining at that hour in a swallow-tailed coat was his idea of gentility. In Colorado he once witnessed a State dinner, when one man stopped short and looked with surprise at one near him, and exclaimed, "By golly this is more than I can stand, he is eating his pie with a fork!"

He alluded to the time when he was young and lived in White Plains in the adjoining county of Westchester, when the idea of vice and virtue was held to be represented by the sheep and the goats. The grim deacons, who made wry faces when they sang, and prayed for the rocks to fall upon the wicked—these were the sheep. The goats were the young lawyers and such as cared not for the outward forms of piety, who bowed to the ladies and knew how to dance. He remembered these used to help the boys out with their lessons in Virgil.

He alluded to an instance of spending two days last winter in Springfield, Ill., where the monument commemorative of Lincoln stands. On Saturday he walked around among the bookstores and saw the counters well supplied with the works of Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, Spencer and Mill, and one of the clerks informed him they sold more of that class of books than any other. He thought it argued favorably for the increasing intelligence of the people. On the next day he attended Sunday-school, and listened to the minister addressing the scholars upon the Deluge. He had a representation of the ark, Mt. Arrarat and God himself holding conversation with Noah, and God appeared much as Edwin Forrest used to look in King Lear. This clergyman was impressing it upon these children that the flood, the animals in the ark, and the ark landing high and dry upon Arrarat, were all important facts which they must believe, and when in a little time after they read in the works of the geologist Lyell, that there never was such a deluge at all, they could make up their minds whether to believe the great man in London, or the small man in Springfield. He thought very little of the lies taught in Sunday-schools, and deemed it not best that children should be taught old legends and superstitions, but rather science, truth and the moral principles of honesty, and virtue, and right.

In America no ordeal is more severe than letting people do just as they please. The genius of this country means that no honest and decent person shall be looked down upon because he is poor and does common work, or has no pedigree of his grandfather; that every person shall have a fair share of the good things of the land. It means that every honest man is a gentleman, and every honest woman a lady.

He made some humorous remarks about the pride of ancestry. Many Southern families claim to be descendants of the younger son or scion of some distinguished English family. In New England almost every person believes his direct ancestors came over in the Mayflower. In Pennsylvania they point proudly to Wm. Penn, in New York to their Dutch ancestors, now represented by "shoddy and codfish aristocracy."

Allusion was made to the Guelph family of England—an old one which had never produced a great man or a distinguished character. He complimented Joseph Arch in what he had done for the laboring classes of England, though himself a laborer and the son and grandson of a laborer.

Passing attention was made to Commodore Vanderbilt, and of the much he has accomplished, but that now in his old age he took more pride in recounting his life when captain of a schooner than of what he had done since he became a Railroad King.

Humorous remarks were made about fashionable dinners—four hours at the table, and seven kinds of wine in colored glasses—and the dinners given by various clubs and associations, in which many fine hits were made.

We will not do further injustice to this excellent lecture by trying to report it. Suffice it to say, the large audience were greatly pleased and amused with it, and but little idea of it can be obtained from this meagre outline.

MR. DAWSON followed, complimenting the lecture. He alluded to the writings of Shakespeare and Dickens, giving his preference and admiration for the latter, and called attention to several of Dickens' characters.

The following gentlemen made remarks: DR. LAMBERT, DR. HOEBER, D. T. GARDNER and DR. HALLOCK; also MRS. HALLOCK.

MR. PARTON made a few closing remarks, in the course of which he referred to some allusions that had been made to the great Brooklyn trial. He said it was a great lesson from which we all could learn. Pontiffs must be dethroned, and the shams and absurdities of society and the Church must be seen as they are.

FEBRUARY 12TH, 1875.

The lecture for this evening was The "Physiology of the Skin," by Dr. HEITZMAN, an able microscopist and learned student of science, recently from Vienna where he attained distinction for his discoveries and scientific productions, and who has established a Microscopic-Anatomical Institute in this city. The lecture was an able one, and well illustrated by drawings and charts of the doctor's own painting, but there is so much demand for our room we will be compelled to give a brief abstract only of the lecture.

The skin is composed of two principal tissues, the first called by anatomists the Corium, the other the Epidermis. The corium is provided with blood-vessels and lymphatic vessels; in the epidermis, on the contrary, these are wanting. The nerves terminate in the elevation of the corium, the so-called papilla, in the form of touch-corpuscles, while the lower filament enters the lower layer of the epidermis and terminates with button-like knobs.

The epidermis sends processes into the depth of the corium, which are denominated sweat-glands, tallow or sebaceous glands, and root-sheaths of the hair; we can distinguish an external and internal root-sheath. These different strata, or layers, form a tube-like covering, in which the hair proper is implanted. The hair itself may be considered as an epidermic formation in which the mucus and epidermic layers, instead of being extended flat on the surface, grow simply in their length in form of cylinders. We have, therefore, in the hair again two layers, namely, the external or cortical, and the internal, or medullary or marrow substance.

The hair shaft on its surface is covered with small scales, to which the Latin term cuticula has been applied. The principal mass of the hair consists of spindle-shaped, flat elements, containing in different colored individuals and homogeneous coloring substance. It is a matter of taste to decide which is the more pleasing to the eye, jet-black, the auburn, the flaxen, the sandy, the red or the white hair. It is said the color of the hair is peculiar to certain temperaments, so that dark-haired persons are held to be more lively, energetic and amorous, but less constant than those possessing paler tints. The color of the hair depends principally on the supply of their substance with granules of pigment and an evenly distributed coloring matter. It has been asserted bubbles of air within the marrow of the hair favor especially the gray color, but this is not fully established.

The development of hair begins at the end of the third month of fetal life. It first appears in the eyebrows and eye-lashes, next the hair of the scalp, and then the other parts of the body, and last of all the hair of puberty. The first formed hair is not permanent, but is frequently thrown off in childhood to make room for a stronger growth. The formation of new hair ceases when the papilla becomes sick and shrinks, when the wig replaces what the stubborn skin refuses longer to furnish.

Similar to the horny formations of the hair are the nails of the fingers and toes. The corium is well supplied with blood-vessels and nerves, while the upper and outer portions of the nail are without sensation and life. The horny formations—the epidermis, the hair and the nails require a tasteful culture. Water and soap remove the superfluous epidermic scales, and scissors and knife the unnecessary elongations of the hair and nails. We may appreciate how appropriately it has been remarked by the great chemist, Liebig, that the consumption of soap indicates in a great measure the degree of a nation's civilization. I will state, without fear of contradiction, that there is no nation known to me on this globe that equals the people of the United States in the consumption of that article.

I will next mention the moving apparatus of the skin—its muscles. In the face and on the neck exist muscles of the skin, partly subject to our will, these being far less developed in man than some mammalia. Besides these there are numerous muscular bundles composed of spindle-shaped elements, which produce a net-work, partly single muscle-strings and layers traversing the corium in oblique directions. These hairs themselves are obliquely implanted in the skin, and when the muscle contracts, then the hairs stand straight, and the corium is retracted. In this manner the so-called "goose skin" is produced, which, by some persons, can be brought on at will.

Let us consider the function of the skin as a protective covering of the body. It possesses a solidity and elasticity to a considerable degree. Dull bodies coming in contact with the skin with great force do not always produce lesions, even if the underlying muscles, vessels and nerves are torn, the bones broken, and the intestines are smashed, still the skin remains unimpaired. This properly presents itself to our observation when, for instance, a heavy weight falls on the body, or a spent cannon ball strikes the skin, or when a careless railway employee is caught between the puffers of two cars. Sometimes all the tissues beneath the skin are smashed into a soft, mellow pulp, and still the skin remains uninjured. The toughness of the skin makes it possible to use it in the form of leather, after having passed through the hardening process at the hands of the tanner. The heavy boots of a longshoreman, the delicate shoes of a lady, the covering of old books, the parchment on which we write and paint, the belts with which we unite the wheels of machinery, and the drum-skin on which the drummer beats the tattoo, are all from the skin of different animals. During the French Revolution, towards the end of the last century, when leather became scarce and dear, the skins of the people executed by the guillotine, were sometimes turned into leather. The skin of men furnished straps, while the skins of ladies, being generally of a more delicate character, were used for the manufacture of gloves.

It is again due to the elasticity of the skin that some persons accumulate large quantities of fat, and in others in certain physiological functions, or in the pathological derangements, caused by dropsy or large tumors. If a sudden diminution in the volume of these follows, the skin accommodates itself again, after a brief lapse of time it comes to its former normal condition.

The skin regulates the temperature of the whole body, preventing on the one hand the giving off the heat too quickly as a bad conductor, on the other hand spending the surplus heat produced in the body.

A cold skin is pale and contracted; as the temperature sinks, the skin becomes paler and paler until white and stiff in frost.

The skin has the property of absorbing gaseous and other substances held in solution. It is well known that the absorption of noxious gases, which are unfit for respiration, is sufficient to produce death by acting upon the skin alone. Sparrows being immersed in an atmosphere of carbonic acid gas, with their heads free from the agency applied, die within one or two hours, while rabbits being placed in an atmosphere of sulphureted hydrogen, their heads alone being kept above the same, die in ten minutes.

It is well known that persons whose occupation requires the handling of dead bodies, sometimes become poisoned though their skin being unbroken. An immeasurable and imponderable quantity of this poison transmitted from the dead body to the healthy skin, produces, under certain circumstances, the most alarming symptoms. Many talented and promising students have thus laid down their valuable lives as victims of science.

In the hot-air baths, by perspiration, the weight of the body is often reduced one or more pounds in a short time, but the weight is soon recovered from the atmosphere by the absorbing power of the skin, and without the aid of drink, as proved by absolute experiments.

The skin is an organ of perspiration, its office being the elimination of certain volatile substances from the blood. In order to study this property of the skin, repeated experiments have been made in such a way that the skins of various animals were covered with an impermeable coat of gum Arabic, of lead varnish, or oil paint. The duration of life of animals after thus completely closing up their skins, depends upon the size of their bodies. Having thus covered, for instance, one-eighth to one-sixth of the surface of their skins, rabbits die very rapidly. If a less covering is made, death follows somewhat later. The phenomena are great restlessness, trembling, difficult breathing, convulsions, etc. The post-mortem examination of animals so treated, show that the brain, the liver, the spleen, the kidneys are over-filled with blood, with inflammation affecting various organs. Animals deprived of their skin, survive longer than those covered with varnish. A child who, to represent the "Golden Age" in the celebration of the election of Pope Leo Tenth, was covered with gilding, died a short time afterward from the effects. By experiments made with animals, it has been found a rabbit, by covering with varnish and applying thermoelectric needles, the temperature was found to lessen from 100° to 89°, in the next half-hour to 96°, and in a third half-hour only at 30°, while the surrounding atmosphere was 63°.

The fat, which we accumulate beneath our skins, not only furnishes us with protection, but is also an excellent respiratory medium. This is proved by the experiments made on animals during their Winter sleep.

What an immense influence on the function of respiration our fat cushion underneath the skin possesses, is evident from the fact fat people generally need far less nourishment and non-nitrogenized, therefore less fuel or respiratory materials than lean persons. If, in consequence of, or during disease, the nourishment is not assimilated or cannot be properly introduced into the body, and the supply of nourishing material is cut off, in the first place we observe the disappearance of the fat. If, however, the supply of nourishment is suddenly withheld, death follows before all the fat of the body has been consumed. This fact is sadly illustrated by the case of a girl in England, named Sarah Jacobs. She ate nothing for some time, and notwithstanding she remained very fat. It being suspected the statement was not a true one, the child was carefully watched, and it was found she partook of no food whatever. After eight days she was a corpse. Upon post-mortem examination, layers of fat from half an inch to an inch were found in the chest and upper portion of the abdomen.

The functions of the different tissues of the skin will be more fully discussed in a future lecture.

A discussion, bearing upon the subject, was participated in by Dr. Atkinson, Dr. Cooke, Dr. Hoerber and two or three other medical men.

Then Who's to Blame?

If God foreknew all things at first,

And likewise planned the same;

If man strict follows out that plan,

Then who's to blame?

If moral agents men are made,

It still connects the chain;

For reason guides—God gave the aid,

Then who's to blame?

If God decreed an endless hell

To sear the human frame;

If man is sear'd, then, reader, tell

Me, who's to blame?

If Election be the plan of God

A part to save from shame;

And part must feel his scourging rod,

Then who's to blame?

If I arrive in realms above,

And you in sin remain;

'Tis God's decree, the will of love,

Then who's to blame?

If nature all was formed in sin,

Did I my nature frame?

Or can I change what God has made?

Then who's to blame?

God formed our limbs and gave us breath,

Our thoughts he formed the same;

And now if man should meet with death,

Then who's to blame?

If life eternal rests on works,

To praise the Almighty's name;

If man is weak and cannot work,

Then who's to blame?

If Satan gets full half of man,

To you and me lays claim,—

Not me, 'twas God who formed the plan,

Then who's to blame?

W. K. TREMBLY.

A Chapter of Queries for the "Cloth."

MY ORTHODOX BROTHER:—Is it a fact that man is endowed with Reason? If so who gave it to him? God? Let it stand as granted. Then, has God given an arbitrary book revelation that contradicts it? If so, does it not involve the absurdity that God has contradicted himself? Are you as sure that God is the author of a book revelation which man might make, as you are that he is the author of Reason which you are certain none but God could make? If you find ten thousand statements in the book revelation which men might make, contradicting every principle of Reason which none but God can make, which is the safest to follow? Is the doctrine of "Atonement" or forgiveness of sins, a sentiment of Justice and Right? Is it not the evangelical doctrine, that a man guilty of heinous crimes against God and man, can be forgiven, and be as good, pure and happy in heaven as though he had never been guilty of evil deeds?

Can a god, that will permit a violator of his law to escape due punishment, be a god of Justice?

Can a god, that does not, or will not, reward a man for every good deed, be a god of Justice and Right?

Can a god, that will punish the innocent, or allow the innocent to suffer for the guilty, be a righteous god?

What is the effect of the doctrine of Atonement or "forgiveness of sins" upon evil-doers? Is it good, or does it offer a premium on vice?

In view of the many delinquents in morals among the "faithful," is it not a clear case, that to teach them to believe they can escape a just punishment due to their sins, is the surest doctrine of all others to encourage them in them? Suppose there was no positive, fixed law, regulating the movement of our earth and the innumerable worlds of infinitude—what do you suppose would be the condition of things? Do you suppose there would be any certainty in calculating the ebb and flow of tides, or reckoning about day and night, the revolution of planetary worlds and systems of worlds, eclipses, seed time and harvest? What would be the natural consequence, if things were left without law, and governed only by capricious dictation and special legislation? Would not the result be just the state of things we find in the religious (?) world—"confusion worse confounded," contradiction and anarchy?

A child in comprehension ought to be able to see that without a fixed, unvarying order or law, to rule supreme with all existences, in every department of being, confusion, disorder and despair would be the legitimate result.

Now, if a universal system of "order" is so essential in the physical domain, is it not equally so in morals and religion?

Does the "Universal Soul" turn "sharp corners" to deceive, and then punish his children because they are deceived? Where are the consistency and goodness of an arbitrary book-religion when none of them are commensurate with the penalty affixed to unbelief:—Eternally damned forever lost? Is the Christian book-revelation any more consistent, when measured by eternal principles, than the Shasters, Vedas or Al Koran? Is it not too human to say God writes books?

Would it not be less "human" and more consistent to say God makes worlds, and systems of worlds, and governs all by universal, unchanging law, that measures out exact justice for every act of obedience to, and for every infraction of it? Do you believe the plan to dispose of sins as laid down in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus was given to Moses by God? You do! You believe then, that by heaping your sins on the back of an old he-goat, and killing him, you thereby clear yourself of the effects of violated law, eh!

What a god is this, you have set up, who takes no notice of violators of his law, or, if he does, is pleased to accept an "offering" of dumb animals, and permits you to palm your sins upon the head of a goat (as under Judaism) or, as you are now trying to do, upon Jesus? Don't you think you will be just a little surprised when you wake up some day before long to find that the effect of every violation of universal law, has unmistakably stamped itself upon every department of your being, whether of body, intellect, mind or soul? Do you think it was a sensible manœuvre for Moses, four thousand years ago, to tell the ignorant and fearful, they could "pile" their sins (like ponderous articles) on the head of a goat? Do you think priests to-day are any more sensible to instill into the minds of the ignorant, credulous, and immature youth, the heathenized dogma, that they can "pile" their sin on Jesus? Is it an act of justice that the innocent Jesus should bear the great penalty due your sins? Is it in accordance with your reason for you to palm your guilt upon him, even if you could? Is it reasonable to believe that a just god would accept an innocent person for punishment, instead of the guilty one, and let the latter go free? What is your honest opinion of the character of a god who would do it? Is it not your candid opinion that such a god is to be watched instead of worshipped? Do you know of any human government that has so far deviated from the path of justice, reason and common sense, as to save by proxy and hang by proxy? Where is the civil government on earth that would allow its president or rulers to establish a system such as the Christian (?) plan of "Atonement"? How do you think an honest man would look and feel, to be caught creeping into a heaven made up of honest men, on another person's ticket? Don't you honestly think that all but Christians would feel and look as though they were caught at last—at mighty little tricks?

Do you not imagine that sometime when you arrive in spirit-land, where all are clear-sighted and all things transparent, your borrowed "cloak of righteousness" will be stripped from your guilty back, and you be left in all your hideous nakedness?

Would it not be acting more the part of a man, to go where you justly belong, be that where it may, instead of "squeezing" into good (?) company with nothing but borrowed merit? And finally, Which view do you think an enlightened reason takes of your "Christian-Scape-Goat-plan" of saving souls; namely: Is it Heathenized Christianity, or Christianity Heathenized? which?

Winterset, Iowa, Jan., 1875,

Volume I.

WE will furnish the First Volume entire, of THE TRUTH SEEKER bound in paper covers, postage paid, for $1.00.

The same minus one number	75 cts.
" " " two "	60 cts.
" " " three "	50 cts.
" " " four "	40 cts.
" " " five "	30 cts.

Single copies, of back numbers of Volume I, such as we have on hand, 3 cents each. Those who wish THE TRUTH SEEKER from the beginning and to have it convenient for reference and perusal will do well to avail themselves of this opportunity.

Liberal Lectures.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., Feb. 10th, 1875.

MR. EDITOR: We have just been highly entertained by thirteen lectures delivered by Dr. L. York, from San Jose, Cal. Dr. York is a full team in the Liberal field. His lectures were attended by large audiences, and highly commended. He goes from here to San Diego. Thus we see the Liberal element extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Canadas to the Floridas. Yours for universal mental freedom,

P. R. WRIGHT.

Friendly Correspondence.

R. THOMAS, Winterset, Iowa, writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER makes the church-members here feel very uneasy; but few will hold conversations on the scriptures or religion. They say they will not argue on the Bible. They know we can beat them with their own text-book.

SENECA BEHYMER, New Palestine, Ohio, writes: I like your paper very much. We need many such documents in this neighborhood, where old superstition has reigned supreme from time immemorial. Carry on the good work until Reason, thrown on the world's brain, shall be king of kings and lord of lords."

WM. STACKHOUSE, East Cambridge, Ill., writes: I must congratulate you upon the merits of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It grows better all the while. Each number is an improvement upon its predecessor. Its typographical appearance cannot be beat. It is full of advanced ideas of the age that are destined to revolutionize the dogmas of old theology.

CLARK B. CHATTEN, Mullica Hill, N. J., writes: I am a constant reader of your falsehood-destroyer, and think it is increasing in knowledge and interest. Your readers can hardly fail to see how worthily you carry out your contracts, and those who are negligent about paying their just dues for work so honorably performed, ought not to adopt Mr. Snodde's religious views of not paying up.

DR. C. R. DWIGHT, Danville, Ill., writes: My brother, at Monmouth, Ill., writes me to order THE TRUTH SEEKER for him. He saw a copy or two of your paper but could not remember your address. He says he likes it the best of anything he has seen. All who are taking it here are delighted with it, as every one must be who has outgrown the method of taking sugar through a rag or playing horse with a broomstick.

WM. A. THOMPSON, Duquoin, Ill., in sending in a list of trial subscribers, writes: I hope soon to be able to send on more names. I will do all I can in this direction, believing that by so doing, I am not only assisting you, but conferring a great favor upon those who read your paper. I am aware Mrs. Grundy is looking awry at me for doing what I am, but I am getting used to persecution as I have lived long enough to be mobbed for opinion's sake, but this gives me no fear or uneasiness; I am perfectly willing to stand by the truth.

TOWNSEND WARE, Fairfield, O., writes: I esteem THE TRUTH SEEKER highly, and hope it may long be sustained to promulgate the principles of mental freedom and the cause of the religion of humanity and a common brotherhood among mankind. I believe it wrong to attribute the barbarous imputations the Bible contains; to that great power we call God. If it were half true we should indeed fear him greatly, more even than the devil, and love him but little. He is there represented as being cruel and bloodthirsty toward the children of his creation. I hope you may be encouraged in the efforts you are making to expose a false theology.

CHAS. L. ROBERTS, Yates City, Ill., who has sent in the names of near fifty subscribers, some for three months and some for a year, writes: I received your card stating there was some prospect of my obtaining the largest number of trial subscribers. I do not wish you to be at any expense for a present to myself, should I be the lucky person. I am satisfied if my feeble efforts will help to roll the ball of progress. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER the best Liberal paper published in the United States and I am acquainted with a number of them. It is a perfect eye-opener, and meets the wants of those who are really seeking for truth. I am therefore willing to do all I can in extending its circulation.

M. M. PERKINS, Collins, O., writes: A friend of mine, living in Chicago, sent me last year a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the tone of which suits me much, and I intend to become a life-long subscriber to it. Your comments on the Bible precisely agree with my views, and I have many times expressed the same opinions as I find you have in your Bible narrative. We have a goodly number of Liberals here, and I shall try and introduce your paper among them, so far as I can, believing it will do a great work, beating back foggyism, and letting light shine where Pagan fables have gone for more than their true value. It is time the old humbug was shown up in its true light and the good sifted from the bad.

FRANK M. TERRY, Liverpool, N. Y., writes: Through the kindness of my esteemed friend, Dr. Sterling, I am introduced to you through the medium of your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am happy to congratulate you upon your success in editing a paper that exactly fills the place so much needed in the minds of thinking, intelligent people. The age of miracles has passed, and what we now need is the instructions you are publishing to the world—common sense and facts, not fancies. I am much pleased with the candid manner in which you unravel the mysteries of the past, and your able course in overturning the falsities of life and the creeds of the past. As I read in music the character of its author, so can I read from your paper the character in the history of our children's children. Your principles will be recorded as the outbreak from fettered ignorance and superstition. I rejoice that I live in the day when we can talk by lightning and ride by steam, and that the rays of light and truth are spreading over the world. I sent one copy of your paper to my father, and he soon got up a club of eight subscribers and sent you.

JESSE MUNN, Anderson, Ind., writes: Through the exertions of Dr. Hockett—vanguard in thought and action in this place—THE TRUTH SEEKER has taken root here, and is enjoying a healthy growth. Another volume will find its way to 100 subscribers here. In accelerating the doom of church despotism and preparing the way for Free Inquiry in all that concerns the welfare of man, your paper is doing a big work, only requiring the sustaining influence of public opinion to make its effectiveness the more certain. Though many regard Christianity in a state of decrepitude, as it most certainly is, yet the Church is still a power in checking every onward improvement and must be effectually squelched before any great good can be attained. I am glad to see your shafts so well pointed in that direction. Your articles on the Bible are pungent, clear and withering in the extreme. Each number shows a clear insight of both the negative and affirmative sides of the great questions at issue. The reports of THE LIBERAL CLUB fill a very commendable space in the columns of your journal, and afford much information.

J.W. SCOTT, Morrill, Kansas, writes: Your paper makes some of the hard heads howl hereabouts. When I fail to obtain a subscriber I send them a paper now-and-then. My business is farming, so I speak my sentiments openly without fear of being injured in business. I know of several who dare not speak their honest sentiments for fear of losing trade. I send you five subscribers now and will send some more after a while.

[We presume our friend finds the sun shines just as warmly and the rain falls just as gently upon him as upon his Christian neighbors, and that he raises as good corn and wheat as they. We hope the time will come when merchants and mechanics will not fear to express their belief lest they lose Mrs. Grundy's patronage and approval.—Ed. T. S.]

M. K. TREMBLY, North Fairfield, O., writes: I regret I have not been able to send you some new subscribers, but I am living within gunshot of four orthodox churches, having four preachers to watch and pray for their bread and butter. There is not much chance to work upon their flocks. Again, my wife and her people, my father and his whole family, except myself, are "the Simon pure" of the "Elder Harkins" stripe; and since I have taken your paper I have been persecuted from every corner, by friends, priests and all. I am the only person in this community who dares to open his mouth and speak against the dogmas of the Church; and though I may be ignorant in scholarship, I trust I have some rational ideas, and with the aid of your paper I stump and confound priests with their boasted learning. They get mad and call me crazy. They would burn or kill me if they could. In scattering the seeds of truth against bigotry and superstition, I know I am doing no harm. I want to say, my brother, the reading of your paper has brought light to me and caused me to see myself as I never did before. I find I have not been living as I ought. I have not set the example before my fellow men I should. I have not practiced love and charity. I have resolved to change and live up to the best light I have.

UNCLE TOM, of Long street, Ohio, sends us the following Mormon Sermon, delivered at Indian Creek Bridge on Long Street, Ohio:

Brothers and Sisters: I have a very practical but searching discourse to bring before you this morning, and one which is of great personal importance to all. I therefore most earnestly desire you to pay the strictest attention to my words. My text is, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Perhaps some have not heard me, and I will repeat, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" For the benefit of that man who has just come in, I will repeat again for the last time, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Why, Why, Why? Why not if? Why not it? Why not off? Why not because? Why stand? Why not sit? Why not lie? Why not kneel? Why not she? Why not it? Why not that dog? Why not that woman, sitting in the corner? Why stand ye here? Why here? Why not there? Why not down under the bridge? Why not in your mill there? Here he pauses and says, "I don't know how you feel, brothers and sisters, but I do wish some one would open a window."

Why stand ye here all? Why all? Why not part? Why not a half-a-dozen? Why not one?

A young woman has just entered the bridge and for her especial benefit, I will repeat my text, in order that she may fully understand what we are discussing, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Why stand ye all the day? Why the day? Why not the night? Why not the morning? Why not the evening?

Lastly and finally, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Why idle? Why not at work? Why not sowing? Why not reaping? Why not spinning? Why not weaving? Why not washing? Why not ironing? Why not scrubbing? Why not digging? Why not hoeing? My brothers and sisters, I have exerted myself to a great extent, in order that you might leave the place of worship fully impressed with the sense of duty imposed upon you, and hoping that I have not wearied you, and I am very sure I have not, I bid you good morning.

I incline to think the story a fib.
Of Eve's being made from a stolen rib;
I'd sleep till they stole every rib from my side,
If I got in exchange a beautiful bride;
For I know of no swap that would bring greater bliss,
Than to trade away bones for some Eve's pure kiss.
Philadelphia, 1875. H. M. R.

Not long since a German was riding along Samson street, near Sacramento, when he heard a pistol shot behind heard the whizzing of a ball near him, and felt his hat shake. He turned and saw a man with a revolver in his hand, and found a fresh bullet-hole in his hat. "Did you shoot at me?" asked the German. "Yes," replied the other party: "that's my horse: it was stolen from me recently." "You must be mistaken," said the German, "I have owned the horse for three years." Well," said the other, "when I come to look at him, I believe I am mistaken. Excuse me, sir, won't you take a drink?"

A SINGULAR clerical dispute is reported from Newcastle-on-Tyne, in England. The Rev. Mr. Veale, the rector, who had left his house and cure to Archdeacon Matthais, on Saturday, Jan. 16, entered with six men, took possession, and barricaded the house. At first the Archdeacon refused to leave, and was restricted to one room. He drew up his food in a basket with a rope through the window. The Mayor and leading men of the town met, but could decide on nothing. On Sunday the Archdeacon was hunted from room to room by the rector and his attendants. Having been assaulted by the bailiffs, he has taken out summons against them. Crowds gathered around the house, and constables were called in.

"TAKING IN WASHING."—The Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, pastor of the Lee Avenue Baptist Church, in Brooklyn, has in his church a "comfortable baptistry," and has been in the habit of baptizing all who came to him, whether they joined his church or not, but he has now declined to longer perform this very holy sacrament, so necessary for the salvation of the soul, unless for those who propose to join his church. He says the "Lee Avenue Church has not yet descended quite so low as to take in washing."

ANOTHER.—The Rev. John Deffendorf, of Summit, four miles west of Yates City, Ill., attempted to seduce his wife's maid, a girl 16 or 17 years of age. He was arrested and brought before the police magistrate of Yates City. By some technicality of the law he was discharged, when he at once left for Iowa. This same clerical scamp was six years ago brought before a justice of the peace and fined for a similar offense. He is fond of young chickens. The young girls of Charlton, Iowa, (whither he has gone) should beware of him.

SAMUEL R. THOMPSON, near Pleasant Valley, Iowa, has been insane through religious excitement by attending revival meetings, and has been sent to the insane asylum at Mt. Pleasant. We know not what is better calculated to drive a person crazy than a belief in the fundamental dogmas of Christianity—that God created a devil and a hell in which ninety-nine hundredths of the human family are doomed to suffer indescribable torments forever. An angry God with a malicious devil to act as deputy in inflicting punishment upon helpless sinners for endless ages is quite enough to make a weak-minded man hopelessly insane.

INFAMY.—J. W. Thorne, member of the North Carolina Legislature from Warren county, has been expelled from that body by a vote of 46 to 31 because he was honest enough to avow his disbelief in such a God as the Bible describes. It is to be regretted the resolution was offered by one of the newly enfranchised citizens of the African persuasion. The object at all events was impelled by a spirit of intolerance and bigotry. The time remaining for such exhibitions is short. It will not be many years before a man who doubts the existence of the Jewish Jehovah will be as much respected as he who disbelieves in Brahma, Vishnu, Fot or Jupiter.

THE supply of black walnut lumber is reported to be greatly diminished. A Cleveland, Ohio, paper says: "Kentucky has quite a stock of good walnut, and much that is very inferior on account of its grey color and tough, hard texture. Missouri also has some of a rather inferior quality. Western Ohio claims good walnut but that of Eastern Ohio and Western Virginia is poor in quality. The whole stock of the States is not equal to a full demand for ten years to come. Furniture manufacturers do not use it so lavishly as they did five years ago. Other woods are substituted when possible, and one thousand feet of walnut is made to go as far again as it did a few years ago."

TERRIBLE ACCIDENT.—At half-past eight o'clock on the evening of Feb. 24th, as some 1200 people, a large proportion of whom were women, were assembled in St. Andrew's church (Catholic) on Duane street in this city, listening to a Lenten sermon from Father Carroll, a high wind prevailed, and blew a part of the wall of an adjoining building upon the roof of the church, when brick, mortar, and timbers came suddenly crashing down upon the unsuspecting worshippers below, creating terrible consternation and terror. Some jumped from the gallery on the heads of those below, scores of men and women trampled upon their weaker neighbors, and hundreds screamed prayers and ejaculations of terror. Five persons were killed and some thirty wounded—some of them seriously. How will those who believe a kind, overruling Providence carefully watches over all, account for these sincere people being stricken down in this instantaneous manner, while engaged in devotion? The fact proves that in time of real danger, the church and the attitude of prayer are no safer than other places and positions.

ILLUSTRATIVE of the fanaticism often engendered by the Christian religion, we will mention the case of a beautiful young lady in Honsdale, Pennsylvania, who not long since, by frequent attendance at church, and brooding over the doctrines she had heard there, became the victim of the hallucination that she had committed "the unpardonable sin," which made her extremely despondent. Fearing she might do herself harm her father had a watch kept over her, but having occasion to leave town one day the person he left in charge of her was negligent in his duty, and she constructed an altar of combustible material near one corner of the house, and having set fire to it she threw herself upon it. She was burned to a crisp when found by her father on his return. Previous to immolating herself, she wrote a letter to her father:

"MY DEAR FATHER: My Immanuel appeared to me today. He revealed to me the fact that I have committed the unpardonable sin, which I can only obtain forgiveness for by passing through the cleansing of fire. I will intercede for you, my dear father. Bury my ashes on Immanuel's ground, at the north-east corner of the house."

Meet me on the Eternal Ground, Chrissy.
Of all the causes of insanity the world has ever known, none have been more prolific than the Christian religion.

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

An Able Advocate of Spiritual Philosophy and General Reform.

S. S. JONES, EDITOR,

J. R. FRANCIS, ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

Established 1865; Burned up October 9, 1871; Re-established and Issued October 10, 1871.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, Adams Street and Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

Te s, $3.00 per Year, in Advance.

SPECIMEN COPIES FREE. The Religio-Philosophical Journal is a large eight-page paper; printed on fine, heavy paper, and universally acknowledged as

THE LEADING SPIRITUALIST PUBLICATION IN THE WORLD.

With able and careful correspondents, both in this country and Europe, it is able to and does, each week, present to its readers the latest phenomena, essays of great power and research and all items of interest bearing upon the subject. The recent extraordinary attention the subject of Spiritualism is attracting and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless and widely circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL 3 months for 30 cts.

AS AN ADVERTISING MEDIUM,

We assert without hesitation, that it is unsurpassed by any publication with the same circulation in the world. Hundreds of advertisers will testify to the beneficial results flowing from their use of our advertising columns. All legitimate advertisers are solicited to give the JOURNAL a trial, with the assurance on our part that they will meet with square and liberal treatment.

JNO. C. BUNDY, Secretary,
Adams Street and Fifth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

GOLDEN AGE.

Capital Stock $100,000.

Enlargement of Circulation, Improvement in Form, Increase of Attractions.

On the first of January, the financial and business management of the Golden Age passed into the hands of the GOLDEN AGE PUBLISHING COMPANY, which is composed of enterprising and energetic gentlemen of experience, who will spare no pains to extend its circulation, and give it a leading place among the weekly journals of the country.

The Golden Age will be the organ of no man, party or sect, but a broad, progressive, undenominational paper, representing the most advanced thought of the age, devoted to politics, science, religion and society.

WILLIAM T. CLARKE,

its editor-in-chief, is widely and favorably known as one of the most able, brilliant, and forcible writers in the country. Mr. Clarke will be assisted by a corps of famous contributors, and the literary department of the Golden Age will be of such a character as to insure its careful perusal by wide-awake readers, well-to-do families, and enterprising business men.

KID GLOVES GRATIS.

The Golden Age offers the most liberal premium ever before presented, viz:

A pair of Ladies' Elegant Two-Button Kid Gloves to every new subscriber.

Thousands of people from all sections of the country appreciate this generous inducement, and the subscription list is rapidly increasing.

We also offer to new subscribers who may prefer them, the two elegant chromos:

"The Falls of Minnehaha," and "The Gorges of the Yo-Semite,"

or the handsome "FLOWER PIECE," the best chromos ever produced.

Terms of the Golden Age, post-paid, $3.00.

The Golden Age, one year, including a beautiful pair of Ladies' Two-Button Kid Gloves, any size or color, $3.25.

The Golden Age, one year, including the Flower Piece, or both the landscape chromos, unmounted, $3.00.

The Golden Age, one year, including mounted chromos, $3.50.

Address,

GOLDEN AGE,

Box 2848 New York.

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Eating For Strength.

A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

Scottish Western Loan Co.,

G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,

Bankers,

Le Roy, Minnesota,

GEN'L SUPPLY AGENCY,

BRANCH OFFICE, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

H. B. BROWN Sec'y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner. Interest collected and paid annually at Gilman, Son & Co.'s Bank, 47 Exchange Pl. New York. No expense to loaner. Title and security guaranteed in every loan made by us. We pay 9 per cent. until money is invested.

The Agency will purchase and forward goods in any quantity to any part of the United States, and transact any business whatever for parties living at a distance, thereby SAVING to the purchasers from

20 TO 50 PER CENT.

The Agency is also prepared to transact any business that may be entrusted to them, such as effecting Insurance on Life and Property, renting property and collecting rents, searching records and examining titles, procuring legal advice, negotiating the sale or exchange of real estate, investing money for capitalists, obtaining desired information, and imparting advice other than legal; in short, we will undertake the execution of any legitimate business which persons in the country may require to have done in New York City.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO

LIFE INSURANCE

On the most SAFE and reliable plan.

PRICE LIST OF CLOTHING.

Grey Union Sack Overcoats,	$5 50 to $6 50
Black Wool Sack Overcoats,	8 00 to 10 00
Blue Chinilla ditto,	9 00 to 11 00
Mixed Fur Beayer Overcoat,	14 00 to 16 00
Grey Reefing Jackets,	3 50 to 4 75
Black All Wool Sack Coats,	8 00 to 9 50
Black Cloth Frock Coats,	6 50 to 8 50
Black All Wool ditto,	8 50 to 15 50
Black Union Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 2 50
Black All Wool ditto,	2 50 to 4 00
Union Cassimere Sack Coats,	4 00 to 5 50
All Wool ditto,	6 00 to 8 00
All Wool Cassimere Suits,	13 00 to 17 00
Cassimere Pants and Vest,	7 00 to 9 00

Spring and Summer Clothing.

Cottonade Suits cut in Sacks and Walking Coats, from	6 50 to 8 00
Light Weight, all wool, Fancy Cassimere Suits cut in sacks and walking coats,	10 50 to 20 00
Cottonade Pants lined and unlined,	1 50 to 2 50
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants,	2 50 to 7 50
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants and Vests,	4 00 to 8 00
Spring Overcoats in Cassimere,	9 00 to 20 00
Light worsted Coats and Vests, all designs,	7 00 to 20 00
Black cloth Frock Coats,	6 00 to 16 00
Black cloth Sack Coats,	4 50 to 6 50
Union and all wool Black-Doekskin Pants,	2 50 to 9 00
Union and all wool Black Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 5 00
Linen Sack Coats,	1 00 to 2 00
Linen Pants,	1 00 to 2 00
Linen Vests,	1 00 to 2 00
White Duck and Marseilles Vests, all designs,	2 00 to 5 00
Alpaca Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Blue Flannel Sack Coats,	4 00 to 7 50
Heavy Satinet Suits, various styles,	7 00 to 8 50

The above articles of clothing are all of Superior Quality, good material, and well made, and are not surpassed by any in this city.

Measurements for clothing should include length of limbs, circumference of body over chest and stomach.

Dry Goods!

Cassimeres, all colors, per yard,	75 to 2 00
Black Doeskins,	1 00 to 2 00
Broadcloth (double width)	2 00 to 5 01
Calicoes (by piece)	07 to 12
Ginghams	10 to 10
Dress Goods	25 to 30
Alpaccas	21 to 32
Brown Sheeting,	8 to 16
Bleached Sheeting,	7 to 10
Hosiery (all colors) per dozen,	1 25 to 4 00

Millinery and Dress Goods.

Fine French Silk, per yard,	.50 to 2 00
Toquay Silk,	.60 to 1 00
Turquoise Silk,	.40 to 1 00
Fancy Satin and Silk, (remnants)	1 00
Cotton and Silk, (mixed)	.50
White English Grape,	.50 to 1 50
Ribbons,	.30 to .40
Gross Grain Sash Ribbons,	.20 to .40
Velvet, any color,	.20 to .40
Bridal Net, wide,	.50
Bonnet Frame Lace, per dozen,	.80 to 3 00
Kid Gloves, per pair,	.90 to 1 40
Ostrich Feathers, each,	1.00 to 4 00

Miss Nellie Henderson will give her personal attention to the Millinery Department, and will fill all orders for articles of whatever kind, not mentioned above, at as low a price as can be bought of any one or any-where.

ORDERS FOR GROCERIES

Of not less than 5 lbs.

Will be promptly filled at wholesale prices, adding 5 per ct. on sums over $20 and 10 per ct. on sums less than $20.

COFFEE.

Green,	No. 1, 35 cts., No. 2, 30 cts.
Roasted,	No. 1, 37 cts., No. 2, 33 cts.

TEAS.

Oolong,	25 to 60 cents per pound.
Japan,	45 to 95
Young Hyson,	35 to 1.15
Imperial,	40 to 90
Twa Kay,	25 to 40
Eng. Breakfast,	40 to 90

ORDERS FOR

HATS, CAPS and FURS.

Wool Hats	from .45 to 60 cts. apiece.
Fur Hats	.80 to $4.00
Silk Hats	$2.00 to $3.00
Cloth Caps	.75 to $1.50

Furs from $2.50 to $60.00 per Set.

BOOTS and SHOES.

Boots, Calf, (pegged)	$2.75 to $6.00 per pr.
(sewed)	2.00 to 7.00
" coarse, (pegged)	2.25 to 4.50
Shoes,	1.00 to 5.00

Families and neighbors by ordering not less than a dozen can obtain "bottom" prices, while cost of freight will be correspondingly reduced.

SPECIAL ATTENTION

Given to purchasing

Sewing Machines, Jewelry

and Musical Instruments.

We can furnish most of the older Sewing Machines at 20 to 40 per cent. less than retail price.

We can send a superior two-thread hand machine for $13. Also a superior Shuttle Machine complete for $20.

We will also make selections for

Public and Private Libraries,

Or procure any single book that may be ordered.

We can supply Agents with fast selling and profitable Novelties and Notions, and Merchants with Job Lots from Auction.

MERCANTILE COLLECTIONS.

On collections less than $50, twenty per cent.

On collections exceeding $50, ten per cent.

OBTAINING PATENTS.

From $25 to $100.

Negotiating the Sale or Exchange of Real Estate, from 2 to 5 per cent.

The commission for procuring Legal Advice, and for investing Capital, will be fixed by correspondence.

Confidential letters requiring labor and research, should include a fee adequate to the service required, but all letters of simple enquiry, enclosing stamp, will receive prompt attention.

RULES AND CONDITIONS OF THE AGENCY.

All orders for the purchase of Goods, must be accompanied with the funds in the form of Postal Order, Check, or Draft on New York City, or money in Registered Letter.

All orders and directions for shipping or mailing articles must be written plainly and fully, to prevent loss, delay and trouble.

Collections, balances and remittances promptly remitted at the risk of the Agency.

Care must be taken in ordering goods to avoid mistakes, as it will be impracticable to return articles shipped.

All goods guaranteed as represented.

RATES OF TRANSPORTATION:

By mail, 4 lb. packages, or less, 8 cents per lb.
By Fast Freight, about 2 cents per lb.
By Express when great dispatch is of more account than cost.

For their respectability, integrity, and ability, the Agency are permitted to refer to the following well-known gentlemen:

W. I. GILCHRIST, McGregor, Iowa.
FRANK LARRABEE, "
MORRIS ALTMAN, New York.
GILMAN, SON & CO, 47 Ex. Place, N. Y.
L. MANZ, Lyons, Iowa.
D. M. BENNETT, Ed. TRUTH SEEKER.
D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill.

Parturition without Pain.

EDITED BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Editor of the Herald of Health.

CONTENTS:

1. Healthfulness of Child-Bearing.
2. Dangers of Preventions.
3. Medical Opinions as to escaping Pain.
4. Preparation for Maternity.
5. Exercise during Pregnancy.
6. The Sitz Bathing and Bathing generally.
7. What Food to Eat and what to Avoid.
8. The Mind during Pregnancy.
9. The Ailments of Pregnancy and their Remedies.
10. Female Physicians, Anæsthetics.

To which are added:

1. The Husband's Duty to his Wife.
2. Best Age for Rearing Children.
3. Small sickly people become Parents?
4. Small Families.
5. Importance of Physiological Adaptation of Husband and Wife.
6. Celibacy.
7. Effects of Tobacco on Offspring.
8. Latest Discoveries as to the determining the sex of Offspring.
9. Father's vs. Mother's Influence on the Child.
10. Shall Pregnant Women Work?
11. Effects of Intellectual Activity on number of Offspring.
12. Size of Pelvis, and its relation to healthful Parturition, etc., etc.

What is said about "Parturition without Pain."

Godley's Lady's Book says: "We give our cordial approbation to this work, and would like to see it in the hands of every mother in the land. The information it contains is most important, and, we are fully convinced, reliable."

Price, by mail, $1.00. Address

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

A Valuable Home Book for Women.

Talks to my Patients

HINTS ON GETTING WELL AND KEEPING WELL.

BY MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

Table of Contents:

Growing Girls; Menstruation; Amenorrhea; Menorrhagia; Dysmenorrhea; Prolapsus Uteri; Leucorrhœa; Pregnancy; Approaching Confinement; Delivery; After Delivery; Care of the Breasts; After Confinement; Bathing of Babies; Dress of Infants; Nursing; Weaning; Feeding of Infants; Infantile Diseases; Diseases of Children; Children's Dress; Confidential to Mothers; Intentional Abortion; Accidental Abortion; Sterility; Nervous Derangements; Sleep; Indigestion; Constipation; Menopause, or Change of Life.

It is a most Valuable Work, and should be in the hands of every Lady.

Price, $1.50 by mail. Sold by
D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER.

Buy the Best. Price $7.50.

SIXTY THOUSAND SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

Medal awarded at the N. Y. State Fair, 1874; First Premium at Western N. Y. Fair, 1874; 12 State Fair Premiums taken the past year; also, Silver Medal of Honor at Penn. State Fair, 1874.

This gem of a Washing Machine has claims on public attention that few machines possess.

We have tried it and find it all that it is claimed for it.—West Rural.

We have thoroughly tested the Calkins' Champion Washer and find it in all respects simple, durable and cheap; efficient in its work, and capable of doing all that is claimed for it. We endorse the Champion and recommend the firm.—Prairie Farmer.

We have seen the machine in operation, and feel safe in recommending it to our readers.—Moore's Rural New Yorker.

Almost every family will buy it, after seeing it in use. Send for descriptive Circulars and Terms to Canvassers.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER CO.,

106 Chambers Street, New York, and 207 South Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

Having made special arrangements with the Company, we can send it by Express to all parts of the country, at the Company's price. In connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER, we send it at a greatly reduced price.

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York

HULL'S CRUCIBLE;

A Wide-awake Spiritualistic and Social Reform Journal.

Prominent among the reforms advocated in HULL'S CRUCIBLE are the following:

1. REFORMS IN RELIGION, such as shall do away with many of the outward forms and restore the power of godliness.

2. REFORMS IN THE GOVERNMENT, such as shall do away with the Rings, Cliques and Monopolies, and put all matters concerning the Government of the People into the hands of the People.

3. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, such as shall secure to Labor, the producer of Capital, the control of Capital.

4. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF THE SEXES TO EACH OTHER, such as shall secure to every member of each sex the entire control of their own person, and place Prostitution in or out of Marriage for money or any other cause, out of the question.

Any thought calculated to benefit humanity, whether coming under any of the above, or any other propositions, will find a cordial welcome in the columns of HULL'S CRUCIBLE.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE joins hands with all Reforms and Reformers of whatever School, and welcomes any ideas, however unpopular, calculated to benefit humanity.

Those interested in a live Reformatory Journal, are invited to hand in their subscriptions.

TERMS:

One Subscription, 52 numbers - - - $2.50
" " 26 " - - - 1.25
" " 13 " - - - 0.65

All Letters, Money Orders and Drafts should be addressed,

MOSES HULL & CO.,

24 Newcomb St., Boston,

J. M. FOLLETT.

E. B. HILL.

SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid:
Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz.
Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz.
All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in
Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles,
Oils, etc., etc.

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.

BEST AND CHEAPEST

SEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

till Apl. 15. R. H. SHUMWAY, Rockford, Ill.

No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Free-thought and Miscellaneous Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty. Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich.

"Common Sense."

A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.

A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, Etc., Etc.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors.

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions.

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per Annum, Post-paid. Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,
236 Montgomery St.,
San Francisco, Cal.

BOOKS!

BOOKS!!

D. M. BENNETT, Editor Truth Seeker.

Wishes the Public to remember he is prepared to furnish Scientific, Liberal, and Progressive Works of all kinds.

Books by the following Modern Authors kept in Stock:

Huxley,
Darwin,
Tyndall,
Herbert Spencer,
J. Stuart Mill,
Froude,

L. Fuorbach,
Dr. Louis Buechner,
Thomas Buckle,
Louis Figuier,
Sir John Lubbock,
Charles Bradlaugh

Robt. Dale Owen,
Stephen Pearl Andrews,
A. J. Davis,

Prof. Wm. Denton,
B. F. Underwood,
Hudson Tuttle,

Henry C. Wright,
Dr. A. B. Childs,

Maria M. King,
M. B. Craven,
D. D. Home,
M. and D. W. Hull

As well as numerous other authors.

Books on

Science,
The Arts,
Medicine,
Theology,
Law,
History,
Biography,
Literature,
Romance,
Poetry.

And all Miscellaneous Subjects furnished at Publisher's Prices, and sent by Express or Mail as directed.

Address

D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY.

D.M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED, AND PRICED SEED ANNUAL
1875
Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.
Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

Odds and Ends.

'Tis naught when woman humbugs man,
For that's the good old style;
But, oh, man's confidence in man
Makes countless thousands smile.

A CIRCUIT preacher in Missouri prayed, for rain one night at a farmer's house, and the farmer, who had a horse race arranged for the next day, was so mad that he turned the good man out of doors.

CONVERSATION at breakfast table: Smith—"Ain't John late in bringing the mail this morning?" Jones—"I guess there is something on the postal cards that he doesn't understand, and has to read them the second time."

A SOOTHING PROMISE.—"Be easy," said a rich invalid to his son-in-law, who was every hour perplexing him with complaints of his wife's misbehaviour. "Be easy, I say: as her behavior is so very blameable, I will alter my will and cut her off with a shilling." The old man heard no more of his daughter's failings.

AN absent-minded professor in going out of the gateway of his college ran against a cow. In the confusion of the moment he exclaimed, "I beg your pardon, madam." Soon after he stumbled against a lady in the street; in sudden recollection of his former mishap he said, "So that's you again, you brute!"

It is reported that a man went home at about three o'clock on Wednesday morning, and using his umbrella for a billiard cue smote his sleeping wife in the short ribs, crying "Pool," and sunk into a sweet slumber. He has since explained to his wife that women can have no idea how the cares of business will sometimes affect a man's brain.

EPITAPH ON THE TOMBSTONE OF AN OHIO WOMAN.

Neuralgia worked on Mrs. Jones
'Till 'neath the sod it laid her.
She was a worthy Methodist,
And served as a crusader.
Her obsequies were held at two,
With plenty of good carriages.
Death is the common lot of all,
And comes as oft as marriages.

A VALENTINE.

I dearly lov the singin' bird
And little buzzin' bee,
But dearer far than all the world
Is thy sweet voice to me.
Oh, very deep is daddy's well,
And deeper is the sea,
But deeper in my buzzum is
The lov I bear for thee.
Then smile on me, dear Angeline,
And make my heart feel lite;
Chain the big dog and I will cum
A courtin' Sunday nite.

A HASTY man, with his arms full of his wife's baggage, thought he was left by the train last night, and running rapidly across a platform fell over a truck. He straddled one of the handles and rode it for a second, lunged forward and got his legs tangled up in the cross pieces, when the malicious thing reared up and slid forward just enough to throw the man off his balance and get him down; he blacked his eye, broke his spectacles against the handles, and ran over his foot with the wheels, and even after he got away from it and was seated in the car, he says the truck ran after him and kicked him in the ribs twice before the brakeman could get it away from him.

A MARRIAGE between a young couple recently took place in one of the southern tiers of counties in this state. The young lady was very precise and discreet, and would not allow her lover the felicity of hugging and kissing which young people indulge in so ardently and which is so much desired. She deemed it more proper such exercise should be deferred till after marriage. After this interesting ceremony took place, this city was taken in in their bridal tour, and they stopped at one of our up-town hotels. He engaged a room with two beds, and told her as he should necessarily be absent on business she had better retire and not wait for him. She did retire but remained awake. The young husband came in at a late hour and immediately occupied the vacant bed. After a few minutes he breathed heavily and she became impatient and thus spoke to him:

"My dear, are you asleep?"
"No, love," was the response.
"Darling," said she, "you have not kissed me since our marriage."

A loud snore was the answer to this.
"You are as mean as you can be," said she.

"What is the matter, my love?" he enquired as he raised his head.

"You don't love me," she cried, real tears suffusing her eyes.

"Yes I do, my little duck," said he tenderly, "but you know we don't believe in affectionate demonstrations. That is why, you know, I never kissed you."

"But, now that we are married," said she, bursting out with a cry, "I'd—rather—have—some—demonstrations."

Like a good fellow, he got up and joined her, when, we have every reason to believe, "demonstrations" took place, which rendered her happy.

A PHILOSOPHIC DARKEY.—A correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from the Columbia river in the war times, gave the following humorous account of a colloquy with a philosophic darkey:

I noticed upon the hurricane deck to-day an elderly darkey with a very philosophical and retrospective cast of countenance, squatted upon his bundle toasting his shins against the chimney, and apparently plunged in a state of profound meditation. Finding upon enquiry that he belonged to the 9th Illinois, one of the most gallantly behaved and heavily losing regiments at Fort Donaldson battle, and part of which was aboard, I began to interrogate him upon the subject. His philosophy was so much in the Falstaffian vein that I will give his views in his own words, as near as my memory serves me:

"Were you in the fight?"
"Had a little taste of it, sah."
"Stood your ground, did you?"
"No, sah, I runs."
"Run at the first fire, did you?"
"Yes sah, and I would have run soonah, had I knowd it war coming."

"Why, that wasn't very creditable to your courage."

"Dat isn't in my line, sah—cookin's my profeshun."

"Well, but have you no regard for your reputation?"

"Reputation's nothin to me by the side of life."

"Do you consider your life worth more than other people's?"

"It's worth more to me, sah."

"Then you must value it very highly?"

"Yes, sah, I does—more den all dis world—more dan a millions ob dollars, sah, for what would that be wuth to a man with the bref out of him? Self-preserbashun is the fust law wid me."

"But why should you act upon a different rule from other men?"

"Because different men sets different values upon dar lives—mine is not in the market."

"But if you lost it, you would have the satisfaction of knowing that you died for your country."

"What satisfaction would dat be to me when de power of feelin' was gone?"

"Then patriotism and honor are nothing to you?"

"Nufn, whatever, sah—I regard dem as among de vanities."

"If our soldiers were like you, traitors might have broken up the government without resistance."

"Yes sah, dar would had been no help for it. I wouldn't put my life in de scale 'ginst no goberment that eber existed, for no goberment could replace de loss to me."

"Do you think any of your company would have missed you if you had been killed?"

"Maybe not, sah—a dead white man ain't much to dese sogers, let alone a dead nigga—but I'd a-missed myself, and dat was de pint wid me."

It is safe to say that the dusky corpse of that African will never darken the field of carnage.

Positively

$50,000 Worth of Information

given for 60 cents, concerning Fowls, Eggs and Chickens.

BY A CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep hen-roosts and nests free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in winter. How to prevent hens from ever wanting to set, and how to make them set. How to preserve eggs good one year. An easy plan to do it. Enclose 60 cents with order for full directions. Address,

E. D. BLAKEMAN,
Circleville, O.

Sexual Physiology.

BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. With eighty fine engravings. AGENTS WANTED.

SYNOPSIS OF TABLE OF CONTENTS.

The Male Organs of Generation.
The Female Organs of Generation.
The Origin of Life.
Sexual Generation.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Impregnation.
Pregnancy.
Embryology.
Parturition.
Lactation.
The Law of Sex.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Theory of Population.
The Law of Sexual Intercourse.
Hereditary Transmission.
Philosophy of Marriage.

This work has rapidly passed through twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Prof. Wilder, of Cornell University, says it is the best work of its kind published.

Price, by mail, $2.00. Sold by
D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE
Heathens of the Heath,
A ROMANCE,
Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL.

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH
PRIESTCRAFT. THE MISSION-

ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shewn up.

A perusal of it will open

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will Regret the Investment.

It contains nearly 450 pages. 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper,
and gotten up in excellent style.
Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00
In Cloth, neatly bound..... 1.50
Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
New York.

DR. WM. HALL'S

BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMP-
TIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH.

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere.
Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING
AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.
CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.
CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.
CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.
CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.
Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S OXYGENATED BITTERS.

The OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSLEY'S

Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in
One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.
JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,
Proprietors,
8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION,
FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 14. { D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, MARCH 15, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY,
SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker,

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

HOLLAND now has 12,000 windmills in operation, at an estimated annual cost of $4,000,000.

THERE are estimated to be about 55,000 babies born every year in Paris, of which number 20,000 are put out to nurse.

MRS. GERIT SMITH soon followed her distinguished husband to the grave. He died in December, and she a few days ago.

It has been colder in Sweden this winter than in any other civilized country. In Furudal the thermometer marked sixty degrees below zero.

A CLERGYMAN at Taunton, Mass., lately asked his parishioners to reduce his pay, as many members of his church had lately suffered a reduction in theirs. They cheerfully complied. This is decidedly out of the usual course of things.

THE church of the Rev. A. B. Burdick, at Westerly, R. I., do not accept his denial that he is innocent of the charge of nest-hiding, since that denial is not supported by any evidence beyond his own word. They think him guilty, and he will probably have to step down and out.

JACOB'S EXAMPLE THE BEST.—"Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice and wept." His example cannot be too highly commended. It were better for a man to utter forty penitent howls than to write one letter of contrition, or to utter falsehoods and say he didn't do it.

AN English scientist, by way of experiment, injected absinthe into the veins of some dogs, for which he was fined by an English magistrate for cruelty to animals. Shortly afterward the French Academy of Sciences awarded him a prize of $500 for his scientific researches.

IN China the bamboo is extensively cultivated. There are no less than sixty different species of it, and it is used for almost everything. Out of it are made baskets, beds, chairs, mats, pipes, brooms, matches, umbrella ribs, and ever so many kinds of household and agricultural implements.

JOHN RUSKIN has just given £7,000 to buy a piece of land in England, to be cultivated by men of like sentiments with his own, all of them to work with their own hands, and no machinery to be allowed. This sum is to serve as a nucleus for other gifts, and all of them together to be called St. George's Fund.

A CLERGYMAN in Fond du Lac, Wis., publicly prayed: "Oh, Lord, Thou knowest that my hated wife is the one great obstacle in the way of a revival in my church. Wilt Thou, in Thy goodness, remove her?" The next day the wife removed herself to her father's house, and now the petitioner is likely to be removed by his congregation.

ANOTHER DEPRAVED MINISTER.—The Rev. Mr. Miles, late pastor of the American Methodist church, at Norwich, Conn., who decamped with the church funds and a strange woman, has been heard from in New Hampshire, where he had traveled about, taking collection "for a church in Norwich." The public are warned against him by the Zion's Herald.

A NOVELTY in the mode of hanging criminals was recently introduced at Newgate, England. Instead of erecting the usual scaffold above ground, a pit was dug in the soil, and a trap-door made level with the ground opening into the pit. The convict was pinioned by the executioner on the top of the trap, and at a given signal the drop fell, and the unfortunate ceased to live.

BEECHER KNOWS, and also his friends know, that nothing can be kept back. The whole truth must be evolved. This case is one of life or death with him, and his appearance before the judge and jury will recall the manner in which the gladiators saluted the throne: Ave Caesar, moriturus vos saluto, ("Hail, Caesar, we who are about to die, thus salute you.") All feel that this trial imperils destinies hardly inferior to those of national importance.—Troy Times.

FALLIBLE CLERGYMEN.—Rev. George O. Eddy, was recently deposed for bigamy at Gloversville, N. Y., and now his successor, Rev. Mr. Edgerton, is charged with theft. He boarded at the Mansion House, and in his room the other day a servant found a quantity of stolen napkins, towels, etc., packed in a valise. He was arrested, and left his watch in payment of his board bill. Edgerton is a man about forty-five years of age, has a cork leg, a brassy face, and remarkably talkative.

A BENEVOLENT gentleman from Vermont applied to a Boston gentleman for aid in sending a Vermont missionary to Turkey. The reply was as follows: "I have invested much in Vermont securities, and lost many thousands by the acts of your railroad men, sustained by the people and the courts. I have also lived in Turkey, and had much intercourse with her people. I would far rather give my money to send Turks as missionaries to Vermont."

If the Beecher-Tilton scandal does not improve the morality of the people it adds several remarkable phrases to literature, such as "stepping down and out," "hanging on the ragged edge," and "nest-hiding." And here comes a Miss Anderson of Virginia, who sues Capt. Blackburne for breach of promise, stating also that she has intrusted him with several thousand dollars of her money, and has been to him "a wife in every sense the word implies."

THE trial of a clergyman is in progress at Knoxville, Tenn. Several months ago the Rev. Archibald Hines was accused of stealing fifty cents from a bowl in a cupboard in the house of a member of his congregation. An interesting scandal arose. Mr. Hines declared it was all a conspiracy to ruin his reputation and drive him from his pulpit. The suit now in court is brought by him against his accuser for slander. Already over thirty witnesses have testified, and the end is not.

IT IS NOW THOUGHT PROBABLE Mrs. Tilton may be placed upon the witness stand. Tilton's lawyers express their perfect willingness to the same, and everybody says "aye." While we are about it let us have the whole truth. Mrs. T., in all probability, knows quite as much about the matter at issue as any one. Let her be heard; also Susan B. Anthony, Mrs. Stanton, Mrs. Woodhull, Henry C. Bowen, Thomas Kinsella, Joseph Howard, and F. B. Carpenter. Let all be called who know anything about this delectable business. When all have had their say may we have peace!

THE BEECHER TRIAL.—The tenth week of this elephantine infliction has nearly passed, and we hope ten weeks more will complete it. The defense have spent two weeks in examining their witnesses, and up to the present writing nothing has been produced to set aside the points made by the plaintiff, but rather corroborates his evidence. The great effort seems to be to blacken Tilton's character, hoping thereby to whiten Beecher's. But it will not avail. Tilton's crimes will not establish Beecher's innocence. It is even doubtful if "the fountain of blood from Emanuel's veins," which he so greatly extols, will wash all his stains away. It is feared they are too indelible to be easily removed.

THE QUEER COMPLICATION OF PLYMOUTH CHURCH.—The scene presented in Plymouth church, March 11th, is one that has never had a parallel, and it is to be hoped never may—a minister preaching to a church, one of whose members has just sworn in court that he confessed to her his adultery with another member, while a third member has been charged by the minister (through his lawyer) with being a "conspirator" against his reputation, and retorts by pronouncing the charge a "malignant fabrication," and daring his pastor to call him into court.—Springfield Republican.

RELIGION GONE STARK MAD.—The revivalist, Hammond, has been trying his skill upon little children in San Francisco, by getting up a revival meeting for children ranging from four to twelve years of age. By Hammond and a half-dozen associates, these little susceptible fellows are told in impassioned language that "they are great sinners, and will inevitably go to hell and be burned forever, unless they at once come to Jesus, and are washed in his blood." It is not strange they should become excited and go through the form of "getting religion." "Little tads" of four, six and eight years confess themselves great sinners, but when asked what particular wrongs they have committed they cannot remember them. How wrong thus to force upon the tender minds of children the dogmas and absurdities of theology! Better that they never hear them until they arrive at mature years. It requires many years in after life to disabuse the mind of the errors and fallacies imbibed in childhood, and so persistently inculcated by priests and Sunday-school teachers. It is far better to instruct them in the primary branches of education and how to conduct themselves, leaving creeds and dogmas until they are better able to judge them.

BURNS AND BEECHER.—The following poem was written by a Scotch woman, Mrs. Janet Wood, on the occasion of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher being appointed to deliver an oration, in New York, at the celebration of the Burns centennial, Jan. 25th, 1859. Part of it now reads as if it had been prophetic:

I hear the task has fa'n to you,
To gie the bard o' Ayr his due;

But use him weel—
He kept sweet charity in view,
E'en for the deil.

His wee, sma' fau'ts ye need nae tell—
Folks say ye're nae o'er guid yersel,
But deil may care;
Gin ye're but half as guid as Rab,
We'll ask nae mair.

Then dinna seek to find a flaw,
But o'er his fau'ts a mantle thraw,
And leave the rest
To Him wha made and tried th' heart,
He kens the best.

A century hence, and wha can tell
What may befa' your cannie sel'?
Some holy preacher
May tak the cudgels up for ane
Ca'd Harry Beecher.

I mak nae doubt, ye'd like tae ken
Wha 'tis taks up the auld quill pen
To write this rhyme;
The knoob'd be little worth—
I'm past my prime.

But when a lassie, young and fair,
I've wander'd aft by bonnie Ayr,
Wi' heartsome glee;
Ere fate's stern mandate sent me forth,
Far o'er the sea.

Still Scotia's hills, and Scotia's plains,
Her poets, and her poets' strains,
To me are dear;
A desert spring within my heart
May claim a tear.

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XIII.

Notwithstanding that when we last parted from Maurice Fitz Raymond and the volunteers, the party was but a few miles distant from Boston, the late rain storms had so ploughed up the roads, and had carried away so many rustic bridges, the task of regaining the town was no easy matter.

Still the soldiers, after a good night's rest, struggled onward in their course; although, during the whole day, at the evening of which we have now arrived, they had scarcely accomplished half a dozen miles; and it was not until after night had fallen, that they began to recognize their proximity to their final destination.

Maurice and Francis were, of course, congratulating themselves upon the happiness that awaited them individually in the agreeable surprise which their unexpected presence would afford Alice and Florence, although Fitz Raymond did not feel quite at ease in relation to the partial failure of the little expedition, and inclined to the belief that upon him and the other officer in charge, the censure of some of the authorities would probably fall somewhat heavily.

No one in the town had suspected that the party had met any reverse, or was on its way home, and ere the lights of the clustering houses began to twinkle in the distance, there was a sudden resolve on the part of more than one of the soldiers, not to resume the journey toward Cape Ann until they were better equipped and their numbers largely augmented.

All the inmates of the villa had been moving heaven and earth to influence the authorities to revoke the warrants that had been granted for the arrest of Alice and Martha—the latter having been brought under the ban of the gloomy ecclesiastics on the representations of Huskins and the Noose. Every effort to relieve the poor fugitives was in vain, however, and resulted only in an intimation, that those who made it were possibly just as amenable to the charge of witchcraft as the accused themselves.

Poor Mrs. Ravenswood was in a state of health so feeble that personally she could do but little. Florence, however, was all alive to the necessities of the case, and was in town daily, secretly endeavoring to reach the ear of the Governor. But, then, so frightful a hold had the superstition won upon him, and so closely was he surrounded by a host of the wildest and most cruel fanatics, that she discovered but very little hope in that direction.

In fact all the authorities, both lay and clerical, seemed to have lost even the slightest sympathy with humanity. Day after day petitions were pouring in upon them from those who, in a state of desperation at the dangers that threatened some beloved one upon whose head the fatal blow was about to descend, cared nothing for their own personal safety or interests. It was all to no purpose, for even when the case was of a nature to melt the most obdurate heart, the response was: "The enemies of the Lord must be exterminated!"

An offense against the State, no matter how heinous, was regarded as nothing, when compared with one against the Church. As in the case of the murder committed by the Noose with the rope which had gained for him the terrible sobriquet that clung to him with such pertinacity, blood might be shed with impunity, so long as the murderer acknowledged the ecclesiastical power, and declared it of supreme authority and divine origin. Hence the terrible darkness that overspread the land. All reason was clouded! A peal of thunder was the roar of an angry Deity, a flash of lightning was the appalling sweep of his revengeful scimitar, and the great winds that swept the unhealthy mists from valleys, were the breath of his wrath.

No executioner that ever stood by a dripping block, could be more hideous and blood-stained than the Christian God of the period. In the estimation of his cruel and misguided worshippers, his omnipotent arm was always raised to strike, and was never extended in love or compassion toward the majority of his children.

As a man is, so is his God. There are hells of ice, and hells of brimstone and fire. All ancient and modern Deities may be regarded as simply mirrors in which the people see themselves reflected, individually or collectively. There are in reality as many Gods as there are men, so long as the latter ignore the sublime and unified teachings of nature, or endow the creator with passions and pulses that are simply human. We can conceive of nothing more perfect or powerful than that which might be centered in a being formed as we are. Man, in some shape or other, or something that feels or thinks or acts like him, will be at the back of all mysterious forces. We will have a finger in the pie, somehow; and hence our great failure and inability to arrive at any proximate reasonable conclusion as to the true nature or character of that universal entity—the Great First Cause—the Father and Giver of Light.

When Titmouse knocked at the door of old Giles', it was speedily opened by the ferryman, who, with a keen perception of the dangers that surrounded him, at once saw that something of an unusual nature had occurred to induce such a scrap of mortality to visit him from the villa at that somewhat unseasonable hour.

"What's up now, Titmouse?" he asked, as he closed the door behind the dwarf.

"I have been to the ravine," returned the other "to see Red Wing and Firefly, but they were gone! They must have been surprised in some way, for when I entered the wigwam I saw things lying scattered about that they would not have left behind them if they had time to take them along.

"Fled from the wigwam!" exclaimed Giles, while the color faded from his cheek.

"Yes!" rejoined the dwarf, "and left a valuable bundle of furs behind them, which ought to be taken charge of by some one of them, if they ever come back again."

In a moment the ferryman was equipped as for a journey, and seizing his lantern he sallied forth, accompanied by the dwarf. He had, for the time being, transferred his vocation on the river to another party, as already observed, so that now he was free to visit the ravine. But not knowing the precise spot in which the lodge of the chief stood, he prevailed upon Titmouse to accompany him, who was in total darkness as to Martha and Alice having been secreted in the wigwam, or as to the fact that the bundle of furs belonged to Giles.

We all have some absurd weakness, however we may seek to disguise it; and that of Giles was a profound conviction that, at some period when he was on the river, his house would be forcibly entered by Indians or other thieves, and his furs, which were the apple of his eye, be stolen. Although brave as a lion, and of excellent judgment—nay, exceedingly keen and observant in other relations, upon this point he was at sea completely; and hence his little secret closet, already referred to, in which he kept these treasures beneath his own roof, and in which Alice had concealed herself for a short period on the night of her flight from the house of her friend in the town.

Even in this secure place, however, he found no relief; for, as we have already seen, he had removed his valuable package to the cave, in the hope of placing it beyond all casualties, although from what we have shown, it was obvious that, instead of adding to its security, he absolutely placed it in the highway of danger.

It was now, however, the case of his daughter and Miss Ravenswood that moved him to instant action; for although the exposed condition of his furs, which he knew to be in the wigwam, did not escape his notice, it was the fate of the poor fugitives which now overwhelmed him, and it was in the direction of its discovery that all his enquiries were now bent.

From what the dwarf had told him, he felt assured that Sloucher and Huskins had somehow become aware of their second place of refuge, and had pounced upon them, unexpectedly. He was satisfied that, had they not been surprised, they would have borne off the furs and all that was in the wigwam besides; for Red Wing had informed him that his property was safe and in good keeping. Now he determined to possess himself of it again, and bear it back to the little closet from which it had been removed so secretly, and there let it take its chance until he found an opportunity of disposing of it.

Having traveled at a round pace, it being unnecessary to light the lantern to make out the track, although it was quite dark enough, they soon reached the ravine. Here Titmouse took the lead, and in a few moments they were both standing in the deserted wigwam.

It was precisely as the dwarf had stated—the lodge was completely deserted, and evidently in haste; for there lay the furs, while various articles of Indian apparel and some valuable skins were scattered about. The fire was reduced to a few dying embers, from which the ferryman had lighted his lamp the moment he entered the place.

Silence the most profound reigned throughout the glen. There was not a sound to be heard in any direction. The place was voiceless. The Indians and the fugitives, for some cause, had had to make their escape from the spot without a moment's preparation.

This fact ascertained, the ferryman turned with his lantern to try and discover some traces of their flight outside, and to learn, if possible, the direction they had taken. With this intention, he was about to step from the wigwam, when he was suddenly confronted by a man in the doorway. It was John Langton, who, notwithstanding his half-promise to Red Wing not to approach the ravine, was so distressed and alarmed regarding the dangers that surrounded Martha, he could not resist stealing away for the purpose of satisfying himself, with his own eyes, that she had not sunk under the calamity that had befallen her.

Each man was an apparition to the other. But after the first start of surprise, old Dick revealed the true state of the case to Langton, who fairly staggered beneath its terrible weight. There was no time to be lost, however, so the two men, followed by the dwarf, started forth to inspect the ground about the wigwam.

Here they soon discovered the path that had been taken by the fugitives, and of the certainty of this they had the most complete evidence, for Titmouse picked from a thorny shrub, what turned out, upon examination, to be a piece of Martha's dress.

On they moved along the same narrow track until they reached the point where the horses had been standing, and where the fugitives had been gagged and bound.

Here they perceived the evidences of a most violent struggle, and the ground deeply indented and broken with the traces of horses' feet. This was a terrible disclosure; for obviously there was no flight of the Indians, but quite another affair, where the captors had escaped with their captives. But as to the identity of the former, no clear opinion could be arrived at for the time being; as evidently Sloucher or Huskins would have resorted to no such means of removing the fugitives had they fallen upon them, but have seized them in the wigwam.

However, there was no more to be done at the moment; for to add to their perplexity, they made out that two of the horsemen, whoever they were, had ridden off in one direction, while the remaining one had taken another; and it was to the fact of their having discovered the tracks of two horses on the one side and those of one on the other, that they found there had been three horses and three only went upon the mysterious occasion.

Returning to the wigwam with the determination of removing the furs and aught else of value, the two men and the dwarf were soon retracing their steps from the ravine, Langton carrying the bundle of furs and the others bearing off such things as they thought of any value.

They soon reached the ferryman's where they sat in agonized council for an hour; after which John and Titmouse started for the villa—the former telling old Dick that he should return early in the morning to take up the clue with him that they had discovered at the edge of the ravine.

Were it not for the all-pervading and inexorable exactions of the laws of Nature, or some laws that control us physically and metaphysically there would not be a sane man in existence. There would be no coherence in our being if our metaphysical and our physical selves were not, while in this state of existence, mutually dependent upon each other. It is while in that state of equilibrium arising from their mutual influence upon each other, that we escape being absolutely crazy on the one hand or mere sensual animals on the other. The body holds down the spirit and the spirit holds up the body. Give either full power over the other, and both are lost; for the spirit, regardless of the trammels of the flesh, would be continually attempting impossibilities; while, were the body wholly in the ascendant, we should not be removed above the beasts of the field. For our part, we should, were we driven to make a choice, accept the more ethereal calamity.

Madge Gordon might illustrate one side of this knotty question, with this exception, that there were moments of her existence in which some struggle seemed to be taking place in her being with a view to restoring its lost equilibrium. At times a gleam of reason shot athwart her darkened mind, and then she shrank back as from the memory of some terrible dream out of which she had just awoke. And hence, when she encountered the Fanatic at his own door, in the light of a sudden flash of returning reason as it were, she recoiled from him for an instant, as if sensible, for the period, that he was a foul thing. But soon the wonted cloud fell upon her again, and she who had once been noble and good, was once more the victim of the blind and bloody superstition that so frequently usurped her whole being.

Although bearing all the impress of age, Madge had not yet seen her fiftieth year. She had been married when quite young, but her husband, like the father of Alice, had fallen a victim to the Indians. She had had but one child, a daughter, who had been born after she had attained her twenty-second year, and who had grown up a beautiful girl until she reached the age of fifteen, when she became entangled in the meshes of a net woven by Sloucher, at the point where the family resided somewhere on the coast. The plot had been so mysterious and infernal, that the poor girl believed she had entrusted herself one night to the guardianship of a young minister whom she loved sincerely, and who adored her in return, and was pledged to make her his own within a few days. She awoke to a sense of her awful situation on finding that she had been betrayed into the arms of the villain Sloucher, and that the sunlight had departed from her forever.

She regained her mother's house, but ere she had recrossed the threshold her reason had given way completely, and the past was as blank to her as if it had never existed. No one suspected the Fanatic, and no one divined the true nature of the case, until little Titmouse was born—an occurrence which was followed an hour subsequently by the death of his unfortunate mother.

From this latter moment a veil fell over the reason of Madge, and she became gradually more and more lost to herself until a belief in the superstition of witchcraft seized upon her, and converted her into the wild fanatic that she had now so long been. Being unable to take care of the child, he was brought up by strangers until he at last was taken in charge by the Ravenswoods, who treated him with the utmost kindness, for which he displayed in return a fidelity not to be surpassed.

Sloucher, although finding his infamy had not been divulged by his victim, and presuming it was now buried forever, was, nevertheless, attracted toward Madge as though he would stand between her and the terrible secret. In the ruined state of her mind, he thought also, that he could convert her into an agent to work out his nefarious designs, whether in the line of his dark superstition, or in another, more reprehensible still, were such possible. In pursuance of his purpose he gained absolute ascendancy over the wreck of her reason, such as it was, and made her his slave.

The young minister who had been affianced to the mother of Titmouse died of a broken heart. He had given an old signet ring to his betrothed, which she wore on the night of her disaster. This ring was discovered by Sloucher lying on a table in the apartment from which the poor, ruined creature on becoming aware of her situation was preparing to fly. He had snatched it up hastily and thrust it into his pocket just before she disappeared. She seemed to have noticed the act before her reason gave way; for just before she breathed her last, she whispered to her mother, in a returning gleam of light, "Avenge me on him!" The poor distracted parent could make out no more, save the words, "The signet ring! He has robbed me of it! I know my love is dead!"

These were the only sentences that lived unimpaired in the memory of Madge. When not engaged in the work of persecution, they were ever present with her; but not having the power or the inclination to seek any further elucidation of them, she brooded over them in silence, and without ever uttering them to any one.

She had become perfectly familiar with the appearance of the signet, and had long cherished its form and peculiarity as something mysterious and solemn. She entertained the idea, also, that Titmouse was in some way connected with the ring, and that besides he had been left in her care.

This latter, however, did not at first appear to influence her affections to any great extent, although it subsequently seemed to awake in her bosom a more tender feeling toward the poor child, than she evinced toward any other soul living—her relation to Sloucher being simply of a wild and fanatical nature. Slight as this feeling was, however, it was sufficient to lead her to the villa quite frequently, where she met the dwarf, and where recently she appeared to take a growing pleasure in contemplating him from some retired corner.

But if she had no adequate idea of the relationship in which Titmouse stood to her, Sloucher, who had never lost sight of the child from the moment of his birth, was better informed; for he knew precisely how the whole case stood. And this it was that had attracted him to the villa in the first instance, although he evinced nothing but the most heartless curiosity toward the poor boy, who, by others, was regarded an orphan, and without any relatives living. When, however, his unholy eyes had fallen a few times on Alice, and when he considered what power he wielded among the fanatical brotherhood to which he belonged, other inducements began to draw him thither, until at last he found himself aspiring to control the religious ideas of the beautiful girl, so that he might ultimately coerce her into becoming his wife.

The result of all this, for so far, we have already seen, and now as Madge sat gazing gloomily into the clear fire, awaiting the appearance of Alice, who had always been kind and considerate to her whenever she visited the villa, the memory of the ring came upon her as usual, and in a singularly lucid interval the impression began to steal upon her, that she was about to participate in a foul wrong against Alice Ravenswood.

Before the veil fell again, and as if moved by some mysterious impulse, she took up the lamp from the table beside her, and entered the sleeping apartment already alluded to. Scarcely had she closed the door behind her, however, until all was dark once more, and she began moving about without any apparent aim or purpose. Soon, however, she noticed something gleaming on a small table close by the soft couch of the Fanatic, on which she had laid down the lamp. She looked again, and starting, seized it with a wild cry!

It was the signet ring! and scarcely had she clutched it, when she fell senseless to the floor, striking her head against a corner of the table as she descended.

The shock seemed to be attended with results the most singular, for before she had lain prostrate a minute, she regained her feet; and, passing her hand over her eyes, began to look about her in bewilderment. She still clutched the ring firmly, and her eye falling upon it once more, she replaced it where she had first discovered it, and, with a long and deep-drawn sigh, took up the lamp and retired from the room.

In the apartment which she now re-entered, all appeared strange to her. Had she awakened from a long and hideous dream? She had; for ere Madge Gordon resumed her seat, the cloud had passed away forever, and she was no longer the poor, crazed creature she had been for so many years. The sudden sight of the ring, and the shock experienced while falling, had in some mysterious way combined to restore her reason.

The occurrence that we have just narrated, took place shortly after nightfall, and a few moments subsequent to the period when the conspirators had set out on their infamous mission to the ravine. So that while the villain, Sloucher, was full in the assurance that his fiendish plot would soon terminate in accordance with his desires, heaven was preparing, beneath his own roof, an obstacle to its consummation, of which he could not anticipate the existence by any possibility whatever.

At first all seemed confused to Madge; but as she became gradually calmer, some instances of the past and the present began to impress themselves upon her understanding, which was acquiring more strength momentarily. The situation was strange and startling to her; but as she now felt her reason had been long prostrate in the dust, and that she must cherish its return without overtaxing it, she simply made up her mind to conceal her altered condition until she should learn more of the signet ring, and of the reasons why Alice Ravenswood was denounced as a witch, and secretly carried to the lonely residence of Solomon Sloucher.

In a single moment the mysterious light in which she had long viewed the Fanatic disappeared in the most forbidding gloom. All the weird charms of his wild superstition had lost their power over her; and she began to suspect that the man of whom she had been a blind and willing slave, she could not say how long, was a wretch that had the gratification of his own lustful and sordid views at heart only.

These reflections were passing through her newly-restored mind, when she heard the tramp of a horse outside. She arose to her feet, still dizzy and a little bewildered, and listened attentively. In a moment there was a loud knocking at the door. She hastened to open it, when the first object that met her eye was Sloucher with the helpless and half-unconscious form of Alice, gagged and bound in his long sinewy arms.

She recoiled from him as from a viper, but perceiving that the poor girl was almost suffering the agonies of death, she snatched the gag from her mouth, and winding her arms round the all but inanimate girl bore her into the adjoining apartment, while the villain Sloucher stepped out into the night, to lead the horse some distance from the house, and to set him free, so that he should regain the barnyard from whence he had been taken before his absence was discovered, or at least that he should not be encountered in the vicinity of the old and gloomy block house by any one who chanced to pass that way.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Professor Swing.

BY W. E. LUKENS.

Very few preachers stand in such prominence before the Western public as Professor Swing, of Chicago. His bold and fearless utterances of a theology somewhat in advance of old orthodoxy, has given him an audience extending far beyond the limits of the congregation that assembles to hear his earnest and eloquent discourses. His trial before the presbytery for heresy, and his subsequent withdrawal from the Church has contributed largely to his fame as an eloquent preacher and independent thinker, and has induced thousands to study his thoughts who would otherwise have passed him by without notice. There are very few, perhaps, of the many thousands who have read his sermons, but have been profited by them, even though they could not agree with him in all his conclusions. To his friends who reject the Bible as the infallible word of God, his arguments do not always seem to rest on well-established premises. But, assuming the Bible to be what the Church holds it to be, his logic may be faultless.

In the sermon Mr. Swing preached on Sunday, 24th of Jan., he manifested his usual benignant and tolerant spirit. He contends that the churches of to-day are not responsible for the Christian practices of former ages. For the persecutions of those times he has no need of apology. He admits that this history-loving age has thrown the Church into a little confusion. It is his present purpose to remove this embarrassment.

He says: "In the presence of such a history-loving age there is only time this morning to state that the Church of to-day cannot be held responsible for past conduct and past beliefs, unless that conduct and belief are still inculcated by the words of Christ. It can only be held responsible for what is still taught in its creed and revealed in its life. The awful catalogue of crimes, the array of silly or wicked doctrines, the hostility of the old Church to astronomy and all science, the cruelty of Christians toward the unbelieving, all this large indictment drawn up against the Church by Buckle, and Lecky, and Draper indicate only this: that the past held the words of Jesus without understanding them, and trampled divine ideas under foot as swine trample pearls into the mud."

The Christian Church has written its own history in ineffaceable characters. It is not made by others. It has opposed every innovation that outside influences have offered for the betterment of humanity, whether of science or philanthropy as long as opposition was possible. Then when it was obliged to admit the new idea, with supreme arrogance it has claimed to be its author. Mr. Swing says: "It (the Church) can only be held responsible for what is still taught in its creed and revealed in its life." Let the Church disclaim all interference with the consciences of others, let it cease its denunciations of good men for a simple difference of opinion, and none will charge her with the spirit that actuated the Christians of other times. The Church at any time is justly chargeable with her crimes and beliefs of that time; and is justly chargeable to-day with the spirit she exhibits to-day. Is she not intolerant to-day? Is she not hurling the ugly epithet of Infidelity at some of the wisest and truest philanthropists of the present? The spirit that marked her course in other years is her animating spirit now. She appealed to what she called an infallible authority then, she appeals to the same authority now. Mr. Swing bases his theology on the same. Are all who differ from him in their interpretation of this infallible book "trampling divine ideas under foot as swine trample pearls in the mud?" When did spurious Christianity end, and the genuine begin? Had John Calvin, the Scotch Presbyterians of the seventeenth century, and the Puritans of New England the true idea of the Christian religion?

Mr. Swing says: "Instead of writing a history of the Christian Church, Dr. Draper has given us what might be called a 'biography of fools.'"

Did not the Christian Church array itself on the side of the slaveholder in the heated discussion that preceded the downfall of that wretched institution? Are not many of them now using every influence in their power to have a clause inserted in the Constitution of the United States that will give them the constitutional power, if they can muster the legislative influence, to drive every Jew and Infidel from the country, as Torquamanda did the Jews and Moors of Spain? Why do they wish this power if not to exercise it? Would the history of the much boasted Puritans, the history of the Church in opposition to the Anti-Slavery movement, with its numerous sermons and pamphlets in proof of the divine institution of Slavery, and the more recent history of the attempt to obtain political power in the government be a "biography of fools" rather than the history of the Church through that period? Is the history of the trial of Swing by the Chicago Presbytery a "biography of fools," or is it a part of the history of the Presbyterian Church—the closing part, as the burning of Servetus was the beginning.

The writer of this has recently seen the principle of a school in a neighboring city excluded therefrom for the reason, as the directors averred, that "he was not orthodox." Yet he was acknowledged to be a superior educator. He had the friendship of all the patrons, except a few bigots, and of all the teachers and scholars without regard to religious opinions. They did not accuse him of the least taint of immorality, nor of teaching any kind of theology, inside or outside the school-room. But he did not teach their theology, though to have done so he would have violated State law. The directors cared nothing for honor, nothing for the good of the school, nothing for a violation of an implied contract, nothing for pecuniary loss imposed upon him and a weakly family—all must be sacrificed to gratify this bigotry. This is but an isolated case, but no doubt there are thousands such all over the country. Is the Church not responsible for such wicked intolerance now? Then where does their responsibility begin? Whether such history is the "biography of fools" or not, it is a history of the intolerance of Christianity to-day.

There are thousands of good men and women all over our country who cannot conscientiously adopt the dogmas of the Church, who are shorn of half their enjoyment of life by the persecution, the obloquy and contempt heaped upon them by the Christian Church of to-day, for which it is alone responsible, as it has been in all ages of its existence, for its wickedness and folly when they go as far toward punishing heretics as law and public opinion permits, it is not uncharitable to suppose that they would go to greater lengths if they had the power.

Rock Falls, Ill.

A SERIOUS row occurred a few days ago in Montreal in a Catholic church upon the occasion of Father Chiniquy's lecture. Sticks and stones were used and some heads were broken. A few shots from revolvers were fired but no one killed.

THE amount of coinage executed during the six months ending Dec. 31, 1874, at the mints in Philadelphia, San Francisco, and Carson has been in gold, $19,714,820; trade dollars, $2,546,100; subsidiary silver coins, $650,485; total, $22,911,405. During the same period the coiners have operated upon $16,579,817 of gold and silver bullion, at a loss of only $2,706 to the government, and of which loss at least two-fifths will be recovered at the annual settlement from sweepings, filings, etc. At the annual settlement of Mint accounts in June last, the entire loss on $142,744,097, gold and silver bullion operated upon was only $7,505. The sweepings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, amounted to $13,111.88.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 333 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

A Christian Letter.

We recently received the following pious, but not very gentlemanly letter, from a zealous Christian Elder in Alabama. If he had a little less faith and somewhat more of good manners, we think he would be considerably benefitted by the exchange. We forgive him for the lack of courtesy he exhibits, presuming he has done as well as he knew how. It is by no means uncommon for members of the clergy to forget to be gentlemen, and to deem it perfectly right to be insolent toward unbelievers. We will "consider the source," etc.

BROOKSVILLE, BLOUNT CO., ALA., Feb. 10, 1875.

MR. D. M. BENNETT:

SIR—Some of your poor, foolish, deluded readers of your abominable stuff, called THE TRUTH SEEKER, handed me No. 4, Vol. 2d, printed Oct. 15th, 1874, in which you tried to make sport of the Bible account of the flood. Now we don't wish to try to enter into any arguments with a man that does not believe, or is liar enough to say that there is no God, but will simply state that the power that brought on the flood, first created the animals and also Noah and his family, and of course that Power was sufficient to preserve those animals on the amount of food that Noah was directed to take into the Ark. But a man of your great self-conceited sense and learning might say there never was any flood.

I say there was just such a flood in times past as is represented in the Bible, and I am going to prove it by your God (Matter). Close to me, in Blount county, Ala., is a man by the name of H. Scott, who lives on a small free-stone gravelly ridge. This man Scott, last Summer digs a well, close to his house on this small ridge, and when he gets down some 36 or 37 feet, digging through clay and gravel, he comes to a chestnut stump that had been broken off from the main body of the tree, also limbs of trees imbedded in rich soil some two and a half or three feet thick, with a black, brackish water oozing out of the soil. He continued his well below this, through clay and gravel some thirty feet, and got no water, he then goes about one hundred yards farther on this same ridge and digs another well, and he comes to the same black soil with timber, &c., which hundreds of people can witness too. Also there is no large water course in twenty miles of these wells. Also there was another well dug in four miles of this place, and there was an Elevated ridge west of this well close by: some thirty or forty feet down in the well the man came to a poplar log, near two feet through. There was a skeptical man in our country that did not believe in a Bible flood, and he also would not believe that the log was in the well until he went down and examined for himself. These evidences show conclusively, that there was a great flood once, that washed the dirt and gravel from the high ridges and formed these small ridges on top of this soil, and timber where these wells have been dug.

But Sir, you in your self-conceited logic, will say that this timber would not last from the time of Noah's flood until now. But my logic says that when matter of any kind is entirely excluded from the action of the air, that it will remain in that condition thousands of ages. So the Christian has abundant proof of the flood, and the truth of the Bible, but you have nothing but your Infidel prejudices against it. If a man will cavil at the Bible, and Christian Religion, he must do so as much as the devil will give him power to do. There are some men who can find no wisdom any where, except in their own heads. Such men, however, are no judges of wisdom. We should not set up a Mouse to explain the great phenomenon of the Earth's Creation and formation. It is necessary that a man should be honest at least, and have a share of common sense before Christians need to discuss with them. A man that is born with his eyes open, and can look around on all created things, and say there is no God, no Christ, no Hell, no pure and vital Christian religion, is either a fool or a notorious lying Monster, who would wantonly tear down every thing that would give a foundation to truth, morality, virtue and a civil Government; and none but poor, deluded, sinful, degraded men will take, read or countenance such men's trashy writings.

Sir, your trashy Infidel notions can do the true Christian no harm, and especially in the world to come, because, according to your teaching of things, even bad Christians and the HEATHENS of the Heath will have as quiet a sleep in a state of nonentity, when this life ends, as you Infidels, but on the other hand, if you are wrong, an eternal hell will be your portion. What is the use for an Infidel to say anything about the Bible, when, according to their notions, mankind is just as safe without it as with it. Sir, we are fearful you are making merchandize of men's souls, and we are fearful you don't care, so you make a living by it in the present world. It is the blind leading the blind, and all will fall into the ditch. It would be far better for you, if you would leave off your writing, even if you had to take hold of the plow and grubbing hoe for an honest living.

Do just what you please with this composition, and be sure to read it every night before you say your Prayers. Yours in Christian sincerity, ELD. J. C. SHELTON.

Our Christian Elder evidently thinks he has given us a "knock-down" argument in favor of Noah's flood, but if he has nothing better to offer in proof of it than a poplar log or two in a gravel ridge, we fear the world will still remain in doubt as to that remarkable freshet. Doubtless he stated the facts correctly as to the finding of the logs, and it is also a good argument that, at some unknown time in the past, a flood or floods occurred in that locality. That local floods have occurred in nearly all parts of this and other countries, there are too many proofs to admit of a doubt. That great changes in the topography of the American continent have occurred in the past, we have the strongest evidence. These have been produced by floods alluvial deposits in the mouths and deltas of rivers, and more especially by tremendous upheavals that have from time to time occurred. In very early times the American continent was doubtless largely under water. That much of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska and other States, have been thus long submerged, there is abundance of evidence. The character of the prairie soil presents strong proof that it was once the bed of the sea. Sea shells have often been found in hills and elevated grounds one hundred feet at least above present water lines.

The upheavals of this continent have been tremendous; the extensive mountain ranges of the Alleghenies, the Andes and the Rocky Mountains, with the volcanoes and volcanic debris so frequently found, afford the strongest proof of this. This in part is the explanation of the deposits of gravel, earth and rock so often found over the coal strata of Pennsylvania and other coal districts. That these deposits or stratifications have been caused to some extent by local floods, but far more by upheavals, there is no room for doubt. Prostrate trees of different kinds of wood—similar to the cases mentioned by our correspondent—have frequently been found in various parts of the country. Whole trees, even, have been found imbedded in strata of coal, but it is in no wise probable they were indebted to Noah's flood for such imbedment.

We readily admit the facts asserted about the buried logs, but utterly fail to see how they prove that in Noah's time the earth was covered over its entire surface with water to the depth of five miles; that the animals and birds from all latitudes and zones of the earth gathered together of their own accord, and voluntarily marched into the Ark in pairs or sevens, lions and calves, wolves and lambs, dogs and rabbits, cats and mice, hawks and chickens, swallows and flies, poisonous serpents and gentle doves, in all, over three hundred thousand animals—fowls and insects of all varieties of character and dispositions—crowded into an ark pitched without and within, with a single door and window, and they closed, and thus deprived of air, light and appropriate food they remained over a year—Noah's family, stench, filth and all. If our friend's poplar log convinces him that all this occurred, perhaps it also reveals to him where all the water came from that covered the earth to the depth of five miles, where it was stored previous to its descent, and where it went to when dry land again appeared? He is probably one of those credulous mortals full of "saving faith," who can just as easily believe that Jonah swallowed the whale as that the whale swallowed Jonah, if the book only says so. We will, however, take this occasion to assure Elder Shelton that, in maintaining so zealously that the flood occurred just as related in Genesis, he is entirely antagonistic to the position on this subject, now held by his more intelligent brethren of the cloth in this locality. We fear he is getting behind the times. No intelligent orthodox clergyman of New York or Brooklyn now claims that the Bible account of the deluge must be understood literally. They hold Genesis to be merely a poem or fable, and that it is not longer to be regarded as incumbent on the Christian to believe its literal language. Rev. DeWitt Talmage not long since said quite as much in his pulpit, and insisted that skeptics and Liberals, in representing the enlightened Christian clergymen as adhering to the letter of the Genesis narrative, were wrong, and that a very small part of the learned, sensible portion of clergymen now preach the Bible account of creation and the flood. In the advances made by science, it is difficult for a man of sense and education to longer insist the story narrated in Genesis is true.

Brother Shelton, the world is progressing; the old foggy notions of the past are gradually yielding to the good sense of to-day; mythology and fable are giving place to scientific truths and reason. You had better study up a little, and take a few steps forward, or we fear you will be left away behind among the stumps and pitfalls of the Dark Ages.

George Snode Again Heard From.

This gentleman has favored us with eight pages of foolscap manuscript in reply to our remarks in answer to his former letter in No. 12. He failed to pay full postage on his document, and we had the opportunity of advancing six cents upon it, and we are not sure but we paid its full value. It is such a mass of cant, twaddle, bad grammar and insolence that we cannot spare the room for it, believing we can give our readers matter they will appreciate more highly. In the few quotations and remarks we have to make we shall endeavor to do Mr. Snode no injustice.

First. Mr. Snode takes us to task for calling the Catholics Christians, and says: "Catholicism is a mixture of Judaism, Paganism and Christianity." That the Catholic Church took much from the Jews and the Pagans we will not deny—in fact, its theology is mainly made up from the latter source, but it is, nevertheless, the Christian Church; and our friend is narrow in his views and sense of fairness to deprive them of this honor, if such it is. Protestantism got all its Christianity—its whole stock in trade—from the Catholic Church. When Luther and his compeers protested against the Pope and the Church of Rome, it was not against the dogmas or doctrines of the Church, but simply against the power and government of the Pope; in short, he wished to be the Pope himself. Every dogma, every superstition, and every sacrament was retained—the same trinity, the same Virgin Mary, the same Redeemer, the same Cross, the same Sunday, the same Devil, the same Hell. The Protestants obtained everything they have in the way of creed from the Catholics, save such modifications as they have presumed to make, and are as legitimately children of the Catholic Church as the latter is the direct offspring of Judaism and Paganism.

Second. Mr. Snode says, "Christians never persecute," and wishes to evade the odium of the extensive persecutions perpetrated by the Catholics upon the ground that they, the Catholics, were not Christians. This is very cool. He, of course, thinks Protestants are Christians. Have they never persecuted? When Luther denounced Copernicus as a fool because he declared the earth was round and revolved upon its own axis; when John Calvin burned Michael Servetus at the stake with a slow fire because he held there was but one God, was that persecution? Was he not a Christian, when he transferred to writing those memorable words: "Whoever shall contend that it is unjust to put heretics and blasphemers to death, willingly and knowingly incurs their very guilt"? Was not the meek reformer, Melancthon, a Christian when he approved of Calvin's burning Servetus to death, and declared that his body should have been chopped to pieces and his bowels torn out! Was not Munzer, a disciple of Luther, a Christian, when at the head of some forty thousand turbulent fanatics he ravaged the whole country and scattered devastation and destruction? Were not the Protestants of the Established Church Christians, when they persecuted to death in England, Scotland and Ireland, not only Catholics, but Covenanters, Dissenters and Quakers? Did not Claverhouse act under the orders of the bishops and priests of a Protestant and Christian Church when he roved around the country with a band of marauders and cut-throats, killing and slaughtering indiscriminately such persons as dared think for themselves and dissent from the Established Church? Were not the Puritans of New England Christians, when they tortured and put to death in various ways unbelievers, Quakers and the hapless mortals they claimed were bewitched? We have seen the tree on Boston Common on which a woman was hung by Puritans for being a Quaker. Were not these Protestant Puritans Christians? If they were not, will Mr. Snode inform us where to find them? Will he still tell us "Christians do not persecute"? Verily, the Protestants in proportion to the power they have had, have shown the same intolerance, the same cruelty, the same bloodthirstiness, the same disposition to persecute skeptics and unbelievers that Catholics have ever shown. They are the legitimate children of a sanguinary, remorseless parent.

Third. Mr. Snode says: "I am astonished at your ignorance, or your entire lack of honesty in your quotations from the Bible and from history." With such an amount of astonishment, and upon making such a charge against us, he ought to be able to point out wherein we have been so ignorant and so dishonest, which he could easily do if we were guilty, but he fails to mention a single instance and we are left to conclude it is he that is dishonest, and that his dishonesty is only equaled by his insolence. What right has a man to charge another with mis-quoting and dishonesty, and not point out the paragraph and passage where the mis-quotation occurs? We insist we quoted correctly, and that he has accused us falsely.

Fourth. Mr. Snode attempts to apologize for the cruelty of God or Moses in slaying all the Midianites, men, women and children, save the virgins (who were kept for the use of the soldiers), upon the ground of their wickedness. We can, perhaps, understand the beauty of this justice by examining for a moment the nature of this Midianitish wickedness. When "Israel abode in Shittim the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab, and they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods, and the people did eat and bowed down to their gods." (Num. xxv: 1, 2.) This was the offense, and it certainly seems the Israelitish men were equally to blame with the Midianitish women. The women could not very well force the men to commit crimes with them against their will. If it was just that the women and the whole nation of Midianites should be put to death, ought not the men of Israel to have been punished also? Were the women wholly guilty and the men wholly innocent? How much better was it for thirty-two thousand Midianitish virgins to be divided among the Israelites for their base uses? The justice of Phineas the priest was more equal, to say the least, when he rose, and with a javelin run through the bodies, killing instantly, the Israelite man, Zimri, and the Midianite woman, Cozbi, who had been acting as man and wife together. In this case the same severe punishment meted to the woman was extended to the man; but in God's dealings with the two nations, though the Israelitish men were equally as guilty as the Midianitish women, the latter nation were all cruelly put to death, except the young girls, who were reserved for a worse fate, while not one of the former nation was hurt at all. If Mr. Snode thinks that is a fine specimen of Divine Justice, he is welcome to all of it, and we will go without.

Fifth. Our friend labors hard to make out that Infidels would persecute just as badly as Christians if they only were numerous enough and had the necessary power. As such a thing has not occurred yet, it is hardly worth while for him to borrow trouble about it. He reminds us, somewhat, of the silly girl who stood before a heated oven and burst out with a "boo hoo," and said, "if I was to get married, and if I should have a little baby, and if that little baby should fall into this oven and be burned to death how bad I should feel; boo hoo hoo."

Mr. Snode tries to make Infidels and skeptics responsible for the deaths of Socrates and Jesus Christ, as well as the persecutions of the early Christians. We object to shouldering this responsibility. Socrates, the Grecian philosopher, was put to death by religionists who believed in gods and dogmas that he could not accept, and he died like a brave, noble man.

As to Jesus Christ, there is great doubt whether such a person ever had an existence. If he had, we will be glad if Mr. Snode will demonstrate it to us. If he did live and was put to death, it was done at the instance of God's "peculiar people," and as it was in the divine programme that he should be thus sacrificed that a small percentage of the human family might gain the favor of heaven and escape the torments of hell, then there was certainly great virtue in thus carrying out heaven's great plan of salvation and putting the young god to death. Mr. Snode does wrong to deprive the Jews of this honor, and at the same time make false accusations against Infidels. As to the early Christians, their history is extremely mythical. About the first reliable accounts we have of persecutions connected with Christianity was after Constantine became the first Christian Emperor. He caused to be put to death his own father-in-law, his brother-in-law, his nephew, his wife, his eldest son, and by his edicts and armies he caused human blood to run like a river. It was this man who, like St. Paul, saw a vision in the heavens and was instantly converted; but he was the first man of mark in the Christian Church, and one of the worst and bloodiest tyrants that ever lived.

No, Mr. Snode, we accept none of the honors of persecuting Christians, for we have never done it. Persecuting for opinion's sake is almost entirely a Christian characteristic, to which Infidels lay no claim at all.

Sixth. Our correspondent refers again to the times of the French Revolution; in fact, it seems to be a favorite theme with him, as he fancies he thereby proves that Infidels have persecuted. He seems to be unable to comprehend, or not honest enough to admit the fact, that the miseries and troubles of those times were of a political character, and not religious, and grew out of the excesses and wrongs which had preceded them. In proof of this Atheists and Christians alike went to the guillotine, not for the sake of religious opinions, but political, being, as was supposed, inimical to political liberty, or to the parties then in power. Thomas Paine, one of the greatest Infidels of the day, came near being executed, as it was decided by the ruling powers that he should be beheaded, and he only escaped by an accident. The charge against him, as against others, was solely of a political character. Not a single person during that "reign of terror" was put to death because he was a Christian, or because he was not a Christian, because he was an Infidel, or because he was not an Infidel, and Mr. Snode ought to inform himself of the fact, and not again make the false accusation that Infidels at that time persecuted because of the religious opinions of their opponents. The charge is entirely devoid of truth, and it is only an ignorant or a dishonest man that makes it.

Seventh. Mr. Snode winds up his homily by expatiating upon the superior knowledge which a Christian possesses over an Infidel as regards his views and convictions, and the superior advantage he enjoys. We quote him:

"The Christian first believes and then knows Christianity to be divine. There is one advantage which the Christian has over the skeptic; the skeptic never can disprove, even to his own satisfaction, much less to any other person's, that the Christian's experience is not what it purports to be. The Christian has proven that Christianity is true by his own experience, and the skeptic can never, by his experience, prove it to be false." And again, "We, then, who submit to the government and guidance of our Saviour, have these advantages over the skeptic: we have reason, true philosophy and experience all on our side. We have the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. Rich or poor, noble or ignoble in the world's reckoning, we can always eat our food with gladness, sleep sweetly, and contemplate nature with adoration. The consciousness that we have the eye of God always upon us and his arms encircling us, is worth more than all the promises of all the Atheists, Deists, Skeptics and Freethinkers upon earth. On their philosophy, we have nothing to fear. We are happier while we live—if Christians—inconceivably happier, and, on their theory, cannot fail to be as happy after death. But on our principles they can promise themselves only the happiness of a stall-fed ox here, and everlasting destruction hereafter. This is a fair contrast of the two systems. We have the present and the future; they have the present only in part and nothing in future but utter darkness and everlasting night. If immortality be worth anything it is worth everything which imagination can grasp. This is the boot between the two systems—animal gratification and death—Jesus Christ and immortality. The Materialist will choose the former, but the rational philosopher and the man of common sense will choose the latter.

All this is simply "bosh and nonsense." The Christian has no more assurance that his views are correct, knows no more about the correctness of his experiences, has no more advantages, knows no more about the eye of God, or his encircling arms, has no better appetite, enjoys his meals no more, sleeps no sweeter, has no more claim upon immortality and a future existence, than the believers in any other system of religion in the world! It is mere arrogance or stupidity that makes Mr. Snode, or any other Christian, set up this claim. If there is a God he is everywhere, his eye is as much upon the unbeliever as the believer, his arm encircles as far around the Infidel as the Christian. Nature looks as beautiful to the one as the other, and the rays of the sun and the gentle rains fall upon him just as pleasantly.

The Christian has not an exclusive or patent right up on God nor a future existence. If there is the one he is just as near to us as to him; if there is the other, we shall be there and enjoy it just as much as the most arrogant Christian. Belief or unbelief in a future state neither causes nor prevents its existence, neither is it an invention of the Christian nor his Christ. If it is the birthright of one human being, it is of the entire race, and no priest nor bigot can deprive us of it. Neither can they send us to everlasting night nor the flames of a sulphurous hell. These are but the figments of a diseased imagination, and have no terrors for a truly sensible man. The same Deity that presides over this state of existence presides over that. He is ever the same, and burns and torments no more there than he does here. All will be the recipients alike of his favors there, the same as here.

Christians are welcome to the proprietorship of the Devil and his hell. They were invented by priests to frighten ignorant, silly people into their support, and never came from the Deity that presides over the Universe. It is an infernal belief, and detracts from the happiness of all who harbor it; therefore Christians are less happy, have less real love of God, less sympathy for their fellow-men than Infidels. The Christian has nothing that is good, nothing that is desirable that we have not equally as large a share in, while we are freed from the fear of the Devil, the burnings of hell, the harassing doubts and the constant uncertainty which he must inevitably feel if he believes what he pretends to. We yield to him entire ownership in this Satanic Majesty and his brimstone hell—they are his principal stock in trade and occupy a large share of his thoughts. We relinquish them with all the grace in the world, having no use for them, either here or hereafter.

Another Christian Letter.

The following delectable note we received through the mail, and was written in this city:

NEW YORK, Feb. 25th, 1875.

MR. HEATHEN: I have bought a copy of your vile paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, but no one but a heathen and coward such as yourself would pronounce it nothing else but a Heathenish, lying and doggish paper, and you know it is not a paper published for the welfare of the people, but only to degrade them and fit them for hell, which will never be full until it receives such men as you are. What can you say of religion, Christianity and the bible, anything else than it is true, good and virtuous, making mankind better and more noble, and fitting them for a world to come? What business has a Heathen like you to dictate the bible? but I don't want to be too hard on you, and I tell you that unless you turn from your wicked ways, and live a man, god will judge harshly with you, and I tell you furthermore, that I will give you all March to settle up your business, and if I see another copy of your paper after the first of March, I will blow your brains out, and rid the world of one vile carcass. So pay the postage on this letter until I see you some time, that is if you don't comply with my wishes. From one that was worse a bad man, now turned Richeous.

This letter was evidently not written by Bishop McClosky nor the Rev. Mr. Ting, D.D., but that it comes from a pious soul, who is, to some extent, a believer in their creeds, we have no reason to doubt. However bad he once was, he assures us he is now one of the righteous. We wonder if Christianity and the Bible cause him to wish to deprive us of life. If this is so, their influence is dangerous in the extreme.

We seem to meet with very indifferent success in pleasing our Christian friends, though we try to the extent of our ability. We fear they even feel un-

(Concluded on Page 8.)

Scientific Department.

Tyndall's Reply to his Critics.

The world has frequently been informed of late that I have raised up against myself a host of enemies; and considering, with few exceptions, the deliverances of the press, and more particularly of the religious press, I am forced sadly to admit that the statement is only too true. I derive some comfort, nevertheless, from the reflection of Diogenes, transmitted to us from Plutarch, that "he who would be saved must have good friends or violent enemies; and that he is best off who possesses both." This "best" condition, I have reason to believe, is mine.

Reflecting on the fraction I have read of recent remonstrances, appeals, menaces, and judgments—concerning not only the world that now is, but that which is to come—it has interested me to note how trivially men seem to be influenced by what they call their religion, and how potently by that "nature" which it is the alleged province of religion to eradicate or subdue. From fair and manly argument, from the tenderest and holiest sympathy on the part of those who desire my eternal good, I pass, by many gradations, through deliberate unfairness, to a spirit of bitterness which desires, with a fervor inexpressible in words, my eternal ill. Now, were religion the potent factor, we might expect a homogeneous utterance from those professing a common creed; while, if human nature be the really potent factor, we may expect utterances as heterogeneous as the characters of men. As a matter of fact we have the latter; suggesting to my mind that the common religion professed and defended by these different people, is merely the accidental conduit through which they pour their own tempers, lofty or low, courteous or vulgar, mild or ferocious, holy or unholy, as the case may be. Pure abuse, however, I have deliberately avoided reading, wishing to keep not only hatred, malice, and uncharitableness, but even every trace of irritation, far away from my side of a discussion which demands not only good temper, but largeness, clearness, and many-sidedness of mind, if it is to guide us even to provisional solutions.

It has been thought, and said, that, in the revised Address I have retracted opinions uttered at Belfast. A Roman Catholic writer, who may be taken as representative, is especially strong upon this point. Startled by the deep chorus of dissent with which my dazzling fallacies have been received, he convicts me of trying to retreat from my position. This he will by no means tolerate.

"It is too late now to seek to hide from the eyes of mankind one foul blot, one ghastly deformity. Prof. Tyndall has himself told us how and where this Address of his was composed. It was written among the glaciers and the solitudes of the Swiss mountains. It was no hasty, hurried, crude production; its every sentence bore marks of thought and care."

My critic intends to be severe: he is simply just. In the "solitudes" to which he refers I worked with deliberation; endeavoring even to purify my intellect by disciplines similar to those enjoined by his own Church for the sanctification of the soul. I tried in my ponderings to realize not only the awful, but the expedient; and to permit no fear to act upon my mind save that of uttering a single word on which I could not take my stand, either in this or any other world.

Still my time was so brief, and my process of thought and expression so slow, that, in a literary point of view, I halted, not only behind the ideal, but behind the possible. Hence, after the delivery of the Address, I went over it with the desire, not to revoke its principles, but to improve it verbally, and above all to remove any word which might give color to the notion of "heat and haste."

My critic is very hard upon the avowal in my preface regarding atheism. But I frankly confess that his honest hardness and hostility are to me preferable to the milder but less honest treatment which the passage has received from members of other churches. He quotes the paragraph, and goes on to say:

"We repeat this is a most remarkable passage. Much as we dislike seasoning polemics with strong words, we assert that this apology only tends to affix with links of steel to the name of Prof. Tyndall the dread imputation against which he struggles."

Here we have a very fair example of subjective religious vigor. But my quarrel with such exhibitions is that they do not always represent objective fact. No atheistic reasoning can, I hold, dislodge religion from the heart of man. Logic cannot deprive us of life, and religion is life to the religious. As an experience of consciousness, it is perfectly beyond the assaults of logic. But the religious life is often projected in external forms—I use the word in its widest sense—by no means beyond the reach of logic, which will have to bear—and to do so more and more as the world becomes more enlightened—comparison with facts. The subjective energy to which I have just referred, is also a fact of consciousness not to be reasoned away. My critic feels, and takes delight in feeling, that I am struggling, and he obviously experiences the most exquisite pleasures of "the muscular sense" in holding me down. His feelings are as real as if his imagination of what mine are were equally real. His picture of my "struggles" is, however, a mere phantasm. I do not struggle. I not fear the charge of atheism; nor should I even disavow it, in reference to any definition of the Supreme which he, or his order, would be likely to frame. His "links" and his "steel" and his "dread imputations" are, therefore, even more unsubstantial than my "streaks of morning cloud," and they may be permitted to vanish together.

These minor and more purely personal matters at an end, the weightier allegations remain—that at Belfast I misused my position by quitting the domain of science, and making an unjustifiable raid into the domain of theology. This I fail to see. Laying aside abuse, I hope my accusers will consent to reason with me. Is it not competent for a scientific man to speculate on the antecedents of the solar system? Did Kant, Laplace, and William Herschel quit their legitimate spheres when they prolonged the intellectual vision beyond the boundary of experience, and propounded the nebular theory? Accepting that theory as probable, is it not permitted to a scientific man to follow up in idea the series of changes associated with the condensation of the nebula; to picture the successive detachment of planets and moons, and the relation of all of them to the sun? If I look upon our earth, with its orbital revolution and axial rotation, as one small issue of the process which made the solar system what it is, will any theologian deny my right to entertain and express this theoretic view? Time was when a multitude of theologians would be found to do so—when the arch-enemy of science which now vaunts its tolerance would have made a speedy end of the man who might venture to publish any opinion of the kind. But that time, unless the world is caught strangely slumbering, is forever past.

As regards inorganic Nature, then, I may traverse, without let or hindrance, the whole distance which separates the nebulae from the worlds of to-day. But only a few years ago this now conceded ground of science was theological ground. I could by no means regard this as the final and sufficient concession of theology; and at Belfast I thought it not only my right but my duty to state that, as regards the organic world, we must enjoy the freedom which we have already won in regard to the inorganic. I could not discern the shred of a title-deed which gave any man, or any class of men, the right to open the door of one of these worlds to the scientific searcher, and to close the other against him. And I considered it frankest, wisest, and in the long run most conducive to permanent peace, to indicate without evasion or reserve the ground that belongs to Science, and to which she will assuredly make good her claim.

Considering the freedom allowed to all manner of opinions in England, surely this was no extravagant position for me to assume. I have been reminded that an eminent predecessor of mine in the presidential chair expressed a totally different view of the Cause of things from that enunciated by me. In doing so he transgressed the bounds of science at least as much as I did; but nobody raised an outcry against him. The freedom that he took I claim, but in a more purely scientific direction. And looking at what I must regard as the extravagances of the religious world; at the very inadequate and foolish notions concerning this Universe entertained by the majority of our religious teachers; at the waste of energy on the part of good men over things unworthy of the attention of enlightened heathens; the fight about the fripperies of Ritualism, the mysteries of the Eucharist, and the Athanasian Creed; the forcing on the public view of Pontigny Pilgrimages; the dating of historic epochs from the definition of the Immaculate Conception; the proclamation of the Divine Glories of the Sacred Heart—standing in the midst of these insanities, it did not appear to me extravagant to claim the public tolerance for an hour and a half for the statement of what I hold to be more reasonable views: views more in accordance with the verities which science has brought to light, and which many weary souls would, I thought, welcome with gratification and relief.

The expression to which the most violent exception has been taken is this:

"Abandoning all disguise, the confession I feel bound to make before you, is that I prolong the vision backward across the boundary of the experimental evidence, and discern in that Matter which we, in our ignorance, and notwithstanding our professed reverence for its Creator, have hitherto covered with opprobrium, the promise and potency of every form and quality of life."

To call it a "chorus of dissent," as my Catholic critic does, is a mild way of describing the storm of opprobrium with which this statement has been assailed. But, the first blast of passion being past, I hope I may again ask my opponents to consent to reason. First of all I am blamed for crossing the boundary of the experimental evidence. I reply that this is the habitual action of the scientific mind—at least of that portion of it which applies itself to physical investigation. Our theories of light, heat, magnetism and electricity, all imply the crossing of this boundary. My paper on the "Scientific Use of the Imagination," illustrates this point in the amplest manner; and in the lecture above referred to I have sought, incidentally, to make clear how in physics the experiential incessantly leads to the ultra-experiential; how out of experience there always grows something finer than mere experience, and that in their different powers of ideal extension consists for the most part the difference between the great and the mediocre investigator.

The kingdom of science, then, cometh not by observation and experiment alone, but is completed by fixing the roots of observation and experiment in a region inaccessible to both, and in dealing with which we are forced to fall back upon the picturing power of the mind.

Passing the boundary of experience, therefore, does not, in the abstract, constitute a sufficient ground for censure. There must have been something in my particular mode of crossing it which provoked this tremendous "chorus of dissent."

Let us calmly reason the point out. I hold the nebular theory, as it was held by Kant, Laplace, and William Herschel, and as it is held by the best scientific intellects of to-day. According to it, our sun and planets were once diffused through space as an impalpable haze, out of which, by condensation, came the solar system. What caused the haze to condense? Loss of heat. What rounded the sun and planets? That which rounds a tear—molecular force. For aëons, the immensity of which overwhelm man's conceptions, the earth was unfit to maintain what we call life. It if now covered with visible, living things. They are not formed of matter different from that of the earth around them. They are, on the contrary, bone of its bone and flesh of its flesh. How were they introduced? Was life implicated in the nebula—as part, it may be, of a vaster and wholly incomprehensible Life; or is it the work of a Being standing outside the nebula, who fashioned it as a potter does his clay, but whose own origin and ways are equally past finding out? As far as the eye of science has hitherto ranged through Nature, no intrusion of purely creative power into any series of phenomena has ever been observed. The assumption of such a power to account for special phenomena has always proved a failure. It is opposed to the very spirit of science, and I therefore assumed the responsibility of holding up in contrast with it that method of Nature which it has been the vocation and triumph of science to disclose, and in the application of which we can alone hope for further light. Holding, then, that the nebulae and all subsequent life stand to each other in the relation of the germ to the finished organism, I reaffirm here, not arrogantly, or defiantly, but without a shade of indistinctness, the position laid down in Belfast.

Not with the vagueness belonging to the emotions, but with the definiteness belonging to the understanding, the scientific man has to put to himself these questions regarding the introduction of life upon the earth. He will be the last to dogmatize upon the subject, for he knows best that certainty is here for the present unattainable. His refusal of the creative hypothesis is less an assertion of knowledge than a protest against the assumption of knowledge which must long, if not forever, lie beyond us, and the claim to which is the source of manifold confusion upon earth. With a mind open to conviction, he asks his opponents to show him an authority for the belief they so strenuously and fiercely uphold. They can do no more than point to the Book of Genesis, or some other portion of the Bible. Profoundly interesting and indeed pathetic to me are those attempts of the opening mind of man to appease its hunger for a Cause. But the Book of Genesis has no voice in scientific questions. To the grasp of geology, which it resisted for a time, it at length yielded like potter's clay; its authority of a system of cosmogony being discredited on all hands by the abandonment of the obvious meaning of its writer. It is a poem, not a scientific treatise. In the former aspect it is forever beautiful; in the latter aspect it has been, and it will continue to be, purely obstructive and hurtful. To knowledge its value has been negative, leading, in rougher ages than ours, to physical, and even in our own "free" age, as exemplified in my own case, to moral violence.

Though managed and moulded for centuries to an obedience unparalleled in any other country, except Spain, the Irish intellect is beginning to show signs of independence, demanding a diet more suited to its years than the pabulum of the middle ages. As for the recent manifesto where pope, cardinal, archbishops, and bishops, may now be considered as united in one grand anathema, its character and faith are shadowed forth by the vision of Nebuchadnezzar, recorded in the Book of Daniel. It resembles the image, whose form was terrible, but the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron of which rested upon feet of clay. And a stone smote the feet of clay, and the iron, and the brass, and the silver, and the gold, were broken in pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor, and the wind carried them away.

There is something in Jesuitism profoundly interesting, and at the same time clearly intelligible, to men of strong intellects and determined will. The weaker spirits, of whom there are many among us, it stupefies and fascinates and subdues. From the study of its now inward forces, and their possible misapplication, the really determined man can understand how possible it is, having once chosen an aim, to reach it in defiance of every moral restraint—to trample under foot, by an obstinate effort of volition, the dictates of honesty, honor, mercy, and truth; and to pursue the desired end, if need be, through their destruction. This force of will, relentlessly applied, and working through submissive instruments, is the strength of Jesuitism.

Pure, honest fanaticism often adds itself to this force, and sometimes acts as its equivalent. Illustrations of this are not far to seek, for the dazzling prize of England converted to the true faith, is sufficient to turn weak heads. When it is safely caged, it is interesting to watch the operations of this form of energy. In a sermon on the Perpetual Office of the Council of Trent, preached before the Right Reverend Fathers assembled in Synod, the archbishop of Westminster has given us the following sample of it: "As the fourth century was made glorious by the definition of the Godhead and the Consubstantial Son, and the fifth by that of his two perfect natures, and the thirteenth by that of the procession of the Holy Ghost, so the nineteenth will be glorious by the definition of the Immaculate Conception. Right Rev. Fathers," continues this heated proselyte, "you have to call the legationaries and the tribunes, the patricians and the people, of a conquering race, and to subdue, change, and transform them one by one to the likeness of the Son of God. Surely a soldier's eye and a soldier's heart would choose by intuition this field of England for the warfare of the faith. It is the head of Protestantism, the centre of its movements, and the stronghold of its powers. Weakened in England, it is paralyzed everywhere; conquered in England, it is conquered throughout the world. Once overthrown here, all is but a war of detail: it is the key of the whole position of modern error." This is the propaganda which England has to stem. What mere stultic dilettante ritualist or a weak-headed nobleman must be when acted upon by this fiery breath of fanaticism! The only wonder is that weak heads, which are so assiduously and deliberately sought out, are not more plentiful than they are.

The course of life upon earth, as far as Science can see, has been one of amelioration—a steady advance on the whole from the lower to the higher. The continued effort of animated Nature is to improve its conditions and raise itself to a loftier level. In man, improvement and amelioration depend largely upon the growth of conscious knowledge, by which the errors of ignorance are continually moulded and truth is organized. It is assuredly the advance of knowledge that has given a materialistic color to the philosophy of this age. Materialism is, therefore, not a thing to be mourned over, but to be honestly considered—accepted if it be wholly true, rejected if it be wholly false, wisely sifted and turned to account if it embrace a mixture of truth and error.

Of late years the study of the nervous system and of its relation to thought and feeling has profoundly occupied inquiring minds. It is our duty not to shirk—it ought rather to be our privilege to accept—the established results of such inquiries, for here assuredly our ultimate weal depends upon our loyalty to the truth. Instructed as to the control which the nervous system exercises over man's moral and intellectual nature, we shall be better prepared, not only to mend their manifold defects, but also to strengthen and purify both. Is mind degraded by this recognition of its dependence? Assuredly not. Matter, on the contrary, is raised to the level it ought to occupy, and from which timid ignorance would remove it.

But the light is dawning, and it will become stronger as time goes on. Even the Brighton Congress affords evidence of this. From the manifold confusions of that assemblage my memory has rescued two items which it would fain preserve: the recognition of a relation between Health and Religion, and the address of the Rev. Harry Jones. Out of the conflict of vanities his words emerge fresh, healthy, and strong, because undrugged by dogma, coming directly from the warm brain of one who knows what practical truth means, and who has faith in its vitality and inherent power of propagation. I wonder is he less effectual in his ministry than his more embroidered colleagues? It surely behooves our teachers to come to some definite understanding as to this question of health: to see how, by inattention to it, we are defrauded, negatively, by the privation of that "sweetness and light" which is the natural concomitant of good health; positively, by the insertion into life of cynicism, ill-temper, and a thousand corroding anxieties which good health would dissipate. We fear and scorn "materialism." But he who knew all about it, and could apply his knowledge, might become the preacher of a new gospel. Not, however, through the static moments of the individual does such knowledge come, but through the revelations of science, in connection with the history of mankind.

Through our neglect of the monitions of a reasonable materialism we sin and suffer daily. I might here point to the train of deadly disorders over which science has given modern society such control—discussing the lair of the material enemy, insuring his destruction, and thus preventing that moral squalor and hopelessness which habitually tread on the heels of epidemics in the case of the poor.

Rising to higher spheres, the visions of Swedenborg, and the ecstasy of Plotinus and Porphyry, are phases of that psychical condition, obviously connected with the nervous system and state of health, on which is based the Vedic doctrine of the absorption of the individual into the universal soul. Plotinus taught the devout how to pass into a condition of ecstasy. Porphyry complains of having been only once united to God in eighty-six years, while his master Plotinus had been so united six times in sixty years. A friend who knew Wordsworth informs me that the poet, in some of his moods, was accustomed to seize hold of an external object to assure himself of his own bodily existence. The "entranced mind" of Mr. Page-Roberts, referred to so admiringly by the Spectator, is a similar phenomenon. No one, I should say, has had a wider experience in this field than Mr. Emerson. As states of consciousness those phenomena have an undisputed reality, and a substantial identity. They are, however, connected with the most heterogeneous objective conceptions. Porphyry wrote against Christianity; Mr. Page-Roberts is a devout Christian. But, notwithstanding the utter discordance of these objective conceptions, their subjective experiences are similar, because of the similarity of their finely-strung nervous organizations.

But whatever be the fate of theory, the practical monitions are plain enough, which declare that on our dealings with matter depends our weal or woe, physical and moral. The state of mind which rebels against the recognition of the claims of "materialism" is not unknown to me. I can remember a time when I regarded my body as a weed, so much more highly did I prize the conscious strength and pleasure derived from moral and religious feeling, which I may add, was mine without the intervention of dogma. The error was not an ignoble one, but this did not save it from the penalty attached to error. Saner knowledge taught me that the body is no weed, and that if it were treated as such it would infallibly avenge itself. Am I personally lowered by this change of front? Not so. Give me their health, and there is no spiritual experience of those earlier years—no resolve of duty, or work of mercy, no act of self-denial, no solemnity of thought, no joy in the life and aspects of Nature, that would not still be mine. And this without the least reference or regard to any purely personal reward or punishment looming in the future.

But, admitting the practical facts, and acting on them, there will always remain ample room for speculation. Take the argument of the Lucretian. As far as I am aware, not one of my assailants has attempted to answer it. Some of them, indeed, rejoice over the ability displayed by Bishop Butler in rolling back a difficulty on his opponent; and they even imagine that it is the bishop's own argument that is there employed. Instructed by self-knowledge, they can hardly credit with the wish to state both sides of the question at issue, and to show, by a logic stronger than Butler ever used, the overthrow which awaits any doctrine of materialism which is based upon the definitions of matter habitually received. But the raising of a new difficulty does not abolish—does not even lessen—the old one, and the argument of the Lucretian remains untouched by anything the bishop has said or can say.—Popular Science Monthly.

Tyndall and his American Critics.

BY JOHN CHAPPELL SMITH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The critics I shall notice are James Freeman Clarke, Rowland Conner, Francis E. Abbott and John Weiss. These men, whose scholarly attainments qualify them to criticize the philosophy enunciated by Tyndall in his address, undertake to enlighten us as to the nature and bearings of that philosophy on the problems of life and mind; but as the opinions they give us conflict with each other, it becomes the business of THE TRUTH SEEKER to determine which opinion is nearest to the truth. So far as I know, Weiss is the only American critic who has clearly defined what the fundamental change is that Tyndall has made in his notion of matter; but, as I have remarked, Weiss is in error in supposing that the idea that the Universe is living matter, and that sensation and thought are the product, not of the essentially dead, but of eternally living matter, is a new idea. This notion of the immediate unity of matter and life, of life being inseparably connected with matter, was held by the old Greek philosophers, and is now held by some of the most eminent biologists—for instance by Haeckel in Germany.

J. Freeman Clarke, contrary to Weiss, says that Tyndall has not "espoused" a new idea; and he says, banteringly, that Tyndall is using the term matter in a new sense, and has given merely a new name for Spirit or God. There is, therefore, says Clarke, not any materialism nor atheism in the famous sentence about the "potency" of matter. This is not true, and Clarke shows that he knows that it is not; for he says, "Tyndall's theory was avowedly constructed in order to avoid the belief in an intelligent Creator, and in a Universe marked by the presence of design." Tyndall says that there is materialism in his meaning, though, "The materialism here enunciated may be different from what you [his hearers] suppose." Clarke complains of Tyndall's indecision, and thinks that it is due to accepting Spencer's doctrine that God is unknowable, creation impossible, and that the knowledge of objects is a knowledge of their appearances only. Tyndall does not exhibit indecision in expressing his conviction that the theory of "Evolution" is a more rational theory than that of "Creation"; and, with strange inconsistency, Clarke shows that he knows this.

Abbot says that Tyndall has not stated anything new in the direction of materialism. He does not say; as Clarke does, that Tyndall uses the term "matter" as a new name for Spirit or God; and it is because Tyndall does not do this, that Abbot treats his philosophy with extreme contempt. Abbot says that there is "a somewhat baffling vagueness of thought" in the address; and he, too, thinks that it is due to Tyndall's following, with undeserved fidelity, the Spencerian philosophy; "which philosophy," he says, "exhibits unutterable shallowness, and that its general acceptance is the intellectual disgrace of the age." Abbot is sorry to see Tyndall reiterating Spencer's "meaningless jargon" and "empty gibberish."

Tyndall says: "Let us radically change our notion of matter;" and says Abbot: "This is what he does: he discards the old Democritean conception of atoms for a conception which endows them with inherent polar forces, and reduces or ascribes 'the activity of each animal as a whole to be the transferred activities of its molecules.'" Abbot says: "In the notion of self-subsistent, substantial atoms Tyndall seems to halt; and these polar or 'structural forces' he seems to regard as the ultimate cause of all organic life, so far as thought can go."

Now what is the conception of atoms which Tyndall has discarded? It is the conception that atoms which are "individually without sensation, can by combining in obedience to mechanical laws, originate not only organic forms, but the phenomena of sensation and thought also, as the result of their combination." Looking at matter as thus pictured by Democritus, and as defined in our scientific text-books, Tyndall says he sees the absolute impossibility of any form of life coming out of it. He says: "The definitions of matter given in our text-books were intended to cover its purely physical and mechanical properties. And taught as we have been to regard these definitions as complete, we naturally and rightly reject the monstrous notion that out of such matter any form of life could possibly arise; and Tyndall plainly asserts a belief that matter has, inherently, polar and structural forces which are the ultimate cause of organic life. This radical change in Tyndall's notion of matter is opposed by Abbot, and he objects that he can conceive of mechanical laws as applying to notions of molecules, and masses of molecules, "so long as all motion is communicated from without, but he cannot conceive of these laws "as applying to motions originating from within." The polarity of the whole magnet, according to Tyndall, is the sum of the polarities of its molecules. "Therefore," says Abbot, "all polarity must be traced ultimately to the molecule itself. That is, each molecule spontaneously manifests a polar force not referable to any outside cause, while this polar force acts as an outside cause upon all other molecules." Abbot says "Tyndall drops not the slightest intimation that the atoms depend either on each other or on anything else." And he asks: "How happens it that the inherent forces of all these self-subsistent atoms should obey any general law at all?" "The fundamental conceptions of physics break down here; they cannot explain why the opposite poles of the molecule should manifest opposite attractions, or indeed any attraction at all. The polar or structural forces of mutually independent atoms manifesting themselves under laws which govern permanently all their various interactions, present, when regarded as the ultimate of all organism, a new difficulty as great as that of supposing that the Universe results from the fortuitous concourse of atoms."

Abbot says the "conformity of all atomic and molecular action to a universal law of polarity by which alone all organic forms are conceived to be evolved," point directly to some deep identity of the atoms with each other, and, in fact, seems to reduce them to mere manifestations, under fixed temporal and extensional conditions, of one omnipresent Energy. When Tyndall comes to ponder more profoundly the enormous difficulty here indicated, Abbot suspects that Tyndall will be driven to make a still more radical change in his notions of matter, and to embrace a vaster conception—that of a power which pervades all, which, in the immensity of my own ignorance, I can call by no other name than God."

I infer that Tyndall would say that the atoms do act on each other, and that their actions and reactions are all the law there is. The how and the why may not be efficiently traced, but can we trace the operations and influences of the outside cause to which Abbot appears to refer? Can we comprehend the mode of action of the "one omnipresent Energy"? Can we conceive the God that pervades all matter, that manifests itself in countless atoms? Is it not as easy, to many of us, to conceive that atoms have inherent polar and structural forces, as to conceive that these forces are the expression of a universally diffused power called God?

Abbot says: "True it is, as Tyndall confesses, that science cannot to-day, intelligently connect molecular motion with phenomenal consciousness; but by an intellectual necessity we cross the boundary of the experimental evidence, and are willing to concede that this connection will eventually be established beyond a doubt. What follows? Not that matter is all—far from it. But that the one omnipresent Energy which manifests itself in countless atoms as a universal organic polarity, manifests itself also in the friendly toward us. Elder Shelton and Mr. Snodgrass gently consign us to that torrid climate, called hell, and this righteous man, who has not the manliness to give his name, goes a step or two further and threatens to blow our brains out. He must be a heartless man indeed to want to reduce us to the same hapless condition he is in. We had rather not spare our brains just now. We have no more than we need, and don't see how we could get along without them. We are not afraid of death, and when the time comes for life to cease with us, we trust we shall meet the change without fear or terror. We however, like this life pretty well, and if it is all the same to our righteous friend, we would rather stay here awhile after this month has passed—say till after the Beecher trial is over, any way. We have a curiosity to see how that case "comes out," and would prefer to keep our brains till after that time if this ardent admirer of Christianity and the Bible will give his consent.

(Concluded on page 10.)

(Continued from Page 5.)

This person evidently means business, or would have us think so. We suggest, however, that it is getting most too late in the day to take people's lives because they do not see things in the same light we do, or believe just to suit us. It used to be quite common a few hundred years ago, and was practiced extensively, but the custom has fallen into disuse, and probably it is not best to revive it.

We are satisfied God has no objection to our publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER, (for if he has, and wishes to do so, he can easily stop us at any time without help,) and as we feel that we have a duty to perform in this direction, so long as our patrons supply us with the necessary means to run it, and we have health and strength, we shall "keep pegging away," regardless alike of pistol shots and righteous threats.

WE APOLOGIZE.—We believe in making apologies whenever we commit an error that requires it. In sending out notices to delinquents, our clerk, by mistake and without our knowledge, sent to several who have renewed. We beg pardon for this and hope our friends will not be offended at it. We do not wish to dun any one who owes us nothing, and ask all such to consider it a mistake.

We would be glad if those in arrears felt more disposed to come to our aid. Our expenses are heavy, and we need the help of all those who have not renewed.

We regret there are so many disposed to discontinue their paper and feel not interest enough in the life of THE TRUTH SEEKER to be willing to spare $1.75 per year to help sustain it. There is much ignorance, error and mental bondage in our land, and sheets like this are sorely needed to dispel the same. If every one who has emerged from the wilderness of error and doubt only felt willing to contribute a very small sum annually to aid in helping others out, our Liberal publications would not need to languish.

We ask every active friend of truth and mental freedom to send in all the new subscribers they can to take the place of those who, through apathy and the fear of spending $1.75 for a Liberal paper, have deserted us. Let all do what they can for truth.

A CAUSE FOR REGRET.—Our recent officious Congress, not being content to leave the postal laws as they were—satisfactory to everybody except our rich Express Companies—have seen fit to change them, raising the postage on books, pamphlets, transient papers, and small packages of merchandise to double what they were, or sixteen cents a pound in place of eight, and calling for a two-cent stamp for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other papers weighing over an ounce, to those not regular subscribers. We regard this as an outrage upon the people to please rich monopolies that have made immense fortunes from the public, and would be glad to make people pay a dollar a pound to transport a book a thousand miles, whereas the postage has been eight cents a pound, but now sixteen. While Congress has thus doubled postage for the public, they have partially restored to themselves the odious franking privilege. Thus the innocent have to suffer for the guilty.

We ask our friends who order books by mail to enclose enough to cover the increased postage.

B. F. Underwood.

We were favored with a visit from this active champion of Truth and Free Thought upon his passage through this city to fill his lecture engagements in the West. We were pleased to learn from him that there is an increasing interest manifested to hear Liberal lectures, and that he has fully twice as many applications for lectures as he is able to supply. Those may regard themselves as fortunate who secure his services, and are enabled to hear him. He is truly an able exponent of Science and a zealous advocate of Truth. He is doing much good in the country, and is doubtless appreciated by all who have an opportunity of hearing him. His present engagements last till May, when he assures us he will return to this city, when we hope the Liberals here will have an opportunity of hearing him.

Book Notices.

DESCENT AND DARWINISM, by Prof. Oscar Schnidt, of the "International Scientific Series" is one of the finest and most comprehensive works we have yet seen. The key-note of the subject matter of this book is found in the following passage: "The subject is of deep importance, and whether we take part for or against it, must influence our whole theory of life. Here, too, that has happened to many, which so often happens in questions, the difficulties of which are veiled by an apparent general familiarity. Every one thinks himself capable of deciding about life, and since to non-scientific persons the notorious relationship with apes is the alpha and omega of the doctrine of Descent—since the most confused heads are often most thoroughly convinced of their own pre-eminence—on no subject do we so frequently hear superficial opinions, mostly condemnatory, and all evincing the grossest ignorance. I wish, then, to render the reader able to survey the whole ramified and complicated problem of the doctrine of Descent, and its foundation by Darwin, and to enable him to understand its cardinal points."

Our author also says, "the domain of the miraculous at best fosters only pious self-deception, and indolence of mind," and in substance affirms that no deep investigations were ever made by scientists until they had thrown aside the Bible entirely.

After a careful reading of the book, we are prepared to say that our author has been entirely successful in his attempt to elucidate this subject of Descent. It is a full and fine epitome of Darwinism—a whole library in itself. He places orthodoxy just where it belongs—out of the pale of common sense—away in the region of the emotions. He holds up to our intellects hard, incontrovertible facts—pure, unadulterated materialism. We wish we could put it into the hands of every man and woman in the country. No Liberal, who desires to act from intelligent premises, can afford to be without it.

We will cheerfully send the book by mail to all applicants. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts.

EVOLUTION AND PROGRESS, by Rev. W. I. Gill, A. M. The claim that our author makes is that Evolution and Progress were written to, from the following points, viz.: "That orthodox do not understand their opponents. That, in the present state of philosophy, Evolution can be rigidly maintained, and triumphantly vindicated against all the assaults of Theism, and that the latter will have to adopt an entirely new theory of defense." He certainly well sustains this proposition. His disposition of Dr. McCosh and his theories is only equaled by the happy and conclusive manner with which he refutes the arguments and theories of Hume and Carpenter, all three of whom are diametrically opposed to each other. On the question of force, and the forcefulness of matter, he meets the arguments of his opponents thus: "Matter and force are identical, are one and the same, and for this reason in knowing matter we necessarily know force. If we are cognizant of force at all, and if yet our knowledge does not transcend phenomena, then we are cognizant of phenomenal force. If cognizant of force by the senses, and therefore thus cognizant of sensible force, and if the senses can not transcend phenomena, then we are cognizant of the senses of phenomenal force. And material force is phenomal and sensible. This accords with universal institutions and spontaneous judgments, which never separate force and phenomena, nor make matter and its forces to be anything other than objects of our senses. For all men, from peasant to philosopher, ascribe some force to sensible phenomena. Carpenter himself does it all through his writings just as Hume did."

Our author handles Hume without gloves, and has certainly furnished us one of the most intelligent criticisms we have ever read of that author.

The metaphysical and supernatural schools fare badly at his hands. If space permitted we would gladly give more extended extracts from his very able arguments. Through 295 pages of good reasoning he gives to matter all the "forms and potencies of life." The logical deductions from his arguments might lead us to the doctrine of a Supreme Power, but consistently they could not even hint at a Supreme Being. What then was our surprise to read the closing paragraph thus:

"Now the great problem is, can we expound this unity so as to prove a personal Deity and one personal immortality? With emphasis I answer Yes!" This reminds us of the story of the cow that gave a generous pail of milk only to kick it over at the last moment. Verily, "consistency thou art a jewel."

The work is a neatly bound volume of 300 pages. Published by the Authors' Publishing Company, this city. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts.

OVERDOING THE THING.—The Right Rev. William Cresswell Doane, Episcopal Bishop of Albany a few weeks ago ordered prayers to be offered up in the churches under his jurisdiction for rain, which was much needed. In due time rain came, and he has congratulated the faithful under his charge at the success thus achieved by prayer. The question arises here, if their prayers produced the rain, ought not the country hold the bishop responsible for the devastating floods that have recently taken place in the Susquehanna, the Delaware, the Tennessee, and many other rivers, by which hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of property have been destroyed, and large numbers of poor people thrown out of employment in winter? Good Bishop, please do not deluge the whole country because you need rain at Albany! If your prayers up there are so powerful, they are, perhaps, too much like nitro-glycerine to be used indiscriminately. "Have a care," Bishop, "don't overdo the thing!"

Notice to the Liberal Public.

M. ALTMAN & Co.,
301 & 303 Sixth Ave., N. Y. }

I have during the last six years kept my name and business constantly before the readers of Liberal papers, and have during that time supplied most of them with merchandize from my establishment, orders in most cases coming through the advertisements published by me.

But the limited space necessarily occupied in a newspaper makes it impossible to enumerate or specify accurately the many articles required by the public and I have been and still am in receipt of many letters begging for a more detailed Price List or Catalogue, I have determined to issue the most complete Price List of Dry Goods, Fancy Goods, Ladies' and Gents' Undergarments and outfits, Suits, Costumes, Hosiery, Gloves, and the thousand small articles in Millinery, Notions, and Haberdashery, that has ever been circulated, free of cost, to all who may send stamp and address. The matter is now in the hands of the printer and by the time this is read will be ready to mail. Send on your addresses with stamp for return postage. Liberals who may not be able, or who hesitate to send stamp, may simply send their address, and I will mail a few for distribution among their friends.

Fraternally yours,

MORRIS ALTMAN.

Anniversary Celebration.

Extensive arrangements are being made to celebrate the 29th Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, by the First Spiritual Society of Terre Haute, Ind. As an additional attraction, arrangements have been consummated with C. W. Stewart, Spiritualist of McHenry, Ill., and Rev. A. Wright, Methodist minister of Vienna, Ill., to discuss the merits and demerits of Spiritualism in Pence's Hall, beginning on the evening of the 29th inst., and to continue each evening thereafter (excepting the evening of the 31st), so long as the contesting parties desire. Wednesday evening the 31st being the Anniversary proper, will be devoted to festivities. All are invited. By order of Committee, ALLEN PENCE, Chairman.

Self-Culture, and Not Religious Teachings, THE ONLY REMEDY FOR THE ILLS OF HUMANITY.

BY U. K. BOOTH, DETROIT, MICH.

An old adage says, "children and fools tell the truth." And yet the priests, clergy and their deluded followers will persist in the erroneous belief and statement that it is natural to do wrong. That it is as natural for a child to go astray as for the sparks to fly upward. And that "all mankind by nature are depraved." Paul also shared the same opinion wherever he expressed the law of antagonism which he used to think existed between the flesh and the spirit. But this is a grave error and a grievous mistake, and most "grievously hath the world answered for it. Nothing can be more foreign to truth and the facts in the case. Mankind are taught to do wrong from their earliest childhood, either by example or precept, more particularly by the former. In fact, before the child has an existence even, does its education begin in the errors of an ignorant parentage. A child, however young, may in its ignorance, being impelled by the natural appetite or demand of some yet uneducated and unenlightened propensity, perpetrate any wrong, whether it be the destruction of life, property or principle, and yet when interrogated and called to an account for its action, if done in a cool and dispassionate manner, will respond readily and truthfully, seeking neither subterfuge, evasion nor concealment.

But if, on the contrary, the interrogations and investigations are carried on in an angry, threatening, and chiding manner (as they usually are), then the child, acting under the impulse of the very first and most authoritative law of its nature, namely, the law of self-preservation or self-defense, will resort to falsehood, deception, evasion and concealment, to save itself from impending danger. And in so doing, from the very instincts of its nature, acts as wisely, conscientiously and as rightfully as does a nation by misleading, deceiving or surprising, by recourse to any and every species and means of stratagem, an invading enemy, whose object is the overthrow of their capital. The fact that the character of the child is largely and alarmingly due to pre-natal conditions, through an ignorant, vicious and corrupt parentage, both by physiological irregularities, psychological impressions and mental influences, by which the child is ushered into the world, not under natural, but preternatural laws and conditions, has led the unobservant and unphilosophical Bible writer, to assert that "it is as natural for a child to go astray as for the sparks to fly upward," and the equally unphilosophical priest taking his "cue" from this idea incorporated in "holy writ," has elaborated the thought still further, and pronounced man in a state of nature "totally depraved."

But this is by no means the case. It is true that, under hereditary influences, or the "laws of hereditary descent," the child having a depraved parentage, and necessarily partaking thereof, enters life in a state of physical and mental depravity. But the child, under such influences, does not receive a natural, but only a preternatural or an abnormal existence; the evil in the case being due, not to nature, but to the penalties consequent upon the violation of, and departure from nature on the part of the parentage, before and during the pre-natal conditions of the child. And the very idea of the doctrine of regeneration, (the central idea of Christianity,) implies a bad or an abnormal generation. If, therefore, we would obviate the necessity of regeneration, let us understand and attend to the laws of generation. Take for instance the following example: A child is brought into the world by parents whose entire lives have been spent in the one direction of acquisitiveness—of making and hoarding up money. Now applying the old adage, "like father, like son," or "like begets like," is it not perfectly reasonable to suppose that the child will come into the world under a predominately developed acquisitiveness, under a preternatural bent, and an abnormal tendency in that direction? Hence the child, until educated up out of its pre-natal condition, will be depraved in this faculty, and will tend to become a thief, not by nature, but by receiving a preternatural or abnormal development of that faculty, which is only the penalty inflicted upon the child by Nature, through the parental violation of her sacred laws.

The parents upon discovering the thieving propensities of the child, and desiring to correct its errors and wayward tendencies, naturally seek a remedy in the same "holy book," which asserts that it is as "natural for a child to go astray as for the sparks to fly upward." Hence, upon opening this "holy book," they read, "spare the rod and spoil the child." And thereupon they betake themselves to the task of whipping out of the child that which they themselves have stamped upon its very life and being. And if happily, after a long, painful and severe course of corporal punishment and penal discipline (during which there is often much praying, and not unfrequently some swearing), they succeed in whipping out of the poor sorrowing child the wrong, the crime and the evil for which they alone are responsible, and for which they, and not the child, ought to suffer, they will rejoice in the good work they have accomplished, and bless the Bible for furnishing them so wise and holy a rule of action. But if they fail, (as they usually do,) then the priest will bring the magic powers of his sacred office to bear, and the child, having arrived at the years of accountability, is expected to "repent and be baptized for the remission of his sins," for all of which he, the repentant sinner, must become a regular attendant upon the "means of grace," which means, when properly interpreted, that he must contribute liberally to the support of the priest and the church.

But if all these parental, Bible and ministerial or religious remedies fail to correct the errors of the wayward, whose lives have been thus cursed by and through the wrongs and follies of an ignorant Christian parentage, they are then handed over to the tender mercies of civil, municipal or police courts, presided over by Christian judges, found guilty by Christian juries, are incarcerated in, and sentenced to hard labor in the Penitentiaries of the country, where a priest, under the "name and style" of a "chaplain," at a fine salary, is still in attendance, ostensibly for the purpose of reiterating the hitherto ineffectual teachings of the "holy Bible," which commands the poor, ignorant and unfortunate sinner to "repent and be baptized, and wash away his sins." And if, after all, the sins and iniquities of the parents are still carried out by proxy, by the hapless child, then at last, by an "angry God," he is delivered into the hands of a prowling "Devil, who goes about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour," and by him is "cast into a lake that burneth with fire and brimstone," "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched," and where his "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth" will be heard by his parents, who are seated in glory just above him, and around whose brows wreaths and garlands will entwine, as the "smoke of his torment shall ascend forever and ever."

O when will mankind learn to study, investigate, exercise, reason, reflect and think, and think for themselves instead of paying ignorant, designing, licentious "bishops, cardinals, prelates, crafty priests, ministers, clergymen, Right Rev. divines, doctors of divinity," and all other cognate appellations found in the nomenclature of knaves and fools, to think for them?

When a people surrender governmental and State affairs into the hands of a few men, under the mistaken idea that they will look after their rights and interests better than they themselves can, thus leaving them free from governmental responsibilities, then the mask falling from the pretended patriot, the usurper steps forth, sets his iron heel of tyranny on the necks of his impotent subjects, fills his coffers with the hard earnings of the toiling millions, grows insolent, heartless and cruel over the very amusement afforded him by the groans, sighs and tears, the unheard and unheeded petitions of his menial, abject, suffering subjects. If then in matters of State polity, "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," how much more is human development, moral and intellectual freedom the price of self-culture, self-thought, philosophical investigation, mental reflection, individual effort and personal study? When will the people become philosophical instead of theological? When will science take the place of superstition, and scientific works, which embody demonstrated facts, supersede Bibles which only contain in the main, exploded theories, the "say so" and the "guess-work" of religious world-makers, designing priests and ignorant divines? When will the people learn that freedom from pain, sickness, sorrow and "sin" depend wholly and entirely upon a knowledge of and obedience to our reciprocal relation to the elements, of which we are composed, and "in which we live and move and have our being"? When will they learn that obedience to law and not repentance of violated law will alone secure individual happiness? When will they learn that nature is not depraved and corrupt, but corruption and depravity are but the sequence of our ignorance of nature? And finally, when will they learn that a corrupt and depraved nature implies a corrupt and depraved God?

We Live in the Eternal Now!

Spiritualism, in its modern phase, called materialization, is, as appears by the papers, attracting some attention. Though an obscure individual, as one of the atoms of our common humanity, I need not be surprised if I do not wholly escape the magnetic current. At present I take no stock in the concern, either pro or con. I would not go three perches to see Miss "Katie King," and all the Indians, little and big, that could be resurrected—not even the squaws. I lived with Indians, away towards where the sun goes down, a long time ago, when Indians were Indians, and squaws were squaws. Those Green Mountain Indians seem to be another thing entirely—and so of the squaws.

The thought just pitched into my cranium—I'm not quite sure I have not already felt an oscillating touch of the magnetic force aforesaid.

Night before last a gentleman came and introduced himself to me as a reporter. Said he had been interviewing Mrs. Henry Ward Beecher. Mrs. Beecher told him she and Mr. Beecher had been lecturing about the country since the first of November—expected to keep on doing so 'till the middle of January, when they were to start for the Islands of the Southern Seas, to witness the Great Phenomena.

I said, What Great Phenomena? Reporter replied: I'm not posted any further. You must, if you wish to investigate further, have a reporter who knows more than I do. Which shall I call, Peter or John? I scratched my cranium to get the best idea out—give us Peter. Peter forthwith put in an appearance.

Making my prettiest bow, I said, Please have the politeness to tell us what are the Great Phenomena of the Islands of the Southern Seas?

"Are you prepared to write?" I am.

"Among the inhabitants of the Southern Seas is an organization whose central idea is to think by rule." Here Peter examined my notes to see if they were correct. "In their organic laws are metes and bounds defining what thoughts may enter the mind, and what may not enter the mind." This so novel a code brought to my mind a little historic reminiscence of many years ago, the recollection of which touched my bump of mirthfulness, and I laughed aloud—I awoke, and behold it was a dream. What a pity I laughed! I must take better care next time.

Dream or no dream, does it not open a fissure in the cloud which now so obscures our benighted Christian land?

What, for an idea, would it be for the Islands of the Southern Seas to send missionaries to this world-wide renowned land of liberty to establish Christian churches on the Jesus of Nazareth idea, "whoso looketh," or thinketh? Would not such change, in our Christian ethics, avert some little unpleasantness?

"As a man thinketh, so is he." Why not, so is she? If a man or woman—a gentleman or lady if you please—allow an impure thought to enter the mind, the thought is the cause—a feeling, a secretion, is the effect—next the cause. The next effect is some act, that will not bear the light—that will not bear the scrutiny of angels. Some act that will want a cloak of "imputed righteousness," to cover it. We drop the curtain.

To Spiritualism, in its sublimer manifestations, we make our most reverential bow. It touches the bond that binds this stupendous Universe together. It reaches the sublime center of all vitality. It thrills every fibre of our being. Through this vitalizing agency, man, now so rudimental, is to be perfected in the likeness of God.

We would not speak disparagingly of the current manifestations called materialization. They have their use. Some minds could be reached by nothing less tangible. The Powers above us mean us good—mean us all good.

PRENTISS.

Questions for the Clergy.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to ask the clergy a few questions through the columns of your paper:

First, do you believe in a Creator?
Do you believe in special Providences?
Do you believe the Bible represents the true God?
Did God have a design in all his works?
Is he a respecter of persons?
Did he intend that man should fall through the influence of the Devil?

Did he intend this Devil should cause him to become grieved at his heart and become repentant?

Did he make all the fish of the sea?
Did he intend the large fish to eat up the small ones? If yes, does he expect the small fish to render thanks to him?

Did he drown everything upon the earth, because everything was as he intended it?

What had the beasts of the field done that they should be drowned?

Were Lot and his two daughters the only righteous persons in Sodom and Gomorrah?

Is it a mark of righteousness to commit incest, and to get so drunk you know nothing?

Was David a man after God's own heart?

Was his heart in accordance with God's, when he put Uriah in front of the battle, that he might get killed, so that he might get his wife, because she was pretty?

Did God order the Israelites to slay all the males among the little ones, and kill all the women that had known man by lying with him, and to keep all the virgins alive for their own use?

Does God expect those mothers, brothers and daughters to worship him or his religion?

Are you clergy looking for the second coming of Christ and the judgment day?

Did God say in Matt. xvi. "that there was some standing there that should not taste death until he came?"

Did he say in Matt. xxiv., "that this generation should not pass away until he came to judge the world?"

Then why are you looking for his coming yet?

By answering these questions, it may be the means of converting a person from Atheism. I ask them in good faith, for information, and not to cavil and make light of your doctrine, but that I may receive the true light, if you have it.

Pratt, Ill.

JAMES M. PRATT.

THE Centennial buildings in Philadelphia will cover twenty acres, and to lessen the fatigue of a thorough visit an elevated railway is projected.

(Continued from No. 7.)

atom-built organism as intelligence; in a word, that matter and mind are one."

I think Tyndall plainly states that he does think mind and matter are one, in the sense that mind is, as Lewes says it is, a functional product of matter, though Tyndall does not understand how the function originates; but I presume that he cannot any better understand how the mind, which is always in proportion to the development of brain matter, can be a manifestation of a "universal Energy," which is not a product of matter.

Rowland Conner and Abbot agree that Tyndall's conception of materialism is the reverse of the ordinary meaning of the word; but Conner does not recognize the radical change in Tyndall's notion of matter that Weiss recognizes, viz: the conception of eternal living matter. Conner demurs to Abbot's definition of Tyndall's "Scientific Materialism." Abbot says Tyndall rejects that genuine form of materialism which explains everything by matter alone, and assumes the existence of an illimitable number of self-subsistent molecules governed by a strictly universal law of polarity. (The molecules are matter, and it is their function of polarity that constitutes the law. Tyndall does not suppose any other law of polarity.) Conner declares that Abbot, by the innocent introduction in the above definition of self-subsistent or eternal atoms, in which, Conner considers, Tyndall never believed, has altered the entire question as regards Tyndall. Conner says he has not yet sufficient reasons for accepting Abbot's conception that Tyndall's notion of substantial atoms endowed with inherent forces must dissolve under the influence of the new doctrine of the Conservatism of Energy, into that of pure forces; but if it be true, it will not, he says, affect Tyndall's argument for seeing in matter the promise and potency of every form and quality of life. Conner says endowed because he draws his conception of that from Tyndall's allusion to "the Creator of matter," in an expression intended by Tyndall as a reproach to those who despised matter which they believed their God had created. It was not intended to be the expression of his belief in a Creator of matter, nor of an Endower of forces upon matter. Conner concludes from this expression that Tyndall means that a Creator "endowed" matter with the "promise and potency," etc., though Clarke says this is what Tyndall purposed to deny.

Regarding Abbot's statement that "the way out of Tyndall's imperfect materialism is clear through it into a philosophy which shall show atoms to be manifestations of a unitary energy or "Power." Conner says if Abbot will frame an argument which shall really go through it, into the modified pantheism with which Abbot desires to replace it, he is ready to go through when he sees an opening, which he does not see as yet.

P. S. Conner thinks when Abbot wrote, "We refuse to juggle or be juggled with, by Spencer and Tyndall's 'empty gibberish of the unknowable,'" that he forgot that the first lesson in controversy is to unlearn our native tendency to treat our adversaries as fools. He thinks that the provisional acceptance of Spencer's views seems to make Abbot almost angry; and he says that other friends of Abbot think that exact justice to Spencer is prevented by Abbot's remembrance of some old grudge, or from prejudice on account of being defeated in controversy with Spencer. Abbot smiles at this quaint suggestion of any "remembered drubbing at his hands," and says: "If there was any drubbing it was in the opposite direction."

New Harmony, Indiana, Feb. 10th, 1875.

The Underwood-Burgess Debate at Cairo.

A contributor to the Christian Standard of January 16th, pretends to give a report of the recent debate at Cairo. Such a report!

Of Burgess, he says: "He seemed much better acquainted with the works of modern Scientists than Mr. Underwood and refuted every position that was taken by such writers as Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, etc."

"I did not hear of a person saying that he thought Mr. Underwood sustained himself."

"I am sure that not only was a great victory gained for the cause of Christ, but it has done much to check Infidelity in Southern Illinois and the adjoining portions of Kentucky and Missouri."

The same writer gives a pen picture of Mr. Underwood. He is described as a thick-set, dark, ugly-looking fellow, who has the appearance of a "prize fighter," and who spoke stammeringly, and occasionally seemed confused."

In justice to Mr. Underwood and the cause he represents, let us see what some of the secular papers said about the debate.

(From the Chicago Daily Tribune.)

A BIBLE DEBATE.

A very animated Bible debate has just been concluded in Cairo, between Prof. O. A. Burgess and Prof. B. F. Underwood. The debate was continued through six sessions, and before large and interested audiences. Burgess is President of the North-western Christian University at Indianapolis, and has the reputation of being the ablest debater in the Christian (Cambellite) denomination. Underwood is a well-known representative of Infidelity, and is quite noted as a writer and debater. A Boston paper (the Index) says he is in this country what Beuchner is in Germany.

Both gentlemen are ready, fluent talkers; but Burgess is the most eloquent. Underwood perhaps the most exact and logical. Burgess is quite an actor, and attracts attention by his manner of speaking as well as by what he presents. Underwood is direct, never uses a superfluous word, makes no attempt at word-painting, but sticks to his subject and tests everything by the merciless rules of logic. Both disputants are scholars, and show familiarity with the various schools of thought. The Infidel seems to have given the most attention to physical science, however.

As usual, both parties claim the victory. The debate was conducted in a good spirit, and the large audiences in attendance were much entertained and instructed.

(From the Cairo correspondent of the St. Louis Daily Times.)

CAIRO, (ILL.) DEC. 29, 1874.

There has been in this city a lively debate between O. A. Burgess and B. F. Underwood, on the Bible, its historic, scientific and moral worth; the most lively debate it has ever been my pleasure to hear.

Burgess is of the Cambellite denomination, and President of their theological college at Indianapolis. Underwood is a hard-headed, matter-of-fact Materialist, from Boston, the home of heresy and the city of isms in general.

Underwood had the affirmative all through the debate. The propositions required him to prove that the Bible abounds in errors in history and science, and teaches a morality not adapted to the nineteenth century.

The attendance was immense from the beginning to the end of the debate. The general opinion is that Underwood got away with Burgess, that the Boston man was too much for the Hoosier. Albeit it does not follow that the Bible has been vanquished. Many who acknowledge that the merits of the debate are on the side of the Infidel, are not ready to admit that the Bible and Christianity are defeated or their claims invalidated.

Burgess is smart, tonguey, eloquent, but he is not the man to make the best defense of the Bible. Underwood on the contrary is learned, logical, and scientific, and knows how to make the most of a weak cause. He is probably the best debater in the ranks of the American Freethinkers. He is a representative of "modern thought," and is one of the most logical speakers and skillful debaters in America. Burgess stands well with his denomination, but our community is hardly satisfied with his defense of their faith.

A Chicago Times correspondent, in a letter dated Dec. 28th, noticed the debate at the length of half a column, and while the writer said "Christians and Freethinkers both seemed well satisfied with the results," admitted that Underwood was "the closest thinker and most careful reasoner."

The Boston Investigator mentioning the debate, said:

THE GREAT DEBATE.

UNDERWOOD vs. BURGESS.—Western papers speak highly of Mr. Underwood in his debate with Mr. Burgess, at Cairo, Illinois, and rather give our Boston Infidel the preference on the score of ability, though as Burgess is President of a College the Christians were sure he would conquer. But we read that David slew Goliath, and we infer from reports that our Brother Underwood doubled up President Burgess in the most approved style.

The Carroll County (Illinois) Gazette quotes the description of Mr. Underwood from the Christian Standard, and says:

"We publish it so that our readers, the most of whom will recollect the debate between these gentlemen in Lankark, may see for themselves the correctness of the likeness! It is the first time we have ever heard that this 'heavy-set, thick-necked, dark-haired, dark-complexioned prize fighter' was at a loss for words." Such a description, we venture to say, could never find a place in a secular newspaper."

The following additional extracts in regard to Mr. Underwood's personal appearance and characteristics as a speaker will show the pious contributor to the pious Christian Standard to be a bigot and a falsifier:

(From the Indianapolis Journal (Ind.) of Oct. 15th, 1874.)

"An audience of 800 or 1000 people listened to B. F. Underwood at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon. He is a man of fine appearance, and is an interesting and engaging speaker, often quite witty."

(From the Milwaukee (Wis) Daily Advertiser, Nov. 23, 1874.)

"Mr. Underwood's appearance is familiar to most of our readers. He is slightly under the average size, solidly built, but without superfluous flesh, and has an open, pleasant face. His delivery is quiet and business like, entirely free from the flourishes of art, but easy and pleasing. His style is singularly pure and exact."

(From the Penn Yan (N. Y.) Chronicle.)

"Mr. Underwood is an experienced and rather fluent lecturer, and states his points with clearness and force."

(From the Stockton (Cal.) Herald.)

"Mr. Underwood is a good, thorough, somewhat rapid speaker, and evidently has his subject well in hand as he refers but seldom to notes or authorities."

Referring to the debate between Rev. F. F. Campbell and B. F. Underwood at Eugene City, Oregon, the Eugene Hawkeye said:

"Campbell is a learned man, a smooth speaker, a deep thinker, and a profound logician. And we cannot say less of Underwood."

And Rev. Campbell, President of Monmouth (Oregon) College, after a six nights' debate with Mr. Underwood, wrote in his own paper, the Christian Messenger, of Aug. 20th, 1873, as follows:

"We found Mr. Underwood a gentleman of talents and attainments, worthy of the reputation he has won as a lecturer, and affable, courteous and fair in debate."

Whether Mr. Underwood sustained his position in the Cairo debate, or whether he is a ruffian in appearance, let the reader judge.

FAIR PLAY.

A Short Sermon to Your Readers.

MR. EDITOR: I see that you are a liberal man, and ever ready to publish truth as well as error. And I see that most of your contributors talk as though they did not believe the holy Bible to be the infallible word of God, in its every word and line. In fact, many of them claim that it is contradictory in many of its statements, and that God is devilish in many of his acts. Now sir, this is all owing to their not being theologians, thereby not understanding the language of heaven. For, sir, be it known that heaven's arithmetic and grammar can be only understood by the theologians. But I am to preach a sermon to your contributors; so to my text.

2 Thes. ii: 11, 12, "And for this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned, who believe not the truth."

We shall divide this subject into three heads:

First. Who and what is this God that sends a strong delusion to make them believe a lie in order that they might be damned?

Second. The reason that he sends them a strong delusion that they might all be damned?

Third, and lastly, who is it he wants to damn, and what does he want to damn them for?

1. Who and what is this God? It is evidently not the God of nature that sends the rain and sunshine alike upon the evil and good, who scatters his blessings every-where, from whose hand the flowers burst forth with every returning spring upon every hillside, and valley, and wide extending plain, apparently not caring a cent whether man or beasts tread upon them, or gathers them up. But ever true to himself, regardless of high or low, rich or poor, sublime or vulgar, all nature brought forth in perfect accord with her development. O, no; it is not such a God as this that has not sense enough to know who to bless and who to curse, oh, no.

This God is the author of the holy Bible. 'Tis true that sometheologians claim that in his better mood he is one with the God of nature. For your contributors must be made to understand that nouns have moods in heaven's language; and so powerful are these moods, that they change a saint to a demon, and a God to a Devil in the twinkling of an eye.

This God of the Bible is a pure and holy being, not willing that any should perish; but as a loving father, caring for all his children alike, without respect to persons, in the one mood, and a perfect demon, sending lying spirits to deceive his prophets, tempting the man after his own heart to number Israel in order that he might have an excuse to slay seventy thousand men (besides women and children) to satiate his thirst for blood, and in accordance with our text, sending strong delusion to make men believe a lie, so that he might damn them for not believing the truth, in his other mood.

God and the Devil, according to the Bible, are one and the same being; and it is all owing to the mood whether he be the one or the other.

"This is a bare assertion," I hear some unbeliever say. Hold on, sir, I have the proof, both logical and scriptural; and "in the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established."

1. Logically—it is impossible for two supreme beings to occupy the same space and territory. This God and this Devil are every-where present, and rule by the same laws. You might as well conceive of an "irresistible ball coming in contact with an impetrable wall," as to conceive of two Supreme Beings to hold control at the same time. Sir; it is impossible. "The thing can't be did." Therefore, logically, God and the Devil are one.

2. Scripturally—2 Sam., xxiv: 1, "The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel; and he moved David against them to say: 'Go number Israel.' Again, 1 Chron., xxi: 1, "And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel." Now sir, the Bible is an infallible book and never contradicts itself when rightly understood. The above Lord and Satan must be one and the same. If your contributors only understood heaven's language, especially its moods, they would not be crying out, "contradictions! contradictions!" It is all in the mood, sir! Again, 2 Cor., xi: 14, "For Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light."

"It is a poor rule that won't work both ways." You see that one mood transforms (God) an angel of light into Satan, and the other mood, Satan into (God) an angel of light.

Again, "With God all things are possible." And then again, "God cannot lie." Here would seem to be a contradiction in our language, showing that it was impossible for God to lie. But not so with heaven's language; for all you have to do is to change the mood, and he becomes the "father of liars," as the Scriptures abundantly prove.

Again, "God is not man that he should repent." And again, "It repented God that he had made man." No contradiction here. In the diabolical mood he never repents, but rejoices, "that to the glory of his justice" he has innumerable deluded men to damn. But change the mood and he repents that he is to bring so much misery upon men that he has deluded.

I think it must be plain to all your deluded readers, that the proof is beyond controversy, that God and his Satanic Majesty are one and the same.

I therefore, hasten on to dispatch the other heads.

2. The reason that he sends them a strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they might all be damned that believed not the truth."

God's servant Paul had been teaching the Gentiles some very wholesome truths, about the resurrection of the body and salvation of the soul, "through faith in the blood of a crucified Jesus," whose blood was drawn out into a fountain opened (for the purpose) in the house of David where they could wash themselves in that blood from all uncleanness, and come out pure and spotless. In fact, Paul taught the beautiful and logical doctrine that they only had to believe or have faith that there was a fountain of Jesus' blood in the house of David at Jerusalem, in which they were to be washed, and it was all that was necessary to save and safely house in heaven, the nastiest, blackest, dirtiest blackguard of a sinner that ever lived.

Now as God in one of his diabolical moods looked down the line of the coming race, and saw the innumerable multitudes that would (if left to themselves) believe this logical and reasonable doctrine of Paul's, and saw that heaven would be overburdened with saints and hell lack for fuel, he with diabolical finger-touched the pen of the sainted Paul, who, moved by the inspiration, penned the sacred text, "God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie, that they all might be damned that believe not the truth."

3. Who is it that he wants to damn, and what does he want to damn them for?

It is those that he has deluded to believe a lie, in order that he might damn them for not believing the truth?

Let none call the above an absurdity. If you only was a theologian, and understood the language of heaven you could see it in its grandeur and beauty.

Sir, this short sermon is so applicable to your numerous contributors, that it needs no application; but by way of parenthesis I might put in a MORAL.

There is nothing so absurd, but it can be proved by Scripture.
REV. THEOLOGICUS, D.D.

New-York Liberal Club.

FEBRUARY 19TH, 1875.

The Nature and Uses of Poetry.

BY REV. W. R. ALGER.

Every thought or emotion on reaching a certain pitch of clearness or intensity, seeks a vent through some channel of expression. The most adequate vent is an action aiming to adjust the organism with the exigency. Thus hunger expresses itself in the act of appropriating food, hate in the infliction of violence, terror in flight. When the inner impulse is not strong enough to embody itself in an act of fulfillment, it may expend itself in a gesture, which is an imitative or substitutional representation of the real act. For instance, a hater restrained from smiting his enemy, may scowl, set his teeth, make a lunge into empty space, and thus work off, in mimetic gesture, the nervous energy, kept from its legitimate discharge in an actual blow.

Another vent for experience is language; that is to say, human thoughts or emotions may be expressed, first in fulfilling deeds; secondly, in symbolic gestures; and thirdly, in verbal signs, oral or written. The fine arts are modes of language, whose aim it is to externalize the experience of men—the painter, sculptor, musician respectively employing the resources of color, form and sound to express human feelings and ideas. The literary artist seeks the same end by means of words—the most complete instrumentality given to any of the arts—the breathing organ of thought. The other arts can only hint thoughts, but words utter them as articulate coins immediately stamped and dropped from the mint of the mind. No brush, chisel or lute can so directly impart ideas and emotions, so freighted with meaning and pathos as is instantaneously done by the simple words friendship, home, joy, sorrow, farewell, mother. The author or speaker, therefore, is the most mightily equipped of all those artists, whose mission it is, by primarily expressing, secondarily to rekindle and nourish the experience of the human soul.

A language, to express his emotions and thoughts in signs, which his fellows can recognize, is a necessity for man as a social being, else he were destitute of sympathy—shut up in a hopeless solitude. Provision is made for this necessity in the audible reactions of the mind through the vocal organs. As soon as visible equivalents are invented for these audible symbols of experience, literature begins. Poetry is a peculiar department within the general province of literature. The characteristics which distinguish poetic from other literary products, are important. All literature may be arranged under the five heads—history, science, philosophy, religion and poetry. History records occurrences in the order in which they take place. Science exactly classifies objects and relations as they are. Philosophy inquires after the causes and laws of things as they operate in the realm of nature, and seeks to construct a coherent theory of what appears. Religion, which is the omnipresent drift towards unity regards everything in its unitary aspect, and depicts it as tied up in one unbroken order, or dependent on one infinite will. Historic, scientific, philosophic and religious literature, then, seek to give verbal registry to the actual material and life of the world as they are in themselves, in their causes and in their relations as a whole, without abatement or addition.

But poetry, in distinction from all these, is creative, the building of literary fabrics out of stuff at least partially fictitious. With the objects and events embodied in its descriptions, poetry avowedly mixes the energies and colors of the mind, which the other varieties of literature profess to keep out, so as to report the bare reality. Thus the historian shapes the matter of his narrative into the dry likeness of truth, but the poet makes it move and glow as his august prototype breathed consciousness into an image of clay. The scientist sets forth the cold form of an actual object; the poet transfuses it with a soul. The philosopher and the religionist each in his way attempts to grasp those determinations of motive and end between which all things proceed. The poet, careless of the spectral domain of metaphysics, embraces the living appearances of things, as they approach, and sheds a transfiguring radiance and warmth over them from his own purity. Poetry is the spontaneous producer of phenomena, the soliloquizing overflow of rhythmic mind. Poetry fills things with ideal life, and blends them with glorifying associations. To sum up in a word, the matter-of-fact man would portray a thing as it is in itself, but the poet portrays it as it appears in the excited mind with all sorts of enrichments.

I once saw the full moon rise out of the ocean, and hang for a moment, broadly poised, on the edge of the dark waste of waters, when suddenly a ship, with sails all spread, passed solemnly across it, seeming as it passed to be a perfect picture stamped on the gleaming disc. So poetry sets its lucid and beautifying mirror behind the objects it exhibits, lending them a distinctness and glory not their own. Other forms of literature aim to reflect the Universe in the white light of truth; poetry shows it to us through the many colored prism of the imagination. They will be historic or scientific, that is, statements of experience in precise accordance with the facts. When the reactions are excessive, the exuberance and fictitiousness, furnished by the mind, joined with the truth, forms a poetic product. The overflow of thought and feeling, which finds nothing without to react on, must make something. The surplus mental energy, if nature supply no mould, will harden in its own fluent form, and then forcibly print its die on whatever is first offered to it. This is the origin of all mythology, which is really poetry, disguised as philosophy and religion.

Byron says: "Poetry is to create from overfeeling good or ill." There are two devices to which the poetic mind has recourse to dispose of its unappropriated energy. Since it cannot strictly create new things, it virtually does it by filling inanimate things with the spirit of life. This is the great characteristic of the mind overcharged with spiritual force. The enthusiastic lover transfuses all nature with the presence of his beloved. The intensely believing phantasy of the Greek saw the landscape alive with arjays, nayads and oreads. The brain filled and tingling with excitement, discharges its profuse batteries into whatever objects are brought in relations with it, and animates them with its own states.

The other devices to which the poetic spirit has recourse, is association, making objects and events emblematic of something beyond themselves. Science dissects things, groups them by themselves, and presents them as dry facts. Poetry collects and fuses things, weaves over them a vascular web of emotional relationship, and presents them in mysterious union, each wearing a vague fringe of beauty, and all swathed in a trailing cloud of meaning beyond what is expressed.

This characteristic goes to the inmost root of the distinction between science and poetry, namely, that while in the statement of the former, each fact, or set of facts, stands distinct and self-sufficing, in the latter it is robed in a cloudy halo of emblematic association and suggestiveness. The poet sees and feels so deep and wide, the sensitive and tenacious tentacles of his imagination, are so numerous, that when any earnest experience goes forth, it carries symbolic meanings with it, tears off and bears along fringes of association, inter-penetrating mechanical forms with spirit, and loading insignificant facts with eternal truth and prophecy. Each trite object bears a burden of admonishing suggestions to pierce the soul.

The two peculiarities which distinguish poetic verse from prose, are rhythm and comparative abundance of metaphor. The character and office of these two elements must be illustrated for an accurate understanding of the formal nature of poetry. Rhythm is a spontaneous attribute of our physical organism, when acting with profuse wealth and force; and metaphor is an instinctive artifice of the mind acting under the same condition. Both are natural marks of spiritual richness or excitement, and poetry is a fruit of their union. Let us see how this is.

We know that all the functions of our being are sustained by the assimilation and consumption of force. The performance of any act by us implies the accumulation and expenditure of the power by which it is performed. Now all these movements of nutrition and waste, as the laws of physiology demonstrate, are intermittent and measured work, not in continuous flow, but in vibrations or pulses. When the nervous force worked off in gestures, is so copious as to secure a regularly recurring discharge, the man, as in barbaric tribes, breaks into measured movements, and the dance is born. Dancing, music and poetry, under prepared conditions, are products of the over-stimulus of brain and nerves.

Our life consists of the deep-seated, mysterious action of organic polarities, securing time-regulated deposits of nutrition and discharges of functional energy. When verbal utterance catches up this metrical movement, we have verse, which is distinguished from prose by its regularity of accentuation. Then pulse on pulse of mental power beats forth in parallelism and rhymes. This principle pervades all nature.

"For the world was made in order,
And the atoms march in tune:

Thou canst not wave thy staff in air,
Or dip thy paddle in the lake,
But it curves the bow of beauty there,
And the ripples in rhymes the oar forsake."

Every man is keyed to some measure, set to some tune. Whenever a passion, adequate to that measure, strikes him, a mood up to the level of that tune possesses him, he breaks into music and song. The poet is a man whose sensibility is so keen and rich, whose faculty of expression is so quick and copious that he easily overflows into beautiful verse.

Verse economizes the mental force required to follow a train of thought or emotion, by furnishing it regular rests. The recurrent succession of mental pausing and grouping, looking for, and leaning on the measured intervals and rhymes, sustains attention by regularly relieving it, and gives to poetic composition that intensity of emphasis, that prose vainly strives to reach. How much more effective the sentiment, there is no better time for man to die than when he falls a sacrifice for the good of humanity, if put into poetry, thus:

"Or on the gallows high,
Or in the battle's van,
Man's noblest time to die
Is when he dies for man."

The other element of poetry is metaphor. You will find the nature of metaphorical language to be a spontaneous device to express the copious excitement of the mind, when the immediate objects of its experience do not furnish it sufficient vent, by associating with these objects in a sort of living union, such other stimulative objects as can be brought into imaginative relation with them. For instance, a person of sensitive nature seeing a solitary cloud floating in the sky, below the stars, unable to express in a literal description of the bare fact, all the emotion engendered in him, says, "one snowy cloud hangs an avalanche of frozen light on the peak of night's blue crest." All metaphor is at bottom the heightening of mental excitement, by joining to a less exciting thought a more exciting one. Byron, describing an innocent maiden of the South Sea Islands emerging from her ocean bath, illustrates this adding effect of association when he says:

"Naked in faith, and feeling as in form,
She stood as stands the rainbow in a storm."

The first use of poetry is to give the soul the relief and pleasure of expression. The experiences that stir or burn and crowd within the soul, are not satisfied until they obtain a revelation of themselves.

The poet has the gift to do this. What all men dimly feel, he feels so powerfully as to compel an utterance, and he is so endowed as to secure for it a melodious and beautiful one, which imparts sensations of ease and joy to all who appreciate it. The enjoyment of a full and felicitous expression of its experience, confronting it again as in a mirror, is one of the purest pleasures of the mind.

Poets are persons of more affluent and susceptible natures than other men, and symbolizing their experience in the choicest words, reveal man to himself. No small portion of the astonishment and delight we derive from the works of the poets, arises from recognizing the glorified shapes of what we had obscurely felt in the most secret shrines of our being, and had thought peculiar to ourselves. Poetry would be amply justified, had it no other use than to give pleasurable vent, with reacting enrichments to the yearning experience of the soul. He is no genuine poet who needs a motive beyond this. Two nightingales, who had long filled the woods with their melody, once sat silent a moment, when one said to the other: "I am weary of singing all night to these dull boughs, and the heedless moon and stars, with none to listen and call my songs beautiful. I will fly to the city, and there lift my voice till the enraptured crowd pause and praise me." The other one said: "I am happy to sing because my breast is full. My song is an effluence of joy and worship. If men listen and are pleased, I am glad; if they heed not, none the less happy am I in singing." The ambitious one flew to the city, but amid the din and jostle was unheeded, and returned disappointed, soon died with none to mourn. But the other still contrived to entrance the night, and the laborer paused to listen, and students and lovers who wandered there loved nature more because this bird had sung.

The second function of poetry is to reproduce in the soul of the reader, the experience expressed by the author. This is the second use of poetry, to enrich the impoverished multitudes of beneficiary mankind with the ideal wealth of the great millionaires of soul. Who can read Moore's exquisite lines on "Vesper Chimes," and not have his soul filled with delightful memories?

"Those evening bells, those evening bells,
How many a tale their music tells.
Of love and youth, and that sweet time
When first I heard their soothing chime.

Those joyous hours are passed away,
And many a heart that then was gay,
Within the tomb now darkly dwells,
And hears no more those evening bells.

And so 'twill be when I am gone,
That tuneful peal will still ring on,
While other birds shall walk these dells,
And sing your praise, sweet evening bells."

In the third place it is the marvelous prerogative of literature in general, of poetry in especial, to translate all nature, life and experience into their verbal equivalents, and preserve them embalmed in a sort of intellectual amber, in perpetual readiness for realization and enjoyment. For example, few persons, and they only rarely, can roam amidst the stately piles of feudal architecture, listen to the reduplicated notes of the mallow horns fading over the distant glens and rocks, and call up the magic tales and sights of fairy love in their native localities. But when Tennyson sets it in verse, any one, by repeating, may surround himself with the romantic scenery and legendary sounds.

"The splendor falls on castle walls,
And snowy summits old in story:
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark! O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
O sweet and far from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elfin faintly blowing,
Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
Blow, bugle; answer, echo, dying, dying, dying."

Poetry condenses the great provinces of the material creation, history, fancy, passion, philosophy into portable forms, to be borne in the memory.

Another mission of poetry is to reveal to duller eyes and colder hearts, the beauty and joyfulness of nature; to unveil the attractions, rouse the imitations, illustrate the wholesome pleasures of nature; to redeem the hardened from their sullen seclusion, and to restore the outcast from poverty and despair to their proper heritage in the open spectacle and banquet of the Universe. Millions of men are so coarse and vulgar, so absorbed and harassed, or so thin and frivolous, as to be insensible to the infinite loveliness and awe that crowds every nook of creation, the infinite sweetness and mystery that pervades our existence. It is the happy privilege of the poet to be intensely alive to these divine realities, and it is his sacred commission to quicken others to the same exalted perceptions.

For O is it you, is it you
Moonlight, and shadow, and lake,
And mountains that fill us with joy,
Or the poet that sings so well?
Is it you, O Bounty and Grace,
O Charm and Romance, that we tell,
Or the voice that reveals what you are?
Are ye like daylight and sun
Shared and rejoiced in by all?
Or are ye immersed in the mass
Of matter, and hard to extract,
Or sunk in the core of the world,
Too deep for the most to discern?
Like stars in the depth of the sky,
Which arise on the glass of the sage,
But are lost when their watch is gone?

The poet is eminently an emancipator of men. One of his choicest functions is to thrill imprisoned souls with the notes of liberty, open their cages of care, and set them free in the cosmopolitan freedom of love and truth. To many a soured and weary drudger, a volume of verse has come with blessed beguilement, as a bird lighting on a dungeon bar, has made the captive forget his fetters, wooing him back to the loves and hopes of his childhood. The poet lifts us out of self, tears off the husks of stupidity and bigotry, expands us beyond the limit of egotism, makes us live in the whole life of humanity. He carries us into the boundless realms of ideality. In a world so filled in and set on fire with jostling rivalries as modern society is, the most universal weakness, sin and misery can hardly fail to be egotistic jealousy. That fault is rebuked by every true stanza of poetry, from first to last.

With what exquisite delicacy and contagious insinuation poetry teaches the lesson of sympathetic generosity.

A nightingale made a mistake;
She sang a few notes out of tune;
Her heart was ready to break,
And she hid away from the moon.
She wrung her claws, poor thing,
But was far too proud to speak,
So tucked her head under her wing,
And pretended to be asleep!

A lark, arm in arm with a thrush,
Came sauntering up to the place,
The nightingale felt herself blush,
Though feathers hid her face.
She knew they had heard her song,
She felt them snigger and sneer,

She thought this life too long,
And wished she could skip a year.

"O, nightingale!" cooed a dove,
"O, Nightingale, what's the use,
You bird of beauty and love,
Why behave like a goose?
Don't skulk away from our sight,
Like a common, contemptible fowl,
You bird of joy and delight,
Why behave like an owl?"

"Only think of all you have done!
Only think of all you can do!
A false note is really fun
From such a bird as you.
Lift up your proud little crest,
Open your musical beak;
Other birds have to do their best,
You need only to speak."

The nightingale shyly took
Her head from under her wing,
And giving the dove a look,
Straightway began to sing:
There was never a bird could pass;
The night was divinely calm,
And the people stood in the grass,
To hear that wonderful psalm.

The nightingale did not care,
She sang only to the skies,
The song ascended there,
And there she fixed her eyes.
The people that stood below,
She knew little about,
And this story's a moral I know,
If you'll try to find it out.

Loving sympathy is far better than conceited and censorious criticism.

Another central feature in poetry is consolation. The poet is the tenderest and most sympathetic of men.

To do justice to the usefulness of poetry as a chosen vehicle of wit, would require a whole lecture. This department of verse is exceedingly rich, and dispenses unmeasured relief and cheer to men, breaking up the viscous network of sentimentality, cutting the faculties free with its flashing strokes, filling the mind with charity and elasticity, giving smiles for frowns.

"When Sarah Jane, the moral miss,
Declares 'tis very wrong to kiss,
I'll bet a shilling I see through it;
The damsel fairly understood,
Feels just as any Christian should,
She'd rather suffer wrong than do it."

Entering the enchanted realm of poetry, we half find, half create, a better sphere. When old, worn and weary from the battling cares of our days, we renew ourselves with literary nectar and ambrosia, we have recourse to those

"Olympian bards who sang
Divine ideas below."

Ideas which if they do not always find us young, at least possess the power to make us so.

T. B. WAKEMAN followed the lecture, and spoke in very complimentary terms of the same, and yielded to poetry a high position in his classification of sciences. He referred to a chart he had used on a former occasion in illustrating his theory of classifications in the similitude of a tree, the roots of which are the senses representing science, next above the will and intellect, the body and trunk, and highest of all, the feelings and emotions, the branches and leaves, the roots in the air. In the emotions was poetry located. Its influence is ennobling. He rolled the chart in cylindrical form, thus bringing the roots and branches in unison, illustrative of the close connection between the senses, the intellect and the emotions. He observed some men were great in one sphere, and others in another. He mentioned a name—Goethe, who was great in all—a whole man, great in scientific knowledge, great in intellectual power, great in his emotional nature—a thinker, a philosopher, a statesman, a poet—great in all.

He thought poets were becoming humanized. Formerly they yielded to tradition and superstition, and placed their God in the skies; now they saw the divine nature in man, their God is becoming humanized, and now is seen most in human beings. Human and divine are more and more becoming to be synonymous terms. The divinity of the present and future is humanity.

MR. DAWSON followed in very eulogistic approval of the lecture, and of poetry and the poets. In beauty, terseness and perfection of language and expression, he placed poetry far above prose, and gave several specimens in point; among others, Christ's turning water to wine. This, when stated in prosaic language, was common-place and pointless; but this is the way the poet expresses it: "The conscious water saw its Lord and blushed." He recited several poetic gems, and was very ardent in his admiration of poetry.

S. P. ANDREWS spoke in high commendation of the lecture of the evening, and highly appreciated the man. He yielded to poetry a high position among the arts, and accorded to it beauty, emotion and elevation, but it was the incisive, the analytical, the doubting, the investigating element in human nature that was most useful in increasing knowledge. He found his analogies in the human organization. While physiology was the most pleasant and agreeable, it was the harsh, cruel, cutting knife of the anatomist that developed truth, and had done most to discriminate it in the world. He remarked that poets, in their actual lives, rarely equaled their idealizations, or in other words, they are never as great in their lives as in their writings.

MRS. DOUGHTY thought poets seldom exceeded themselves. It has been said Shakespeare "built better than he knew;" this she dissented from, believing that poets had to be possessed of the intelligence and poetic feeling their productions contained to be able to write as they do.

D. T. GARDNER was not inclined to place poetry so high as had been done by the other speakers. He had paid much attention to the subject, and for six years had studied it closely; but he must say he had not been able to make much out of it. He remembered some years ago reading a poem of Gerald Massey's, entitled "The People's Advent," and was highly interested in it. When Prof. Massey visited this city on his recent tour, he had an interview with him, and in course of the conversation alluded to the poem named, and mentioned the peculiar impression it made upon his mind. Mr. Massey cavalierly passed the subject by, saying: "O, that poem I wrote many years ago. My mind has greatly changed since then." He regarded poetry as the language of extravagance, and nine-tenths of it was mere doggerel, insipid and worthless. He quoted the expression often used when a person becomes sensible and sound, that "poetry is all knocked out of him," as having much meaning and force. How absurd the figures often used by poets. The one alluded to just now is a case in point in reference to water blushing. Why water cannot blush. It is utterly impossible, God or no God. What nonsense to talk about water blushing. The license of poets is all of much the same character. When they cannot easily find a rhyme, or the idea they wish, they substitute something else, and this is called "the poet's privilege," but he did not value it very highly. While he regarded poetry well enough in its way, it was not entitled to the high position which many accord it.

DR. ATKINSON and DR. HALLOCK each made a few remarks upon the subject.

W. J. ORMSBY made a few closing remarks. He allowed there was much difference in persons possessing ability to appreciate poetry. He doubted not his friend Gardner's six years in studying poetry had been entirely thrown away. It is not worth while to criticize poets and their figures too closely. True, with regard to Edgar A. Poe's admired poem of "The Raven," there was evidently imagination there, but science has even discovered that a raven, sitting on a bust over the door of a room, could hardly throw a shadow on the floor, unless a lamp or light of some kind was back of it, but probably we should not be too exact in our criticisms.

FEBRUARY 26TH, 1875.

MR. SIMON STERN spoke before the Club on Nominations and Elections. The speaker took a very practical view of his subject. He commenced by saying there were two sides to this question—the romantic and real. When we hear it talked of, when we listen to all the fine things this suffrage will bring us, we think it the most glorious and desirable thing in the world. This is the romance of it. But when once behind the scenes we see how vastly different the reality is. The management of caucuses and primary meetings was given at length, showing how seldom our office-holders are the choice of the people. Politics is a business as much as anything else. There are many wrongs in our systems of elections—majority representation being the worst feature. Magna Charta did not come into existence as the result of any theory. It has done more for the English people and mankind than any other one thing has done. It embodied a real practical want of the whole people.

Our elections are guarded with the most jealous care, but we vote for people we know nothing of, indeed, have never heard of before. These tickets have been concocted at caucuses and primary meetings. People say men don't do their duty. They should attend these primary meetings and see to it that good men are nominated. Go and raise your voice in opposition to the plan and discussions in a primary meeting and you will be put out.

These bodies make a business of apportioning offices and securing them. All the machinery of these places must be paid for. One man wants to be a judge; he quietly puts into the hands of these men $5000. He has no further trouble about it. Slavery is not so terrible as this system.

One remedy for this is a legal organization of the people, where they can really have a voice and choose for themselves. In each ward there should be a place of public meeting. The burden of the lecture was to show the injustice of the minority having no representation, which was discussed at length by members of the Club, some thinking it an impossibility and others differing from this view.

MR. MORAN objected to all kinds of governments, charters and laws, and advocated the inherent right to govern ourselves.

MR. STILLMAN spoke of the corruption at the polls, and how bad men could buy themselves offices.

DR. HALLOCK said there were two parties responsible in such a transaction; for if no one was ready to sell a vote, none could be bought.

MRS. HALLOCK said she couldn't sit still any longer and hear men deciding this question from their point of view only. For her part, she believed the wrongs of the system would never be righted until women were admitted to their proper and legitimate place by the side of men. She believed that our legislators divided their time between making and breaking laws.

MR. NASH didn't see how minority representation was to be brought about. He said if a street needs grading, and two-thirds of the residents are in favor of that improvement the rest ought to be compelled to submit to it. There are times when their vote would be injurious to the general good.

MR. S. P. ANDREWS said he believed in one man power, if the right man could be found. He said Mr. Moran's ideas of self-government were what he called "individuality run mad." There was a point where individual interest became more intimately connected with the general interest. He considered our government the best the sun ever shown on, and the best the world would see for many years to come. A voice in the audience asked how about the government of Louisiana. Mr. Andrews quickly turned, and throwing all his wonderful power into his words, said: "Yes, even Louisiana is a better governed State to-day than it was thirty years ago when I was hounded from within its borders for advocating human rights!" We are in a transition state, he said, and gradually improving.

MR. STERNE closed the discussion by answering Mrs. Hallock with regard to woman suffrage, but he had no objection to women being admitted to the ballot—was of the opinion that it was not best to admit any greater number into the ranks of voters until some better plan was devised for running the machinery of politics.

MARCH 5TH.

PROF. P. H. VAN DERWEYDE delivered a lecture on BENJAMIN THOMPSON, known as "Count Rumford." Massachusetts is justly proud of having been the birth-place, cradle and school of this great philosopher, who had the boldness to overthrow the speculative notion of the existence of a caloric fluid which had prevailed since the time of Aristotle, and who proved that the mysterious, so-called vital force does not exist, and boldly proclaimed the materialistic doctrine that the motive power observed in all living beings has its origin in their food, as that of the steam engine comes from its fuel. This man was Benjamin Thompson, born in Woburn, Mass., in 1753. At sixteen he attended the lectures on natural philosophy in Harvard University. This stirred up his enthusiasm for physical research which never left him. When the war of the Revolution broke out he joined the American army, and took part in the battle of Lexington. Being ambitious he sought a commission from Congress, but failed for the reason that he had been acquainted with Governor Wentworth, of New Hampshire, and others friendly to England. This brought him under suspicion which he could not overcome. He eventually went within the British lines and left in 1776 for England.

In London he formed the acquaintance of scientific and military men and was soon raised to distinction as a member of the Royal Society and Under Secretary of State, also as Colonel of the British army. His fondness for travel took him to Strasburg. Here he made the acquaintance of Deux Ponts, afterward King of Bavaria, who introduced him to men of eminence and literary distinction. Munich became his residence and the seat of his subsequent fame. His philosophical researches and discoveries became celebrated throughout Europe. His public and domestic improvements were acknowledged and adopted.

His scientific investigations were laborious, original and tended to purposes of practical utility. The two mysterious agencies, heat and light, were special objects of his attention. He experimented on the non-conducting power of the different substances of heat, that he might bring them to practical use in clothing. He investigated the phenomena of radiation and the modes of producing retaining and economizing heat, that the greatest results might be brought into use with the smallest expense of combustion. His philanthropic institutions for the support and nourishment of the poor were among the most fortunate and successful efforts of his genius. He succeeded in relieving society of one of its most unprofitable burdens, and substituting industry and comfort in place of idleness, profligacy and want. In appreciation of his services in this direction an expensive monument was erected at Munich, commemorating his efforts in behalf of the poor, and bearing inscriptions to that effect. He was knighted by the kings of Great Britain and Poland, and was raised to the dignity of Count of the German Empire. His title was Count Rumford, taking the same from a place in New Hampshire by that name where he taught school in his early life and where he was duly appreciated.

He afterward took up his residence in Paris, but an excess of homage had the effect to render him unamiable in demeanor and unconciliatory in manner. After his death, European journals were full of his praise. His eulogy was sounded in the Institute of France by one of the most learned men of the day.

The lecturer alluded to the series of experiments made by Thompson in ascertaining the amount of friction necessary to produce a given amount of heat, and in lifting bodies of certain weight by means of cords and pulleys, demonstrating the exact power of heat; also as to his discoveries in regard to hydrogen, as well as to others of his investigations in the fields of science. He was impressed with the magnitude of Thompson's attainments and discoveries, and deemed it a coincidence that Franklin and Thompson, the only two great scientists America had produced, should have been born in the same town or a few miles apart.

MR. NASH followed. He thought scientific men often jumped at conclusions on too small data. He instanced Thompson testing upon himself the nutritive properties of a pound of corn meal and setting down for fact that which had not been sufficiently tested on a large scale. He also alluded to the early life of Thompson, and criticized his course in turning against his own country in the struggle she was making for freedom, and stated as a fact that he returned from Europe and raised a regiment to fight against the patriots who were contending for liberty.

DR. LAMBERT playfully said it was true Franklin and Thompson were born near each other, and it may well be regarded as a coincidence, but as his friend Andrews holds there are three states or conditions in all things, which he denominates Unism, Duism and Trinism, the coincidence was greater and the trinity would be illustrated by his conveying the intelligence that he, Dr. Lambert, had done Mr. Thompson the honor of being born within four miles of the place of his birth. [Laughter]. True, there was several years discrepancy in time, he coming considerable later, but that, perhaps, was a matter of no very great consequence.

He alluded to items of history regarding Thompson, he had heard in Woburn when young. That he was a shoemaker and was the first to invent shoe pegs; that he married a rich widow considerably older than himself, that his aristocratic tendencies or unfriendly prejudices took him within the British lines. When, however, he reached London he was a republican—what was regarded aristocratic in Woburn was democratic in London. He repeated some points in Thompson's life not very creditable to him. He regarded that Thompson's greatest merit was in his elaborate scientific investigations with reference to the motive forces of animal life.

He said far more people judged by resemblances than by differences, and mentioned an artist who painted a portrait, who observed ninety per cent of those who examined it noticed the resemblances, while not more than ten per cent noticed the differences. True scientists were men who were able to detect minute differentiations. Darwin was of this class, and so was Franklin and Thompson. The Doctor discussed the subject of dependence of mind on brain, the dependence of brain upon the quality of food used, urging that without proper food the brain could not be properly supplied with the quality of pabulum it required.

S. P. ANDREWS admitted the fault was often made of generalizing on too small a basis. The widest and closest examination was necessary. He had recently noticed efforts of a careful investigation made in the French army as to the effects of salt upon animals. 10,000 horses had been freely supplied with salt for six months and an equal number had been deprived of it entirely, and no perceptible difference could be discovered.

He agreed with Dr. Lambert upon the subject of resemblances and differences, and enlarged some what upon his special theory—the Unismal, Duismal and Trinismal, and illustrated the principle by the fork, the knife and the shears. The first holds together, the second divides, and the third possess the quality of both—holds first and then divides. He held that sounds were made by the back-mouth, the middle-mouth and the front-mouth. The first was unismal or primary, the second duismal, the third most advanced or trinismal. In the savage state the language had been largely of sounds made in the back part of the mouth, and the more advanced and cultured they became, the more their language was spoken or enunciated with the front mouth and lips.

T. B. WAKEMAN felt proud of Count Rumford's greatness, and regretted any defects or weakness had marred a reputation otherwise so glorious. His great discernment of the principle of the correlation of forces would ever make his reputation, and add largely to his credit. Thompson had discriminated between true science and the false. Among the latter he had ranked theology and mythology. He alluded to his experiments as to the power of heat as derived from friction.

In social matters he was pre-eminent and had shown how to dispense with pauperism, mendicancy, prisons and almshouses by furnishing labor to all, thus affording them the opportunity of procuring such foods as nature demands. He said Rumford's failure was not in Science, not in Sociology, but in morals. In this latter he differed from Franklin, and while the latter was greatly revered not only in this land of his birth, but in every civilized land of the globe, the name of Rumford was almost forgotten. The moral principles and true devotion to the best interests of humanity are indispensable in establishing a reputation and popularity that will live forever.

Friendly Correspondence.

MR. STRAUS, St. Louis, Mo., writes: Please don't stop my paper. I should prefer losing my breakfast to missing THE TRUTH SEEKER.

S. L. RUFFNER, Charleston, Mo., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is an excellent paper of its kind, and is dealing effective blows upon old theology.

WM. NORRIS, Salem, Ill., writes: The few subscribers you have here are so well pleased with your paper that if they miss a number the loss is irreparable.

MISS ANNA GEBEKE, De Costa, N. J., writes: I herewith enclose you the price of Vol. II. I like your paper very much. Some of the ideas you express therein are really excellent.

R. K. JUSTUS, Washington, Ark., writes: All your subscribers in this place speak in the highest terms of your paper. They couldn't do otherwise, because it is just what its name implies.

MISS JENNIE E. HALE, Lincoln, Ind., writes: My uncle, W. Tracy, with whom I reside, considers your paper a very valuable one, and I am also much pleased with its outspoken sentiments.

WALTER WALKER, Farmington, Utah, writes: Your welcome paper comes regularly to hand. There is no paper that I look for so anxiously as it. It is so modest and unassuming, and yet so fearless.

MISS MARY E. HARTLEY, Alliance, O., writes: My father takes your paper, and we like it very much. I wish you would publish the "Blue Laws of Connecticut;" I would like to see what they are like.

J. RUNYAN, Flint, Mich., writes: I doubt not your statement of my account is correct. I take it for certain that a man who is honest enough to avow his liberal opinions as you do, is an honest man.

MRS. MARY J. STEWART, Brighton, Mich., writes: A few days ago a friend handed me a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have read it all through, and like it very much. I have showed it to a number of my friends, and they have resolved to take it for a few months. Please send it three months to the enclosed names.

A. P. TILDEN, Chardon, O., writes: I enclose you the subscription price. I don't wish to be among the delinquents, for I prize your paper higher than all others. Your series of lectures on the Bible has more than paid its cost. It has set some of my orthodox neighbors to thinking, (the few who dare read), and the time is not far distant when their eyes will be opened.

D. HIGBEE, M.D., Mungersville, Mich., writes: I take your paper, though I am not a Materialist, but a Spiritualist. These two forces should make "common cause" against old superstition. What an honor to rid our fellows, to generate right so as not to need regeneration. Let this be practiced one generation, and the truth taught and the priesthood may lay on the shelf.

HORATIO GATES, Breakabeen, N. Y., writes: I was formerly a devout bible reader, and before I ever saw your bold and truth-telling paper had learned to doubt the Bible claims of supernatural parentage; but let me tell you it was like pulling eye-teeth to be obliged to give up a long cherished hope of heaven. I can say, however, that I now have hopes far brighter than formerly when I was in the church.

S. D. GOODALE, Duquoin, Ill., writes: Please send No. 12 as specimens to the names I enclose. It is a good number. Your reply to Geo. Snodde has not left a grease spot of him. How would it do to insert this for an advertisement? WANTED—by the friends of G. Snodde, a microscope of the highest magnifying power, to discern the infinitesimal atoms left after his manipulation by the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

R. J. LAMBORN, Glen Hall, Pa., writes: I trust ere long THE TRUTH SEEKER will be a weekly. When the change is made, put me down as a regular subscriber. If it was as popular to be a Liberal as an orthodox, your list would be more than double what it is. I have a number of acquaintances who read your paper in the corner, and take much pleasure in it, but they do not want a customer to see them do it, for fear they might miss a sale or lose their approval.

WM. H. KISER, Winterset, Iowa, writes: This list makes forty-six trial subscribers I have sent you. I hope the greater part of them will become regular subscribers. As an eye-opener, a creed-demolisher, a priestcraft-exposer, or for any similar chronic affliction of several hundred years' standing, I would heartily recommend THE TRUTH SEEKER. If taken according to direction, I think I would be safe in warranting a cure.

J. W. BAILLET, Salamanca, N. Y., writes: I have half a mind to take offense at the notice I received, because it hints at a possibility of my having no further use for your paper. I apologise for my neglect. I really took no note of the time. For God's sake don't stop the paper for want of a dollar from me. I take half a dozen awfully wicked papers, but none pleases me as well as yours. I sometimes think you conduct it almost as well as I could myself. Is not that quite a concession?

MARY HAZEN, Medford, Minn., writes: It is impossible to keep by me a full file of THE TRUTH SEEKER—wouldn't it if I could. Some I have sent to Wisconsin, and some to various points in this State. The consequence is several have subscribed for your plain, outspoken, truthful TRUTH SEEKER. It emphatically is an "eye-opener." I wish it could reach every family from Maine to California and from the everglades of Florida to the glooms of Alaska. It would soon break the barriers of superstition and bigotry, and leave people free to think for themselves.

P. O. CHILSTROM, Minneapolis, Minn., writes: You are mistaken in sending me a notice of delinquency. If you will examine your books you will find I have remitted for Vol. II. But that mistake shall not make me unfriendly to THE TRUTH SEEKER. In my opinion it is doing much good, and opening many eyes that have heretofore been blind. I will inform you that a Liberal League has been formed here recently, composed of some of our prominent citizens. Each Sunday a large hall is filled with persons who come to talk and hear others talk of the principles of Liberalism. Many of them know of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and speak well of it. The President of the League is S. C. Gale, one of the wealthiest and most successful real estate dealers in our city. Other officers of the League are substantial and prominent men. We are in earnest, and "mean business."

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

An Able Advocate of Spiritual Philosophy and General Reform.

S. S. JONES, EDITOR, J. R. FRANCIS, ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

Established 1865; Burned up October 9, 1871; Re-established and Issued October 10, 1871.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, Adams Street and Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

Terms, $3.00 per Year, in Advance.

SPECIMEN COPIES FREE. The Religio-Philosophical Journal is a large eight-page paper; printed on fine, heavy paper, and universally acknowledged as

THE LEADING SPIRITUALIST PUBLICATION IN THE WORLD.

With able and careful correspondents, both in this country and Europe, it is able to and does, each week, present to its readers the latest phenomena, essays of great power and research and all items of interest bearing upon the subject. The recent extraordinary attention the subject of Spiritualism is attracting and its investigation by eminent scientists, increases the demand for current literature devoted to the subject. In order that all may become familiar with the most able, fearless and widely circulated exponent of Spiritualism, we will send the

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL 3 months for 30 cts.

AS AN ADVERTISING MEDIUM,

We assert without hesitation, that it is unsurpassed by any publication with the same circulation in the world. Hundreds of advertisers will testify to the beneficial results flowing from their use of our advertising columns. All legitimate advertisers are solicited to give the JOURNAL a trial, with the assurance on our part that they will meet with square and liberal treatment.

JNO. C. BUNDY, Secretary, Adams Street and Fifth Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

For Children and Youth.

Amusement and Instruction.

BLAKE MAN'S TWO HUNDRED

Poetical Riddles,

ON A GREAT VARIETY OF SUBJECTS.

INTERESTING AND NEW!

PUBLISHED BY

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sent postpaid on receipt of Price—20 cents.

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking, turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S

HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway.

Eating For Strength.

A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

Scottish Western Loan Co.,

G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,

Bankers,

Le Roy, Minnesota,

GEN'L SUPPLY AGENCY,

BRANCH OFFICE, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

H. B. BROWN Sec'y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa.

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner. Interest collected and paid annually at Gilman, Son & Co.'s Bank, 47 Exchange Pl. New York. No expense to loaner. Title and security guaranteed in every loan made by us. We pay 9 per cent. until money is invested.

The Agency will purchase and forward goods in any quantity to any part of the United States, and transact any business whatever for parties living at a distance, thereby SAVING to the purchasers from

20 TO 50 PER CENT.

The Agency is also prepared to transact any business that may be entrusted to them, such as effecting Insurance on Life and Property, renting property and collecting rents, searching records and examining titles, procuring legal advice, negotiating the sale or exchange of real estate, investing money for capitalists, obtaining desired information, and imparting advice other than legal; in short, we will undertake the execution of any legitimate business which persons in the country may require to have done in New York City.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO

LIFE INSURANCE

On the most SAFE and reliable plan.

PRICE LIST OF CLOTHING.

Grey Union Sack Overcoats,	$5 50 to $6 50
Black Wool Sack Overcoats,	8 00 to 10 00
Blue Chinchilla ditto,	9 00 to 11 00
Mixed Fur Beaver Overcoat,	14 00 to 16 00
Grey Reefing Jackets,	3 50 to 4 75
Black All Wool Sack Coats,	8 00 to 9 50
Black Cloth Frock Coats,	6 50 to 8 50
Black All Wool ditto,	8 50 to 15 50
Black Union Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 2 50
Black All Wool ditto,	2 50 to 4 00
Union Cassimere Sack Coats,	4 00 to 5 50
All Wool ditto,	6 00 to 8 00
All Wool Cassimere Suits,	13 00 to 17 00
Cassimere Pants and Vest,	7 00 to 9 00

Spring and Summer Clothing.

Cottonade Suits cut in Sacks and Walking Coats, from	6 50 to 8 00
Light Weight, all wool, Fancy Cassimere Suits cut in sacks and walking coats,	10 50 to 20 00
Cottonade Pants lined and unlined,	1 50 to 2 50
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants,	2 50 to 7 50
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants and Vests,	4 00 to 8 00
Spring Overcoats in Cassimeres,	9 00 to 20 00
Light worsted Coats and Vests, all designs,	7 00 to 20 00
Black cloth Frock Coats,	6 00 to 16 00
Black cloth Sack Coats,	4 50 to 6 50
Union and all wool Black-Doeskin Pants,	2 50 to 9 00
Union and all wool Black Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 5 00
Linen Sack Coats,	1 00 to 2 00
Linen Pants,	1 00 to 2 00
Linen Vests,	1 00 to 2 00
White Duck and Marseilles Vests, all designs,	2 00 to 5 00
Alpaca Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Blue Flannel Sack Coats,	4 00 to 7 50
Heavy Satinet Suits, various styles,	7 00 to 8 50

The above articles of clothing are all of Superior Quality, good material, and well made, and are not surpassed by any in this city.

Measurements for clothing should include length of limbs, circumference of body over chest and stomach.

Dry Goods!

Cassimeres, all colors, per yard,	75 to 2 00
Black Doeskins,	1 00 to 2 00
Broadcloth (double width)	2 00 to 5 01
Calicoes (by piece)	07 to 12
Ginghams	10 to 10
Dress Goods	25 to 30
Alpacas	21 to 32
Brown Sheetting,	8 to 10
Bleached Sheetting,	7 to 10
Hosiery (all colors) per dozen,	1 25 to 4 00

Millinery and Dress Goods.

Fine French Silk, per yard,	.50 to 2 00
Toquay Silk,	.60 to 1 00
Turquoise Silk,	.40 to 1 00
Fancy Satin and Silk, (remnants)	.1 00
Cotton and Silk, (mixed)	.50
White English Crape,	.50 to 1 50
Ribbons,	.30 to 40
Gross Grain Sash Ribbons,	.20 to 40
Velvet, any color,	.20 to 40
Bridal Net, 1/2 wide,	.50
Bonnet Frame Lace, per dozen,	.80 to 3 00
Kid Gloves, per pair,	.90 to 1 40
Ostrich Feathers, each,	1.00 to 4 00

Miss Nellie Henderson will give her personal attention to the Millinery Department, and will fill all orders for articles of whatever kind, not mentioned above, at as low a price as can be bought of any one or any-where.

ORDERS FOR GROCERIES

Of not less than 5 lbs.

Will be promptly filled at wholesale prices, adding 5 per ct. on sums over $20 and 10 per ct. on sums less than $20.

COFFEE.

Green,	No. 1, 35 cts., No. 2, 30 cts.
Roasted,	No. 1, 37 cts., No. 2, 33 cts.

TEAS.

Oolong,	25 to 60 cents per pound.
Japan,	45 to 95
Young Hyson,	35 to 1.15
Imperial,	40 to 90
Twa Kay,	25 to 40
Eng. Breakfast,	40 to 90

ORDERS FOR

HATS, CAPS and FURS.

Wool Hats	from .45 to 60 cts. apiece.
Fur Hats	.80 to $4.00
Silk Hats	$2.00 to $8.00
Cloth Caps	.75 to $1.50

Furs from $2.50 to $60.00 per Set.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Boots, Calf, (pegged)	$2.75 to $6.00 per pr.
" (sewed)	2.00 to 7.00
" coarse, (pegged)	2.25 to 4.50
Shoes,	1.00 to 5.00

Families and neighbors by ordering not less than 1/2 dozen can obtain "bottom" prices, while cost of freight will be correspondingly reduced.

SPECIAL ATTENTION

Given to purchasing

Sewing Machines, Jewelry and Musical Instruments,

We can furnish most of the older Sewing Machines at 20 to 40 per cent. less than retail price.

We can send a superior two-thread hand machine for $13. Also a superior Shuttle Machine complete for $20.

We will also make selections for

Public and Private Libraries,

Or procure any single book that may be ordered.

We can supply Agents with fast selling and profitable Novelties and Notions, and Merchants with Job Lots from Auction.

MERCANTILE COLLECTIONS.

On collections less than $50, twenty per cent.

On collections exceeding $50, ten per cent.

OBTAINING PATENTS.

From $25 to $100.

Negotiating the Sale or Exchange of Real Estate, from 2 to 5 per cent.

The commission for procuring Legal Advice, and for investing Capital, will be fixed by correspondence.

Confidential letters requiring labor and research, should include a fee adequate to the service required, but all letters of simple enquiry, enclosing stamp, will receive prompt attention.

RULES AND CONDITIONS OF THE AGENCY.

All orders for the purchase of Goods must be accompanied with the funds in the form of Postal Order, Check, or Draft on New York City, or money in Registered Letter.

All orders and directions for shipping or mailing articles must be written plainly and fully, to prevent loss, delay and trouble.

Collections, balances and remittances promptly remitted at the risk of the Agency.

Care must be taken in ordering goods to avoid mistakes, as it will be impracticable to return articles shipped.

All goods guaranteed as represented.

RATES OF TRANSPORTATION:

By mail, 4 lb. packages, or less, 8 cents per lb.
By Fast Freight, about 2 cents per lb.
By Express when great dispatch is of more account than cost.

For their respectability, integrity, and ability, the Agency are permitted to refer to the following well-known gentlemen:

W. I. GILCHRIST, McGregor, Iowa.
FRANK LARRABEE, "
MORRIS ALTMAN, New York.
GILMAN, SON & CO, 47 Ex. Place, N. Y.
L. MANZ, Lyons, Iowa.
D. M. BENNETT, Ed. TRUTH SEEKER,
D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill.

Parturition without Pain.

EDITED BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Editor of the Herald of Health.

CONTENTS:

1. Healthfulness of Child-Bearing.
2. Dangers of Preventions.
3. Medical Opinions as to escaping Pain.
4. Preparation for Maternity.
5. Exercise during Pregnancy.
6. The Sitz Bathing and Bathing generally.
7. What Food to Eat and what to Avoid
8. The Mind during Pregnancy.
9. The Ailments of Pregnancy and their Remedies.
10. Female Physicians, Anæsthetics.

To which are added:

1. The Husband's Duty to his Wife. 2. Best Age for Bearing Children. 3. Shall sickly people become Parents? 4. Small Families. 5. Importance of Physiological Adaptation of Husband and Wife. 6. Celibacy. 7. Effects of Tobacco on Offspring. 8. Latest Discoveries as to the determining the sex of Offspring. 9. Father's vs. Mother's Influence on the Child. 10. Shall Pregnant Women Work? 11. Effects of Intellectual Activity on number of Offspring. 12. Size of Pelvis, and its relation to healthful Parturition, etc., etc.

What is said about "Parturition without Pain."

Godley's Lady's Book says: "We give our cordial approbation to this work, and would like to see it in the hands of every mother in the land. The information it contains is most important, and, we are fully convinced, reliable."

Price, by mail, $1.00. Address

D. M. BENNETT.

335 Broadway, N. Y.

A Valuable Home Book for Women.

Talks to my Patients

HINTS ON GETTING WELL AND KEEPING WELL.

BY MRS. R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

Table of Contents:

Growing Girls; Menstruation; Amenorrhoea; Menorrhagia; Dysmenorrhoea; Prolapsus Uteri; Leucorrhoea; Pregnancy; Approaching Confinement; Delivery; After Delivery; Care of the Breasts; After Confinement; Bathing of Babies; Dress of Infants; Nursing; Weaning; Feeding of Infants; Infantile Diseases; Diseases of Children; Children's Dress; Confidential to Mothers; Intentional Abortion; Accidental Abortion; Sterility; Nervous Derangements; Sleep; Indigestion; Constipation; Menopause, or Change of Life.

It is a most Valuable Work, and should be in the hands of every Lady.

Price, $1.50 by mail. Sold by

D. M. BENNETT.

335 Broadway, N. Y.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER.

Buy the Best. Price $7.50.

SIXTY THOUSAND SOLD IN TWO YEARS!

Medal awarded at the N. Y. State Fair, 1874; First Premium at Western N. Y. Fair, 1874; 12 State Fair Premiums taken the past year; also, Silver Medal of Honor at Penn. State Fair, 1874.

This gem of a Washing Machine has claims on public attention that few machines possess.

We have tried it and find it all that it is claimed for it.—West Rural.

We have thoroughly tested the Calkins' Champion Washer and find it in all respects simple, durable and cheap; efficient in its work, and capable of doing all that is claimed for it. We endorse the Champion and recommend the firm.—Prairie Farmer.

We have seen the machine in operation, and feel safe in recommending it to our readers.—Moore's Rural New Yorker.

Almost every family will buy it, after seeing it in use. Send for descriptive Circulars and Terms to Canvassers.

CALKINS' CHAMPION WASHER CO.,

106 Chambers Street, New York, and 207 South Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

Having made special arrangements with the Company, we can send it by Express to all parts of the country, at the Company's price. In connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER, we send it at a greatly reduced price.

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York

HULL'S CRUCIBLE;

A Wide-awake Spiritualistic and Social Reform Journal.

Prominent among the reforms advocated in HULL'S CRUCIBLE are the following:

1. REFORMS IN RELIGION, such as shall do away with many of the outward forms and restore the power of godliness.

2. REFORMS IN THE GOVERNMENT, such as shall do away with the Rings, Cliques and Monopolies, and put all matters concerning the Government of the People into the hands of the People.

3. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, such as shall secure to Labor, the producer of Capital, the control of Capital.

4. REFORMS REGULATING THE RELATIONS OF THE SEXES TO EACH OTHER, such as shall secure to every member of each sex the entire control of their own person, and place Prostitution in or out of Marriage for money or any other cause, out of the question.

Any thought calculated to benefit humanity, whether coming under any of the above, or any other propositions, will find a cordial welcome in the columns of HULL'S CRUCIBLE.

HULL'S CRUCIBLE joins hands with all Reformers and Reformers of whatever School, and welcomes any ideas, however unpopular, calculated to benefit humanity.

Those interested in a live Reformatory Journal, are invited to hand in their subscriptions.

TERMS:

One Subscription, 52 numbers - - - $2.50
" " 26 " - - - 1.25
" " 13 " - - - 0.65

All Letters, Money Orders and Drafts should be addressed,

MOSES HULL & CO.,

24 Newcomb St., Boston,

J. M. FOLLETT.

E. B. HILL.

SEWING MACHINE NEEDLES.

We will send by mail, post-paid: Singer Needles, for Sixty cents per doz. Wilcox & Gibbs, for One dollar per doz. All others for seventy-five cents per doz.

Sewing Machine Agents and Dealers please send for circular. We want the patronage of every "liberal" in America.

Say you saw this Adv. in THE SPIRITUALIST AT WORK.

FOLLETT & HILL,

Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

Sewing-Machine Attachments, Needles, Oils, etc., etc.,

CAMBRIDGE, HENRY CO., ILLINOIS.

BEST AND CHEAPEST

SEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

till Apr. 15. R. H. SHUMWAY, Rockford, Ill.

No Quarter to Superstition!

Every Freethinker should have our New Catalogue of English and American Freethought and Miscellaneous Books. SENT FREE! Rare, scarce, "O. P." works a specialty. Address

J. FRANCIS RUGGLES, Bibliopole, Bronson, Mich.

"Common Sense."

A Spiritual Paper for the Pacific Coast.

A SIXTEEN-PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL

DEVOTED TO

THE PHENOMENA AND PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM, SOCIAL REFORM, WOMAN SUFFRAGE, ETC., ETC.

The only Free Thought Journal west of the Rocky Mountains.

An Excellent Corps of Contributors,

Reports of Radical Lectures and Discussions,

This paper has now reached its 32d number, and is growing in interest and influence. It is filled mainly with original matter, well written and ably edited.

Three Dollars per Annum, Post-paid. Specimen copies sent free. Address

COMMON SENSE,

236 Montgomery St., San Francisco, Cal.

BOOKS!

BOOKS!!

D. M. BENNETT, Editor Truth Seeker.

Wishes the Public to remember he is prepared to furnish Scientific, Liberal, and Progressive Works of all kinds.

Books by the following Modern Authors kept in Stock:

Huxley, Darwin, Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, J. Stuart Mill, Froude,

L. Fuerbach, Dr. Louis Buechner, Thomas Buckle, Louis Figuer, Sir John Lubbock, Charles Bradlaugh

Robt. Dale Owen, Stephen Pearl Andrews, A. J. Davis, Prof. Wm. Denton, B. F. Underwood, Hudson Tuttle,

Henry C. Wright, Dr. A. B. Childs, Maria M. King, M. B. Craven, D. D. Home, M. and D. W. Hull

As well as numerous other authors.

Books on

Science, The Arts, Medicine, Theology, Law, History, Biography, Literature, Romance, Poetry.

And all Miscellaneous Subjects furnished at Publisher's Prices, and sent by Express or Mail as directed.

Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 BROADWAY,

D. M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED, DESCRIPTIVE AND PRICED SEED ANNUAL 1875.
Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.
Address, D. M. FERRY & CO. Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

Odd and Ends.

"MARRY a widower! Not I!" said Matilda. "Babies are like tooth-brushes. Everybody wants their own."

"It is discouraging to think," said a complaining shoemaker, "that whatever pains I may take with my work, it is sure to be trampled under foot."

AN old Indian who had witnessed the effect of whiskey for many years, said a barrel labeled "whiskey" contained a thousand songs and fifty fights.

A YOUNG lady, intending to paint her cheeks with rouge, put all the paint on her nose, and did not discover her error until requested to sign "the pledge!"

A MAN in Western, Missouri, fired in the dark at a man who was stealing his corn, and the next day the county sheriff was around with his arm in a sling.

AN Arizona girl shot her lover, and then nursed him tenderly till he died. His last words were, "I forgive you, Mary; you did it with an ivory-handled pistol."

A MAN from Chicago, when asked by a Saratoga waiter what he would have for breakfast, replied, "Well, I rather guess I'll just flop my lip over a chicken."

WHEN a Chicago man loses the respect of the community, he takes his gun and starts out to kill an alderman as the only means of being restored to popular esteem.

"HEAVENS! what a cow!" was the approving remark of a teetotal judge of Vermont, after swallowing a potent punch which had been offered to him as a glass of milk.

"JOHN, I am afraid you have been forgetting me," said a bright-eyed girl to her sweetheart the other day. "Yes, Sue, I have been for getting you these last two years."

A MISSOURI woman who applied for a situation as car driver, being asked if she could manage the mules, scornfully replied: "Of course I can, I've had two husbands."

A MUSICAL critic, in speaking the other morning of the vocal performance of a celebrated singer, said: "We hang upon every note!"—a remarkable proof of the singer's power of execution.

"Did the defendant go at the plaintiff seriatim?" inquired an attorney the other day, of a witness in a case of assault and battery? "No; he went at 'em with a poker," was the emphatic reply.

A DAMSEL applied for a place behind a counter. "What clerical experience have you had?" asked the man of dry goods. "Very little," she said with a blush, "for I only joined the church last week."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher to pupil: "Now, my little man, can you explain to us the cause of Adam's fall?" Little man (emphatically): "Yes, sir; 'cause he hadn't any ashes to throw on the sidewalk."

A WICKED boy, upon whose shoulders his mother was expressing her resentment with both slippers, felt too proud to cry, and kept up his courage by repeating to himself: "Two soles that beat as one."

THE old gentleman who spent a fortune in trying to raise colts from horse-chestnuts, is now attempting to get it back again by cultivating the egg-plant with a view to supplying the market with eggs and chickens.

"THERE was an old family fuel between them," was what a female witness in a Chicago murder case said to the jury. A jurymen asked her if she didn't mean "feud?" and she asked him who was telling the story.

A CHICAGO man insists that he saw a red and black snake forty feet long, and as big round as a barrel of whiskey. We have no doubt that he did, but he unquestionably saw the barrel of whiskey before he saw the snake.

"I SAY, boy, is that the fire?" asked a gentleman of a ragged urchin, and pointing to a dense volume of smoke that was issuing from the windows of a warehouse. "No, sir, that is only the smoke," replied the boy.

AN Iowa woman ends her views on female suffrage with: "You may look at this matter in whatever light you will, but simmer it down and it is but a quarrel with the Almighty that we are not all men."

"Will you please insert this obituary notice?" asked an old gentleman to a country editor. "I make bold to ask it because I know the deceased had a great many friends about here who'd be glad to hear of his death."

"DID anything about the defendant strike your eye as remarkable?" asked a judge of the plaintiff in a case of assault and battery. "It did, yer honor." "And what was it?" continued the judge. "His fist, yer honor."

A WESTERN editor, noticing the present of a silver cup to a brother editor, says: "He needs no cup. He can drink from any vessel that contains liquor, whether the neck of a bottle, the mouth of a pickle jar, the spile of a keg or the bung of a barrel."

"I SEE but very little of you," said an old gentleman at a Louisville ball to a lady whom he had not met in a long time before. "I know it," was the artless reply, "but mother wouldn't allow me to wear a low-neck dress to-night, the weather is so cold."

THREE Saginaw girls of the Methodist persuasion having met together, concluded to pray for the welfare of their lovers, but the first one had not got very far along in her petition when it was discovered that they were all engaged to the same man. The religious exercises were at once terminated.

A FARMER was bargaining with a lawyer to defend him before a justice of the peace, and when it came to the price, the lawyer said it would be fifteen dollars. "Fifteen dollars?" exclaimed the farmer; "why, that's the price of a hog." The lawyer asked him if he meant to be personal, and the farmer said he didn't.

A FRENCHMAN exhibiting some sacred relics and other curiosities, produced a sword which he assured his visitors was "de sword that Balaam had when he would kill de ass. A spectator remarked that Balaam had no sword, but only wished for one. "Very well, dis is de one he wished for."

A BOY'S CHARITY.—"Well, my son," said a Detroit father to his eight-year-old boy the other night, "what have you done to-day that may be set down as a good deed?" "Gave a poor boy five cents," replied the hopeful.

"Ah, ha! that was charity, and charity is always right. He was an orphan boy, was he?"

"I didn't stop to ask," replied the boy: "I gave him the money for licking a boy who spit in my dinner basket."

A DRUNKEN fellow who had slept in a horse pound at camp, woke up one morning to find himself haltered and the proprietor demanding pay for his oats. The fellow protested, saying he was not a horse. "No difference," was the reply, "we charge as much for an ass as for a horse."

A STORY is told of an old gentleman who took notes of the minister's sermons, and on one occasion read to the minister himself. "Stop, stop!" said the latter, on the occurrence of a certain sentence, "I didn't say that." "I know you didn't," was the reply; "I put that in myself to make sense."

A SAD EXPERIENCE.—After shaking hands at the ferry dock the other day, one colored man enquired of another:

"Didn't you marry de Widow Jones about de first of January?"

"Dat's me, I did," was the answer, "but I've dun left her."

"Who! how's dat?"

"Well, de first week she called me 'honey,' de next week she sulked around and called me 'ole Richard,' de third week she cum for me wid a flat-iron and broke two ribs, and I'm gwine to keep right away from dar!"

A NEW BOOK.

THE Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburg.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

Positively

$50.00 Worth of Information

given for 60 cents, concerning Fowls, Eggs and Chickens.

BY A CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep hen-roosts and nests free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in winter. How to prevent hens from ever wanting to set, and how to make them set. How to preserve eggs good one year. An easy plan to do it. Enclose 60 cents with order for full directions. Address,

E. D. BLAKEMAN,
Circleville, O.

For Winter Evenings.

PLAYING CARDS.

Fancy, Transparent, Illustrated.

THE LATEST OUT.

Sent Post-paid by Mail, for $1. Address,

E. M. McDONALD & CO.,
335 Broadway, New York.

DON'T FAIL

TO ORDER A COPY OF

THE
Heathens of the Heath,
A ROMANCE,
Instructive, Absorbing, Thrilling!

BY WM. McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," etc., etc.

The Greatest Book

that has been issued for years.

THE ENORMITIES OF THE CHURCH

PRIESTCRAFT, THE MISSION-

ARY SYSTEM,

and other pious wrongs shown up.

A perusal of it will open.

THE EYES OF THE BLIND.

Read it and hand it to your

Neighbor.

No Person who buys this Book will regret the Investment.

It contains nearly 500 pages. 12mo. Is printed from new type, on good paper, and gotten up in excellent style.

Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office.

PRICE:

In Paper Covers.....$1.00
In Cloth, neatly bound.....1.50

Sent by Mail, post-paid, on receipt of price.

Address D. M. BENNETT,
335 BROADWAY,
New York.

DR. WM. HALL'S

BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMPTIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH,

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere. Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.

CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.

CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.

CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.

CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.

Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S

OXYGENATED BITTERS.

The OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSELEY'S

Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,

Proprietors,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S

CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York; Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION,
FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 15. { D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, APRIL 1, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY, } $1.75 per Year.
{ SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. }

The Truth Seeker,

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.
Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. A. F. Baxter, a Methodist minister, was recently refused admission to his church at Peterboro, N. H., by the leading men of the society, because he had exchanged pulpits with a minister of liberal views.

THE GREAT PUBLIC is tiring of so much Beecher, and look forward to the infliction for the eighth or tenth week to come with dread and apprehension. If a vote on the subject could be taken to-day, undoubtedly Mr. Beecher would be allowed to "step down and out."

THIS IS THE TIME FOR FLOODS.—Swollen rivers in all parts of the country; great loss of property, and some loss of life the result. If there is a superintending Providence conducting this business, he either attends to it badly, or he is not as kind as many give him credit for.

THE Rev. Mr. Warren, a Baptist pastor at Burnt Hills, Saratoga county, was exposed several weeks ago as the husband of three living and undivorced wives. He resigned at the request of his congregation, and wanted to preach a farewell sermon, but they would not hear it.

Miss May Flora May Peters, daughter of Emanuel Peters, of Frankford, Pa., has made an affidavit charging Rev. Thomas Cooper, of the Free Congregational church of Frankford, with unbecoming conduct toward her. Upon this affidavit, Mr. Cooper was arrested by a sheriff's officer, and was held in $5,000 bail to answer at court.

DR. R. A. Holland, rector of St. George's Episcopal Church, in St. Louis, has lately preached a sermon in which he said in very plain words that he did not believe in eternal damnation. It has evoked considerable discussion, and it has been insinuated that he would be deposed of by Bishop Robertson.

ANOTHER OUTRAGE.—A Philadelphia judge has recently denied an applicant his naturalization papers on the ground that said applicant is an Infidel. When these good Christians get everything as they wish it, with God and Jesus and the Bible in the Constitution and all that, they probably will hardly allow us poor Infidels the right to breathe.

PLYMOUTH SUIT No. Two.—Assistant Pastor Halliday, who gave such willing testimony in behalf of his revered superior, and in which he stated the New York Juvenile Guardian Society is a humbug, has been prosecuted by the President of the Society for damages. The assistant Pastor has already come down handsomely and says he is willing to make restitution in any way he can.

ONE SUNDAY Mr. Shearman called on Mr. Beecher to talk over some points in the case. Mr. Beecher declined to have anything to do with the matter. It was Sunday, he said, and he wanted to rest. The lawyer reminded him that the case was coming on, and that as a defendant, he must attend to it. He also told him of the "ox and the ass" that were drawn out of the pit on the Sabbath day; to which the pastor of the Plymouth Church, shrugging up his shoulders, replied: "Sherman, look at me. Did you ever know a bigger ass fall into a deeper pit?"—Burlingame's New York letter to Boston Journal.

MR BEECHER seems to grow more and more in favor of Catholics. Formerly he lashed them terribly, but latterly this has entirely changed. Several times lately he has spoken of them in the kindest terms, and seems to think them the best of men. It is to be presumed he has no personal motive in all this, though, it will be remembered, there are two Catholics on his jury.

THE TWELFTH WEEK of what was the Beecher trial has nearly passed, and has evolved into a trial of Tilton. Beecher has not been on trial for more than four weeks. The supposition is, by proving Tilton guilty of improprieties, the innocence of Beecher is established. When Tilton is tried and convicted, the trial of Beecher will probably be resumed, if the Judge, the lawyers and the jury are fortunate enough to live so long.

It is an unsettled problem whether Beecher's witnesses in the main have been an advantage or a disadvantage to his case, but that there have been some very "willing witnesses" among them, cannot be denied. When Beecher himself shall be called upon the stand, it is presumed many questions will be propounded to him, that he would rather not be obliged to answer. It is expected Judge Fullerton will have little "pity for the sorrows of the poor old man."

IN view of the fact that Mr. Beecher on Sundays and Friday evenings holds forth in his church to large audiences and virtually pleads his case, it has been suggested that Tilton also be provided with the Academy of Music or some hall where he can speak to public audiences, and enlarged upon his efforts and labors in years that have passed. Doubtless large concourses would flock to hear him, and it would seem to be only "fair play and equal rights."

A CROW TO PICK.—Miss Lovejoy of Princeton, Ill., whose name has been so cruelly introduced into the Brooklyn Scandal trial, has resolved to bring suit against Beecher's lawyers for $25,000 damages for the injury they have done her. Her brother-in-law, Col. J. H. Elliot, has been on here taking notes and picking up facts, with a view to the suit named. Mr. Tracy will also have a settlement or two to make after this trial is over, with parties who feel aggrieved. Thus we may expect it will be a long time before we get to the end of this complication.

AMONG THE DEVELOPMENTS of the Beecher trial is the fact that Oliver Johnson, the editor of the Orthodox Christian Union, is not only unorthodox, but is, or has been, a Quaker, a Frothinghamite, a Unitarian, a Universalist, an unbeliever in the Deity of Christ, a semi-Liberal, and a Spiritualist, though he claims not to be a "damned fool." How will the orthodox readers of the Union like such a heretic to write their editorials? "Can a bitter fountain send forth waters that are sweet?"

It is said by some who are supposed to know, that the Hon. Mr. Evarts feels a trifle uneasy in the position he occupies, that when he assumed the management of the case he believed Mr. Beecher innocent, but that subsequent revelations had changed his mind and that he wished to sever his connection with the case, when prominent members of Plymouth Church ardently objected, and proffered to add $10,000 to his fee. A man will indeed perform quite a unpleasant task for $10,000.

LOGANSPORT, Ind., has added her bit of scandal to the already growing amount. Rev. J. R. Stilwell, pastor of the West Side Methodist Tabernacle, has been a resident of that city more than a year, and, to all outward appearances his daily walk has been unexceptionable. A series of meetings were commenced in his church about six weeks ago, and about sixty accessions were made. During a pastoral call on a lady, he made improper advances toward her, which she indignantly repelled, and turned him out of the house. She made the fact public, and the miscreant pastor, acknowledging the statement, tendered his resignation of the pastorate, and went to Indianapolis to prepare to move his grief-stricken family, which has the sympathy of the entire community.

A MINISTER WHO STEPPED OUT IN A HURRY.—Mr. Baldwin of Michigan knew that the preacher was in the parlor with his wife, but he didn't think anything about it until he heard a voice say, "Youch! Parson! you've got me by the crazy bone!" and then Baldwin dropped his axe, spit on his hands, picked it up again, and walked in to that parlor just in time to see a preacher jump out the front door six feet at a jump.

HENRY WARD BEECHER is not a cheap luxury to Plymouth church, though it is one of the wealthiest in the country. Their pastor's salary is $20,000. It is said its members have recently subscribed $125,000 to pay the thirteen lawyers and four-score witnesses engaged. Then there is Mrs. Tilton and Mrs. Morse to support; Bessie Turner and Mrs. Putnam to bring on from Ohio and maintain; Mr. Cooke from Detroit, Mr. Cowley from Lowell, and others from other places. Truly their pastor is "doubly dear" to them.

A SAD, DISGRACEFUL AFFAIR.—From Austin, Minn., we get the mournful intelligence of a respectable married lady being villianously treated by a brother member of the Church, who took her out sleigh-riding. He turned into a by-road and into a piece of woods at a distance from any house, and failing in the urgent entreaties he made for her to yield to his animal desires, he resorted to force. She plead for mercy, but none was granted; she called loudly for help, but none could hear her, and she felt herself forsaken by God and man. Three times she started the horse by applying the whip. When this church-member, after a struggle of an hour, became impatient and furious; he choked her cruelly and threw the buffalo robe on the snow and placed his helpless victim on to it, and by sheer physical force accomplished his hellish purpose. His name is Jaques and hers is Wilbour. She immediately reported the case to her husband when the villain was incarcerated in jail, and bound over for a speedy trial. It is to be hoped the just deserts will be meted out to him which his vile conduct so richly deserves.

ANOTHER MINISTER IN TROUBLE.—A clerical scandal, in Baltimore hushed up. A clergyman of that city very frequently visited a widow boarding near him, and who attended regularly upon his preaching. His visits to the lady's room became so frequent as to attract notice. The house-maid looking through the keyhole discovered that which she thought highly improper conduct, and reported the same to her mistress, who, by the way, is a communicant at the same church, and an intimate friend of the clergyman's wife. She was at a loss what course to take, but decided to write a plain letter to the clergyman, informing him what was known of him and urging him for the sake of his family and his own reputation to immediately discontinue his visits to the widow. This threw him upon the "ragged edge," and he concluded to act upon her suggestion. The widow has gone South and the pious clergyman is now fervently advocating the claims of his Lord and Master, whose blood washes away all stains.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.—It is a most shocking account of a Christian massacre we get from Acapulco, Mexico, which occurred on Jan. 26th last. A Protestant congregation were assembled in their church and were engaged in worship, when some forty men of the Catholic Church, armed with machetes—(along curved, heavy, sharp blade, with a handle, and something like a butcher's cleaver)—rushed in upon the defenseless worshippers and simultaneously commenced chopping them to pieces. A Herald correspondent, writing up the bloody affair, says: "The deadly machete was wielded with fearful effect; human flesh cut and gashed like bullock meat, while blood streamed in torrents over the gory floor, now encumbered by dying or wounded men and women." Some twenty persons were soon dispatched or seriously wounded, and among the rest the presiding minister. It is thought the Catholic priest was privy to the affair—at all events, he made no remonstrance before or after. It was indeed a sanguinary affair and only proves that in the Nineteenth Century murdering for opinion's sake is not yet wholly done away with.

(Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XIV.

When the Noose and the half-breed had started from the ravine with the terror-stricken captives, they soon began to find it next to impossible to make any headway with their animals through the dense and tangled forest which they had hoped to penetrate for miles before they came to a halt.

Lightfoot had already become aware of the direction taken by Red Wing and the Indians who had gone hunting, and was careful to shape his own course and that of the Noose accordingly. At first he had no very settled plan in his own mind as to how he should dispose of his victim; but having, the day previous to that of this outrage, heard that some Indians hostile alike to the tribe of Red Wing and the whites, were hovering about the passes between Boston and Cape Ann, he suddenly resolved to join them if possible, and, in return for their protection of himself and his captive, betray all he knew of the intentions of the authorities touching the red man generally.

The Noose fell into this scheme at once, although it may be said not to have been fully decided upon until they found themselves alone with their captives, and necessitated to seek some track along which they could proceed with speed, and place some miles between them and Boston; for now the project they had previously entertained, of seeking the depth of the forest and then turning their horses loose, was abandoned as not only dangerous, but untenable on any rational grounds, taking the near approach of Winter into consideration.

Of course each had his gun slung over his shoulder, and had a knife and plenty of ammunition, while Lightfoot carried a tomahawk in his belt, but then there was something more than this necessary to render their sojourn in the depth of the forest at all practicable. Like villains generally, however, they were willing to trust much to chance in the accomplishment of their nefarious designs, and hence this project of joining the band of red men sprang into existence in a single moment as it were.

When tired of their victims, both might be readily disposed of, and be silenced forever; but here there appeared to be a slight obstacle in the way, for, strange as it may seem, the Noose had now a terrible and criminal admiration of Martha which, notwithstanding all he had heard while concealed in the cellar of the ferryman, was sufficient to keep any such bloody intent completely in abeyance. Nor was the half-breed much differently situated in relation to Firefly; for it was simply owing to an unlawful passion he had entertained for her, that he had two years previously sought to betray Red Wing into the hands of the authorities with most of his tribe, in the hope that the beautiful squaw, when unprotected, might become his prey. He had failed, however, at the period, although now it would appear he had triumphed beyond a shadow of doubt.

This sentiment of vile regard on the part of the scoundrels, seemed to touch a chord of something like compassion in their breasts, for when once they found themselves skirting the highway which led along the coast in the direction already mentioned, they gave their captives to understand that they would relieve them in a measure of their bonds if they would express by a sign or token upon which they had decided, that they would permit themselves to be borne along passively, and neither by word nor act—by cries nor struggles attempt to encompass their freedom.

As both the poor creatures were suffering terribly, they readily gave the required token, and were consequently soon freed from the painful gags; although it was some time before they could sufficiently control their organs of speech to utter a single intelligible word.

It was only when the half-breed began to speak to his fellow-conspirator that Martha became aware she was in the clutch of the Noose. Terrible as she had already conceived her situation, this revelation completely overwhelmed her. Now, however, that her bodily suffering was mitigated, and that her hands, like those of Firefly, were released in a degree from the galling pressure of her bonds, she began to hope, although surrounded by doubt and darkness the most dire.

Firefly comprehended the treachery of the half-breed to the fullest extent. She knew intuitively that he had betrayed the two Indian sentinels or guards into the hands of the whites, and then taken advantage of the absence of the chief and the other red men, to make a descent upon her and the fugitives. Were her hands sufficiently free, however, she would soon be able to settle accounts with her treacherous captor, for the weapon she had concealed beneath her mantle, she could still feel in its place, and almost within touch of her fingers.

A similar idea had seized upon Martha. Could she but release one of her hands, she might inflict at a single blow a mortal wound upon her captor; but here's where the difficulty lay—her bonds, though relaxed, were not sufficiently so to enable her to reach her dagger or to strike with any degree of force.

They had now gained a point about two miles from the town, when both the scoundrels, finding their captives made neither outcry nor resistance, proposed that they should change positions on their respective horses, and sit behind instead of before, as they could ride with greater ease to themselves and to the animals. To this arrangement the fugitives at once agreed; and after a halt of a few moments, they were again under way, with their captors riding in front, one end of the rope that bound them being fastened to the belt of the Noose and the half-breed individually.

Now it was that the spirit and cunning of the full-blooded Indian began to work in the dark eyes and tumultuous bosom of the beautiful Firefly. If she could but free one hand and seize her knife without awakening the suspicions of Lightfoot, all might be well. With a view to concealing her motives in her attempt to slip her hand through the noose that encircled it, she felt the keen edge of the half-breed's tomahawk that still stuck in his belt, and adroitly managed to bring the cord across it, she permitted the action of the horse to work like a saw, and cut through the different strands, until at last it gave way, and she was partially free. In a few moments more, one arm was completely released, and the next instant she had seized her deadly knife and was ready to strike.

At this juncture, a cry rose upon the air which startled the horses and sent the blood back to all their hearts. The wolves were upon their track, and nothing but the swiftest flight could insure their safety. This both men perceived at a glance; and now that their own lives were in imminent danger, each began to think of his own safety only, while both arrived simultaneously at the same resolve—that of sacrificing the two women if the animals were not able to outstrip their dreadful pursuers.

Each had already grasped his knife for the purpose of severing the cord that bound his prisoner to him, so that he might be able to hurl her from the back of his beast at a moment's notice, and thus gain time while the ferocious monsters were devouring their prey.

The horses had bounded forward, and were holding their own, and for a moment Firefly had lost sight of her dreadful purpose. But now comprehending the appalling position in which she and Martha were placed, she determined to make the best of her partial freedom and the knowledge of the intention of the villain before her.

As, then, the frightened horses soon began to give evidence of their being overtaken with weight, and as they sped on side by side, she cautiously brought her long knife to bear a little below the the shoulder-blade of the half-breed, and the next instant, and just as he had himself cut the cord that attached her to his belt, he fell mortally wounded in the track.

Firefly, who could ride a horse as only an Indian can, perceiving that the Noose was not aware of what had occurred, but was blind to everything but his own safety, now rode a little in the rear, but soon pulling alongside Martha, who perceived her alone, she leaned over and severed her bonds also. Not the Noose, urging his horse on at the top of his speed, while listening to the savage yells and cries of the wolves that seemed suddenly arrested in their flight by a something they had encountered in the track, over which they were now quarrelling. Firefly understood the drama that was being enacted, and so did Martha when she perceived her alone; but as the wolves had again resumed the pursuit, and the horse of the Noose was becoming terribly jaded and excited, there was not a moment to lose. So causing her animal to spring forward until she was within reach of her unconscious victim, she struck him a swift and sudden blow also, which, although it was not fatal, hurled him to the earth, while both horses relieved of more than half the weight that had encumbered them, began at once to gain upon their pursuers. Scarcely, however, had they got a hundred strides ahead, when a wild cry for help rang out behind them. It was heard but once only; for it died away amid a chorus of howlings and barkings that caused the blood almost to freeze in the veins of the two women, that now rode side by side, Martha clinging to her horse as best she could, while Firefly so managed her animal that she kept within grasp of her now bewildered and all but paralyzed companion.

Again the savage pursuers had finished their revolting repast, and were nearly upon them once more, when their ear caught the sound of approaching voices. Grateful for any relief from the monsters on their track, and perceiving that no worse danger could threaten them ahead, after having reined up their animals, they were about resuming their course, when they encountered two men, one with a lantern, walking side by side. Alarmed and all, as Martha was, she recognized in the one who carried the lantern as no less a person than Maurice Fitz Raymond who, with Francis Ellencourt, were wending their way to town a short distance in advance of the returning volunteers.

In a few minutes sufficient was said to induce the soldiers to step aside with the horses a few yards from the road, until the party came up. In the meantime, the wolves sniffing danger, with their usual cowardliness turned away from the beaten track they had been pursuing, and were now heard deeper in the forest to the left.

In a few words, Martha recited to Maurice all the dreadful intelligence regarding Alice of which she herself had knowledge, but without being able to give him any clue as to where she now was, or into whose power she had fallen. In the anguish of his soul he groaned audibly and staggered against a tree where he stood supporting himself like one who would avoid falling to the earth.

Recovering himself with an effort the most heroic, however, he informed the two women, that it was best for them to gain the villa unobserved, and take shelter in it for the time being, and that he and his friend would lead them thither when he had spoken with the officer who shared command with him.

On the arrival of the party at the point near which the horses stood, both gentlemen stepped into the track, and said whatever was necessary in relation to the disposition of the men until morning. This arranged they fell back again, and, joining Martha and Firefly, soon struck off on a road that led direct to the villa, where they arrived after midnight to find Mrs. Ravenswood and the family a prey to the deepest anguish, and John Langton in a state of sullen despair.

Notwithstanding the absolute benefits conferred upon this our day and generation by Professors Tyndall and Huxley, yet, on the higher planes of thought, these gentlemen are failures of a most signal character, inasmuch as they predicate their theories upon the assumption that there is nothing outside science in its present material aspect, and that all phenomena should be submitted to a mere physical standard, and such a one only as is recognized by the schools.

This would be all well enough, perhaps, if the schools themselves, with all their boasted knowledge and completeness, were not still sitting at the feet of Gamaliel, although seemingly unconscious of the fact. Because they are able to explain, upon what appears to be immutable principles, some of the phenomena that make up the total of this physical existence, they entertain the idea that they see and comprehend all. And yet they are obviously able to deal with proximate causes only, and are at sea the moment they are unable to demonstrate. We know the result of certain properties of the loadstone, but we have no philosophy beyond this that reaches its essence intelligibly. And so it is with electricity and magnetism in all their phases. These are the subtle links that seem to unite the visible or the grosser world to that which is more sublimated and which is not recognized upon a simply material plane.

One might suppose that the existence of such mysterious and inexplicable agents would hold the Materialist in check, and prompt him into researches more elevated than he has yet explored. Where there is palpably so much mystery connected with our present state of being, may there not be something more lying beyond our ordinary means of apprehension? Wherever we turn we stand before a gate of mystery! At whatever point we may arrive, there is an unexplored region beyond! Who, then, shall set boundaries to the possible in connection with the sentient portion of our being, or say that, because it is recognized in his state of existence in association with a gross material organization, it is impossible that it shall continue to exist in any other relation.

Here is where Tyndall and Huxley fail. Their reason staggers beneath the weight of too many physical facts, which they dismiss upon the meagre basis of simple demonstration, and without leading to any higher end than a mere advancement of science. But what can be expected, in this relation, from a philosopher like Mr. Huxley, who declines to accept as evidences of the immortality of the soul manifestations that are not couched in the choicest language and fraught with the most profound originality, as if a hailstorm and an avalanche did not illustrate the laws of gravity alike!

Professor Tyndall, also, with respect to his famous inaugural address at Belfast, or at least a certain portion of it, should be censured by other and more influential pens than ours, for the discourtesy and want of generosity displayed on the subject of modern Spiritualism toward those distinguished gentlemen—Fellows of the Royal Society—scientists and thinkers of the first water—who had given the subject grave consideration, and who testified upon a basis of demonstration not to be held in light esteem, to the occurrence of phenomena of infinitely more importance to the human family than anything yet achieved by the class of scientists to which Mr. Tyndall belongs. Nothing can possibly interest men so deeply as the question whether they shall live forever. To them it is of more importance than the establishment of any particular theory of light, heat or color, which, according to the Professor's metaphysical or religious ideas, would, at the very best, be worth only thirty-three years purchase, if that be the average of human life.

No one can pronounce with any degree of certainty upon either the destiny or the powers of the human soul, without being inferior and superior to himself at one and the same moment. The soul can never sit in judgment upon itself, but simply upon what the functions of the body, or rather upon what the organs of the brain are able to achieve, and have achieved, through its instrumentality. Here is where we can perceive a metaphysical whip on the physical coach-box, and all the speculation or reasoning in the world can't make it otherwise.

On this point mystery upon mystery crowds upon us. And who shall explain the case of Madge Gordon whom, after long years of insanity and consequent irresponsibility, we now find restored to her normal condition instantaneously, and through a single glimpse of that signet ring; for previous to her fall to the floor, the light had evidently burst upon her? The truth is, all is mystery from beginning to end, and no after state of existence can be more inexplicable than this.

Until Alice had arrived at the door of the Fanatic, she had no clear idea of how absolutely terrible was her situation. She had, in her dreadful alarm and confusion, mixed up in her mind, at the instant of her capture, both white men and Indians as having assailed her in some way, although she soon began to surmise that she had actually fallen into the hands of some of the emissaries of Sloucher and the witchfinder. Somehow she never supposed, for a moment, that she was actually in the very arms of the Fanatic, and it was only when the light fell upon his hideous countenance as his own door opened, that all hope forsook her. When, however, she became aware of the presence of a third party, and had recovered her senses sufficiently to perceive that she was in the arms of Madge Gordon, and no longer in those of the Fanatic, she felt a sense of relief that was wholly inexplicable to her at the moment; for now that she believed herself entering the den of the master, she could scarcely expect much mercy or forbearance from any one beneath his roof.

However, she was not for the time being, to be alone with him, and there was some consolation in this. Besides, although she had heard many terrible stories of the cruelty of Madge to those who had been denounced as witches, she had never witnessed anything, on the part of the poor demented creature, in relation to herself, that did not savor of something like friendliness, and in this, also, she took refuge for the moment. When Sloucher had disappeared, and she found herself completely relieved of her bonds and placed in a chair by Madge, she could scarcely credit her ears, when the woman exclaimed hurriedly and in an undertone:

"Alice Ravenswood, Madge Gordon has found her long lost reason, and is here to protect you! Yes," she continued, "the veil has fallen from me, and at a moment, too, when I have work to do, both on your account and on my own. You are in great peril, and so am I; for, if Solomon Sloucher knew that I know what I do to-night, and that this terrible cloud has passed away from me, neither you nor I should possibly see the light of dawn."

A prayer of thanksgiving struggled to the pale lips of the fugitive, as she whispered feebly:

"There is, then, yet hope! Yet one hope!"

"There is," replied the woman, "but you must be guided in everything by me. That man will return in a few moments. I have heard your story. It is as a dream to me; but I can comprehend all now. Let there be no visible token of friendship between us in his presence. I must dissemble also. I know you have been denounced, and dreadful as your position may be here, you are perhaps more free from death and danger beneath this very roof at the present moment than you would be under your own. Be cautious, and interpret aright any severity I may assume to evince toward you in the presence of Solomon Sloucher."

Although these may not have been the precise words used by Madge, what she said to Alice carried their import. Grateful for any respite from the perils that surrounded her, the poor girl caught up the hand of the woman, and pressed it so far as her feeble strength would admit. Fortunately her poniard still remained concealed in her bosom, and to this she determined to commit herself in any case of extremity where the exertions of Madge might perchance be paralyzed. Now, however, a loud knock at the outer door announced the return of the Fanatic, when Madge, arising from her seat, and with a finger raised in caution to the poor fugitive, left the apartment and at once admitted Sloucher into the room which he used as his sham quarters.

Here they remained for a considerable period, the sanctified, drawing tones of the Fanatic reaching the ears of Alice from time to time, while the voice of Madge occasionally broke in in wild denunciation of the witches and the enemies of the Lord. Through all her incoherent ravings, however, she managed to impress the infamous scoundrel that Alice was in such a state of prostration, and mental excitement withal, that his presence might prove fatal on the spot, and that she must be left to herself solely for the remainder of the night.

Sloucher perceived at once that this would, after all, be the best course under the circumstances, as he must stand fair, for the present at least, with his crazy slave, as he still supposed her to be. He, therefore, lighted some fagots that were piled upon the hearth, and prepared to retire to his straw pallet, after having first bid Madge good-night and counseled her to impress upon the witch that she had only been carried hither in the hope of inducing her to forsake her evil ways, and with a desire to save her life by insuring the friendship and good offices of one who, after all, although acting under the sanction of the Church and State, had now only borne her to a place of security beyond the iron clutch of those who had already made up their minds to bring her to the gallows.

As Madge turned into the apartment in which Alice was seated, trembling lest the Fanatic should present himself before her, she measured the scoundrel in the light of her newly awakened intelligence; and now, as she closed and firmly, but noiselessly, barred and bolted the door between both rooms, she stood erect for a moment, and then raising her clenched hand, shook it menacingly as against the villain outside, who fancied himself so secure in all his machinations.

The monster once cut securely off from their privacy, Madge took up the silver lamp from the table, and beckoning her companion to follow, both women entered the chamber which contained the signet ring. They were now secure, for, as formerly observed, there was no crevice between the room occupied by Sloucher and the one they had just left through which a single gleam of light could find its way, so that the Fanatic could not mark their movements in even a remote degree.

Although often previously visited by Madge, the chamber now seemed new and strange to her. Small closets and chests that had before escaped her notice obtruded themselves upon her attention, as did a bunch of keys hanging against the wainscot that concealed the rough bark of the logs of which the building was constructed.

Before these latter she paused for a moment, when handing the lamp to Alice, who moved as in a dream, she took them down and began to inspect them. While thus engaged, her eye again fell on the signet ring, which still lay where she had placed it earlier in the evening, and once more her whole being seemed to undergo a fearful change. Alice observed the wild and sudden glare of her eye as she clutched the ring, and once again riveted her gaze upon it. It was, poor Alice felt satisfied, the clue to some fearful mystery, and she was about to speak when her companion, dropping the keys upon the table where the ring had lain, seized her by the arm, and exclaimed while she held up the quaint jewel in her trembling hand between her almost fleshless finger and thumb:

"I thank God for this long night of darkness he has permitted me to pass through, because it has brought me to a knowledge of the murderer of my child! Had it not been for these lost and weary years, I should never have been the trusted slave of that fiend in human shape outside there, who was the cause of their existence, and upon whom they are now to recoil in vengeance as dire as that spread by vast accumulated waters that had burst their barriers. This ring," she continued, "belonged to my only child whom he had foully betrayed and ruined, and whose downfall and death had robbed me for all these long years of the light of reason. I know I have had occasional brief gleams that have enabled me to keep track of the dire disaster; and I remember her dying words—the first coherent sentences she spoke since the period of her ruin; for, as she was about to breathe her last, she informed me that her destroyer had possessed himself of this ring, and she enjoined me to avenge her downfall; but before she could name the monster who had accomplished it, her lips were sealed forever. Even within the last few hours after having first discovered this token in this very apartment, I have been able to link circumstance to circumstance in such a manner as to identify the false, foul wretch beyond a shadow of mistake, and now I shall seek for further evidence of his infamy, and of the deceit and treachery that have swallowed up his whole being."

With these words she thrust the ring into her bosom, and resuming the keys she began to inspect minutely the small closets and chests just alluded to. Turning the keys in their locks one after another, she soon brought to light various articles of great value, and one small casket of jewels, which, on the morning of the execution, the Fanatic had been gloating over alone, and to which he had forgotten to restore the signet ring. There were some offensive weapons also, which were most costly, and which had no doubt accomplished some foul work in their owner's service. What, however, attracted her attention most was a small package of papers, or rather letters, with her own name seemingly on the band which held them together; and which she suddenly seized the moment her eye fell upon them.

With a celerity scarcely to be expected from her long period of mental aberration, she on opening one of the missives at once recognized the handwriting of her long-lost daughter! As she read she began to quiver from head to foot; for she soon perceived that it had been written by her child to the young minister to whom she had been betrothed, and that it had evidently been intercepted by Sloucher; while close by her side lay one from the minister himself to the ill-fated girl, which had also fallen into the hands of the Fanatic, and upon which the infamous wretch had palpably based the terrible and effective scheme that had resulted first in the loss of reason and then in the death of his innocent victim.

Again Madge Gordon stood erect as she held this two-fold evidence of the villain's guilt in her trembling hand. But repelling a terrible idea which seized upon her, as she clutched a long, keen dagger and took a step toward the door, she sank into a seat close by, and covering her face with her hands wept long and bitterly.

Notwithstanding Alice was herself in a situation of dire peril, she forgot her own woes for a moment in those of the poor heart-broken mother. Although previously aware of the cruelty and fanaticism of Sloucher, she had had no absolute evidence of his infamy and cupidity outside the gloomy boundaries of his superstition; but now another veil was lifted from her eyes, and she began to discover that she was intended but as simply another link in the chain of the Fanatic's infamies; and that, with all his pretended sanctity, Solomon Sloucher was a lowly and daring ruffian, who had, perhaps, solely clothed himself with the terrible superstition of the times, for the purpose of being able to gratify his love of gold and his baser lust with greater security when the fear of death was pressing upon his victims.

Of this there seemed now before her abundance of evidence, as well as proof of the additional fact, that some of the seemingly most sanctified of the dreadful fraternity to which he belonged, had been in league with him for years in projects of plunder, based upon the fears of those who dreaded the power of the Church, and those who had in self-defense to buy off blood hounds privately, when they found themselves in danger of being denounced as witches or wizards. Of the hearts crushed and the sums paid nothing dared be said; for these agents of the Church, or the Devil, were all-powerful, and could consign their victims to death, even after previously extracting the most terrible tribute. So that no one ventured to disclose the secret that lay at his or her heart, whether it involved the loss of fortune on the part of the man, or a greater calamity on that of the woman.

The two sat long in earnest conversation, Alice knitting together, through circumstantial details, the broken remembrance of Madge, who now, with that strange lucidity which not unfrequently succeeds long periods of clouded reason, seemed to comprehend fully the true condition of her affairs, and to perceive that, looking matters in the face just as they were, she had a terrible task before her in an endeavor to thwart the infamous designs of Sloucher; and to shield Alice from the certain death or destruction that might overtake her through one false move.

It had now become so late and Alice was so weary with watching and anxiety as well as the sense of the danger that surrounded her, Madge proposed that she should seek some repose. In the chamber there was quite sufficient out of which to make a comfortable couch; and as both women seemed to shrink from the bed that was at times occupied by the Fanatic, they soon disposed themselves to rest at some distance from it, but not before they had decided fully as to the course they should now pursue toward Sloucher, who, as they well knew, would not hesitate to encompass their death suddenly and secretly, had he the slightest surmise that they were leagued against him, or that Madge had at one and the same moment recovered her reason and discovered that he was the destroyer of her only child, now long mouldering in the grave.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Seeking After Truth—God—

Therefore this aphorism: Truth is Deity; to worship it is to do right—the only true road to true happiness. I think identity never recurs; similarity and diversity only can follow; forms perish, actions, the relative changes of matter (not entities or substances) past, can never recur; thus vital, mental, chemical and mechanical (all of which, perhaps, are mechanical), are only such during said changes.

We cannot see anything independent, or behind matter, that forces it to act, yet we may, perhaps, venture the supposition that the elective reciprocal actions of molecules of matter are the initial ultimates. There never was, nor can there be, two particles of matter, or two acts identically the same; similarity and diversity seems the rule. If so, there can be no fixed, eternal and immutable law, (if law be only the acts of matter,) for we cannot conceive that actions (so-called) can act, but that matter only can move, therefore that all the changes, phases and forms of matter are due to matter itself. Aside from matter, there can be no nerves to feel, no feet to walk, no brain to think; and when these return mutually to first elements, they have simply ceased their organic acts—no more, no less. Therefore, if life be vital action, there can be no individual immortality, as all past identity of action has ceased. The sorrows of past ages are not the sorrows of to-day; the thoughts and steps of yesterday were not the same as to-day; our life acts of to-day, not the same as yesterday; all are past with the past forever.

The picture may not suit us, but the truth remains, and we cannot alter it. Perhaps it may be said that material substances, simple, are eternal truths, forms secondary, and actions the evidences. Truth, then, is the only God, the great Jehovah, the Adonai, Trimurti; All in all, after which we should seek, such is science. What then is truth?

ABRAM BRONSON.

Ifko, Nevada, Jan. 29th, 1875.

The Truth Seeker,
A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.
D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.
No 335 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XXIII.

Of all the remarkable tales that have ever been narrated by any story-teller, or written in any book, whether "Baron Munchausen," "Gulliver's Travels," "The Arabian Nights," "Robinson Crusoe," or in the wild nursery tales for children, in point of extravagance, improbability, impossibility and absurdity, there is nothing that equals the account of Joshua's causing the sun and moon to stand still, as related in the tenth chapter of the book called by his name. After this mighty military man had demolished the cities of Jericho and Ai, putting to death every man, woman and child, "leaving not a soul to breathe," some of the neighboring nations very naturally became alarmed at these blood-thirsty Israelites, and deemed it best to placate them and make friends with them. Thus the men of Gibeon dressed themselves in tattered garments, with worn-out shoes and clouts on their feet, and with mouldy food, and rent wine-bottles, appeared before the Israelites, pretending to have come a long journey and were anxious to make a treaty with them. Joshua and his men were deceived by this stratagem, and entered into a solemn treaty that they would do no harm to the Gibeonites, and swore to it in the most sacred manner by their God.

When the five kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon, heard of the treaty thus made they were very much incensed at the Gibeonites, and united their own forces to destroy the nation at which they had become offended. Whereupon the Gibeonites deeming their danger imminent, called upon their new allies, the Jews, to "help them out." Joshua, with commendable alacrity, went to their relief, and the fighting and bloodshed were soon in active operation. He evidently had a great fondness for this business of carnage, as nearly his whole time was occupied in that direction. The number of men engaged, however, was very insignificant compared with many other armies the world has known. "The nations," so-called, were small, being little more than tribes, occupying a single city each. Nevertheless it was evidently a pretty lively time, and Joshua deeming the day too short to properly finish the slaughter so vigorously prosecuted, commanded the sun and moon to stand still, and they obeyed him, for nearly the space of a whole day, thus giving him and the Jews time to be avenged upon their enemies.

We repeat, this is the most monstrous and utterly impossible story that ever was told. To say a flea swallowed Bunker Hill Monument, that a spider and a bed-bug built a ship five hundred feet long, or that a grasshopper hauled a train of twenty loaded cars five hundred miles in ten hours, would be tame and insignificant compared with this Bible story. What is it to stop the sun and moon in their courses? The sun is an immense body of matter nearly a million miles in diameter. One hundred globes the size of the earth, placed side by side, would not equal the diameter of the sun. It is more than a thousand times greater than the earth, and nearly a hundred times greater than all the rest of the solar system. The momentum of such a vast body in rapid transit is utterly inconceivable. The moon is smaller than the earth, and only two hundred and forty thousand miles distant, but what can a man, or all the men that ever lived combined, do towards stopping it, much less the sun, ninety-five millions of miles away? Those orbs have doubtless for millions of years been in incessant and rapid motion, performing their regular circuits, pursuant to laws and forces impossible to be set aside for an instant, and how idle to say a man ever stopped them, or even that a God ever stopped them. They are minute parts of the boundless Universe which move in harmonious accord and co-operation, and were it possible to stop a part, the most inconceivable confusion would ensue. To go into an immense machine shop where numerous huge and ponderous wheels are running with great velocity, the larger matching and fitting into the smaller, and all being impelled by a tremendous power, gives a very imperfect idea of the countless worlds and suns filling the Universe, moving in perfect unison in their intricate connection, and should a heavy bar of iron or stick of timber be thrust between two of the wheels so as to suddenly interrupt the movement of the machinery, it would afford a very imperfect conception of the utter confusion and destruction it must cause in the Universe should a part of its machinery be suddenly stopped.

No machinery made by man can give an adequate idea of the machinery of the Universe. As well talk about a fly at the Cape of Good Hope stopping the Falls of Niagara, as Joshua stopping the sun and moon. The thing is too preposterous to be thought of seriously for a moment. The silly argument so often used—"all things are possible with God"—will not avail. God cannot act against himself, and to subvert the forces of the Universe would be to act against himself.

Perhaps it is hardly worth while to allude to the trivial matter of the sun and moon both cheering the Israelites by shining upon them at the same time, in their bloody work of carnage, the one being on Gibeon and the other in the Valley of Ajalon. It would seem unnecessary for Joshua to have detained both of them, and it may strike some as singular how the moon could give much light while the sun was pouring down his rays; but people are required to have faith and believe what the book says.

It may be justly urged that if a day was to be increased in length, it would not be necessary to stop the sun, but the earth. This does not remove the impossibility of the story, but simply illustrates the total ignorance of the motions of the heavenly bodies on the part of the person who wrote the book of Joshua. It was then believed day and night were produced by the sun every twenty-four hours, making a complete circuit around the earth. The fact that a person so ignorant of the actual movements of our sun, moon and earth, should be held up to us as one writing the "word of God," is sufficient reason why we should not believe a word he utters. As well might we believe the ancient false supposition that the earth had corners, that it had foundations and rested on the backs of huge elephants, tortoises, etc. True, astronomers assure us the sun has two distinct motions, one upon its own axis, and another with the entire solar system around a more immense and far distant sun; but the writers of the Bible knew nothing of this, and supposed the sun and moon every day performed a journey around the earth.

It would be no easier for Joshua to stop the motions of the earth than the sun. It has been whirling for unknown ages at the speed of one thousand miles an hour in its diurnal revolution, and through space at the velocity of sixty-eight thousand miles an hour in its yearly course around the sun. It has never stopped for an instant, and never will so long as the matter which composes it retains its present form. How idle, then, for any story-teller to talk about a man, or any other being, stopping it for a day.

If for one moment we admit such a possibility, would not that day, "unlike any before it or since," and nearly double the length of other days, have been known elsewhere than at the city of Gibeon? The same sun that shone there, sent his rays to every part of the earth, and the intelligent nations of Egypt, Persia, India, China and other countries whose history runs much further back than the time of Joshua, would assuredly have known it and had some account of this most wonderful occurrence, had it ever taken place. But not a word do we hear of it from any part of the world, or any being except the anonymous author of the book of Joshua. Who this writer was, no one knows. It could not have been Joshua himself, for it refers to events that occurred long after his death, and in several instances uses language that has no meaning, unless the book was written long after the events were said to have transpired.

The motive or reason assigned for this most wonderful miracle that ever was related, is as improbable and as unreasonable as the story itself. It is, that a few thousand, at most, of poor, hapless mortals—offspring of the same Universal Power of which we claim to be emanations—might be cruelly slaughtered by the merciless Israelites, pursuant to a treaty they had been wheedled into by fraud. Can any sane person, for a moment, believe the Architect of all worlds, if he had the power, would stop the machinery of the Universe for a reason so contemptible, as to give time for one barbarous nation to slaughter a few thousands of another barbarous nation? Reason, justice and common sense forbid! Such a disposition may have been in keeping with the warlike, blood-thirsty and partial character as credited to Jehovah, the tutelary Deity of the Jews, but it does not inure to the Universal Force and life-principle pervading the immense Universe, which shows no partiality to one nation over another, and delights not in carnage and bloodshed. The two should not be mistaken, one for the other; there is no similarity between them. If Jehovah wished to destroy those unfortunate Amorites, why not accomplish it suddenly, as he is said to have exterminated much larger numbers on other occasions? Or why not slay them by continuing the throwing of rocks upon them out of heaven, as the same chapter says he did on this occasion? It asserts he "slew them with great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah. And it came to pass as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died. There were more which died from hail-stones than they which the children of Israel slew with the sword." It appears the Lord had a special ill-will toward those poor people, to treat them in that harsh manner, and it would seem his ammunition must have been exhausted—the heavenly rocks—or he would have kept up the fire until the last man was killed, and thus save him the trouble of interfering with the machinery of the Universe to lengthen out the day, so that Joshua and his bloody cohorts could slaughter the few that remained. One would think the killing of a few hundred exhausted men, a much easier task than stopping the sun and moon, or the earth. By the by, we wish to enquire right here, is it a strictly god-like occupation for a deity to stone his offspring to death in that kind of manner? And is that the best use he could put them to?

Now, reader, this narrative is true, or it is false—the idle fancy of a silly brain, unfit alike to edify men and women, or to amuse little children. How stands the evidence? One unknown, nameless, anonymous writer who once lived, but nobody knows when, and nobody knows where, says it was so. Science, philosophy, reason, the negative testimony of many nations, truth and common sense say it is untrue. Which shall we believe? Those with brains, and who are free to think for themselves, must accept the latter testimony.

In Isaiah xxxviii: 7, 8, a story of similar credibility is narrated, when merely to give Hezekiah a sign that his life should be prolonged fifteen years, the sun not only was stopped, but moved back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz. Here we have a reiteration of a similar impossibility. Our Christian friends, however, swallow it as readily as six-year-old children do the tales and melodies of "Mother Goose," and are ready to doom all who cannot, to the endless torments of hell.

Such belief, they assure us, constitutes virtue, and to doubt it is a heinous crime. We are rejoiced, however, to see their idol is losing its hold upon the minds of intelligent men; the sun of reason and truth is breaking through the clouds of ignorance and error, and its course cannot be stayed any more than the sun of the solar system. Mankind will, in due time, emerge from the mists and fogs that for ages have enveloped them, when they will no longer give credence to idle, silly tales that do such gross injustice to the great Source of Life, Light and Truth that permeates and impels every atom in the entire Universe.

POPE Pío Nino has recently given to the world his infallible opinion concerning Tyndall and other scientists. He calls them "spiritual pirates seeking to destroy the souls of men."—Haywood.

Christian Untruthfulness.

Our attention has been called to recent issues of the N. Y. Observer, one of the wheel-horses of orthodoxy, in which untruthful statements are made in reference to Thomas Paine, and the present condition of Liberal sentiment in America.

One article of considerable length, by the Rev. Wm. Hall, entitled, "The Death-bed of Thomas Paine," and made up principally from extracts from Cheetam's slanderous life of Paine, published over sixty years ago, interspersed with unfair and false statements to the effect that, though Paine was entitled to some gratitude from the country, his immoral life and writings, detracted greatly from his fame. We give a few quotations:

"Biographical truth has lifted the veil from the closing life-scenes of most, or all, of the great apostles of infidelity. And that of the death of Thomas Paine, who takes the lead, as it were, among them, in boldness, outspoken virulence, and also in scurrility? His life was defiant, his pen and tongue full of the poison of soul-destroying error. But how was it at the last? How did he meet the last enemy and cross the dividing line between time and that eternity where his deathless spirit now abides? We have answers to this important inquiry which his disciples would be but too glad to suppress or invalidate.

"Why? Because the facts they embody respecting Mr. Paine's death-bed utterances admit of but one solution, viz.: that he had then the most terrible misgivings as to his infidel opinions and publications. The statements made on this subject by Dr. Manley, his kind, attentive physician; by his nurse, 'a woman of sense and piety'; and particularly by Stephen Grellet, the eminent Quaker philanthropist, harmoniously unite to establish this conclusion.

"Once, when an excellent young Quakeress was there to take him some refreshments suitable for an invalid, three of his deistical associates came to the door, and, in a loud, unfeeling manner, said: 'Tom Paine, it is said you are turning Christian, but we hope you will die as you have lived,' and then went away. On which, turning to her, he said: 'You see what miserable comforters they are!' Once he asked her if she had ever read any of his writings, and being told that she had read very little of them, he inquired what she thought of them, adding, 'From such a one as you, I expect a true answer.' She told him, when very young, his 'Age of Reason' was put in her hands, but that the more she read it, the more dark and distressed she felt, and she threw it into the fire. 'I wish all had done as you,' he replied; 'for if the Devil had an agency in any work, he has had it in my writing that book.' The same unimpeachable witness saw him writing much during his last illness. His infidel friends never published it; and why not, if favorable to their cause?"

The foregoing are fair specimens of the entire article. It is probable no man who ever lived in the United States has been more maligned and vilified than Thomas Paine; and these falsehoods have been reiterated until some, perhaps, believe what they relate is truth.

Ingersoll aptly says: "Not content with following him to his grave, they pursued him after death with redoubled fury, and recounted with infinite gusto and satisfaction the supposed horrors of his death-bed; gloried in the fact that he was forlorn and friendless, and gloated like fiends over what they supposed to be the agonizing remorse of his lonely death."

However often these false assertions as to the death-bed scenes of Thomas Paine made by Christians are disproved, they will doubtless continue to repeat them, believing if they can establish that Paine recanted when he faced death, it disproves the philosophy and views of his life. It is, to some extent, labor thrown away, to show up the falseness of our opponents in this direction, as it is about all the argument that is left them, and they have to make the most of it. But there is a cruelty in it—meaner than ordinary theft—to belie a man after his death, to tarnish the fair fame earned by a life of devotion and integrity, and to accuse him of falsifying the honest convictions of his life, and denying the light of reason which had illumined his heart.

It is easy to make these unfounded assertions. Every new-fledged preacher that has been turned out by our patent theological colleges feels it incumbent on him to throw slime and filth on the great name of the patriot, Paine. They seem to think if they speak ill of one of the grandest and best men this country ever possessed they have done a special service to their cause and their master.

But their efforts are futile. His name and fame are every day looming up brighter and more brilliant. Thousands are learning to revere him for the great political services he rendered his adopted country, and for the force, clearness and honesty of the moral truths he uttered. They are becoming divested of the prejudices they were taught to entertain towards the hero and philosopher, and that it is no dishonor to respect him for his political services, or esteem him for his fearless advocacy of truth and free thought.

In our issue of Jan. 1st, we paid some attention to the slanders of Christians as to the death-bed of Thomas Paine, and cited proof to show the utter falseness of the accusations brought against him by thousands who never saw him nor knew anything about him, save to repeat the slanders of others. We showed by the evidence of Mr. Paine's most intimate acquaintances, his nurses and most constant attendants, that he did not recant, that he did not deny the honest convictions of his life, that he did not embrace Christianity, nor call upon Jesus to help him, and it is hardly worth while to repeat it here. He died strong in the faith in which he had lived, his views and opinions in this respect undergoing no change whatever.

It is very easy to originate and circulate false statements. That Christians have done this in thousands of cases with regard to Infidels, we have oft-repeated evidence. Misrepresentation, however, is a poor element to depend upon—with which to sustain a sinking cause. The dogmas of Christianity cannot always be palmed upon the masses of mankind by falsehood, dishonesty and misstatements of truth.

Neither will these always tarnish the name of one of the noblest men that ever lived, and who did much to remove the fetters of political and mental bondage; he of whom the eloquent Ingersoll says: "He lived a long, laborious and useful life. The world is better for his having lived. For the sake of truth, he accepted hatred and reproach for his portion. He ate the bitter bread of sorrow. His friends were untrue to him because he was true to himself and true to them. He lost the respect of what is called society, but kept his own. His life is what the world calls failure, and what history calls success.

"If to love your fellow-men more than self is goodness, Thomas Paine was good.

"If to be in advance of your time—to be a pioneer in the direction of right—is greatness, Thomas Paine was great.

"If to avow your principles and discharge your duty in the presence of death is heroic, Thomas Paine was a hero."

It was he who uttered the immortal sentiment—"THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY, AND TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION."

We here give another quotation from the Christian Observer, to show how truthful it is:

"TOM PAINE."

"Thomas Paine's birthday was scarcely noticed this year in the city of New York. Thirty years ago it was celebrated with great enthusiasm. Before, and indeed after that time, a grand dinner was eaten by his disciples, speeches were made, long columns of the daily papers were taken up with their reports, and it was considered bigotry and intolerance to say a word against the demonstrations in his honor. Now none so poor to do him reverence.

"And this is worthy of being mentioned only to prove, that in spite of the vauntings of skepticism, the truth of Christianity has a stronger hold than it ever had upon the common mind. Infidelity is not half so rife as it was just after the American Revolutionary war; not half so widespread as it was fifty years ago.

"We have in mind two places, one on Long Island, and one on the banks of the Hudson River, where infidel societies, or clubs, existed fifty years ago, holding regular meetings and making no secret of their object. But they are now extinct.

"The old members have gone into another world, and learned what they did not believe. And they have left no successors. As poor Paine's bones have been carried away from American soil, and his grave is no longer a shrine, it is well that his birthday is passed into forgetfulness. A few dreary disciples at New Rochelle, we perceive, still try to cheer up when it comes round, but they will soon forget it, and then the place that once knew 'Tom Paine' will know him no more."

Thus because the friends of Thomas Paine failed to celebrate his birthday this year in New York City our Christian journalist would make it appear his views are losing ground in this community, that skepticism is going backward, and that, per consequence, the Christian religion is becoming more firmly established in the minds of the people. Nothing could be further from the truth. There are in this city and in this country to-day many more friends of Thomas Paine than thirty-five years ago. We believe we greatly understate the number when we say there are in the United States twenty Infidels to the Christian religion for every one then.

The friends of Thomas Paine here, consulted about celebrating his birthday, but in view of the special dedication of Paine Hall on that day in Boston which many wished to attend, a celebration here was deferred, and that affair was certainly glory enough for two cities. In other parts of the country there were more commemorations of Paine's birthday than on any previous year. Our Christian friends are hugging a delusion to their bosoms if they imagine the cause of free thought is dying out.

Those who have dared to throw off the trammels and creeds of dogmas have not been idle. Thousands have been able to get their eyes open so they could see clearly between truth and error. The bonds of priestcraft have greatly loosened, and large numbers who formerly took the word of their preacher as law and gospel have taken the liberty to examine and think for themselves.

Science has done, and is doing much for the cause of truth. The leading minds of the day, in this country and in Europe, are scientists. The geologist with his pick and hammer, the chemist with his crucible and alembic, the astronomer with his telescope and spectroscope, the naturalist with his microscope and object-glass, the anatomist with his scalpel and forceps, and all the other scientists in their special fields and departments, are busily studying Nature in all her various phases and forces, and deciding what is true, what is real, and what will stand the test of investigation.

The number of these men is rapidly increasing, and their disciples are multiplying by thousands. They are searching for realities, and are not satisfied with assertions and conjectures. Nine-tenths of these men have become satisfied of the untruthfulness of the theological superstitions and dogmas of the past. They have demonstrated the fallacy of old theories and assumptions built upon that which is claimed as revelation to obscure and unknown persons.

As light increases, darkness is dispelled; as Science advances, the errors of the past step into the background and pass out of sight. Certainty is taking the place of doubts, and knowledge the place of ignorance. By this process the mind is enlarged, and the comprehension expanded; the love of truth succeeds the taste for fictions and fables.

The growth of this Scientific and Liberal element is not confined especially to our own ranks. It is spreading abroad through all the land. Even the churches are becoming impregnated with it, and in consequence the confidence and faith in the old notions are gradually lessening. Church people in many cases begin to examine, and to think. They have not the same implicit confidence in the assertions of their minister or priest that was common half a century ago. They, too, begin to read scientific books, and Christian publishing houses are issuing works that completely overthrow the basis upon which their creed is founded. In this way light and truth is being diffused far and wide, and thousands of Infidels made yearly.

In view of all these facts, how idle and false it is to claim that free thought is retrograding, that mental liberty is taking the backward march, and that the doctrines promulgated by Thomas Paine seventy-five years ago are becoming less popular, and that the bright minds of the age are again gathering up the husks of ignorance and error to feed upon, and are throwing away the ripe ears of Reason, Science and Truth. If our cotemporary is satisfied with the advance that is being made in Liberalism, we certainly have no reason to complain.

IN THE diversity of duties claiming our attention we are frequently compelled to neglect correspondents, and leave letters unanswered for several days sometimes. We ask our friends to take no offense at this; we would be glad to reply promptly to all, but we so often find ourselves unable to do this we deem this apology necessary.

Unity in Diversity.

BY HUGH B. BROWN.

What a profound enigma is man! Who can unravel the mystery of his existence? Far deeper and more significant than any meaning concealed in the Egyptian Sphinx, is that hidden in the confused noise between two silences which we call life. What its origin—its real significance—and whither it tends are beyond the ken of the wisest men? The scientist has as yet no plummet that can sound its depths, no lens that will reveal its secret.

What, if aught, lies beyond this "bank and shoal of time," none can tell. The vast ocean of the unknown yet awaits its Columbus, if, indeed, the limited capacity of man is adequate to its exploration.

One of the world's profoundest philosophers has said to us that "the proper study of mankind is man." A study, though pursued in some directions from the earliest dawn of human consciousness, is nevertheless yet in its infancy, both as regards methods and results.

The Oriental mind sought the solution of man's existence and destiny in the realms of the supernatural. In this light, the material or visible was only the manifestation of the unseen reality. The soul of man was but an emanation from the infinite Spirit into whose existence it was again merged, as a snow-flake is dissolved and lost in the boundless ocean.

Other and less imaginative nations of antiquity have sought the explanation and philosophy of life in the material alone, being unable, from their peculiar constitution, plane of development, and the physical aspects of Nature around them, to conceive of aught in the Universe except that which is cognizable to their senses.

All the speculations and theories of modern theologians and metaphysicians are but modifications of one or the other of these assumptions; for assumptions they undoubtedly are, having never yet been verified, nor, indeed, so far as we can see, susceptible of proof.

Aside from the bias of their education, men intuitively gravitate to one or the other of these schools of philosophy, according to their peculiar organization, development, habits of thought and mode of reasoning. Men of sanguine temperament and vivid imagination, especially if inclined to arrive at conclusions from the deductive or subjective mode of reasoning, are inevitably Spiritualists. The present, with its imperfections and limitations, is so inferior, prosaic and unsatisfactory, as compared with what they can readily conceive in their imaginations, and in which they soon habituate themselves to believe—the wish becoming father to the thought, and the existence of the desire an indubitable proof that the thing desired must be in the order of Nature.

To such, the order of the Universe seems an evolution from within outwardly. The unseen becomes to them the real, the seen being only the visible manifestation of an invisible entity—the material casket in which is enshrouded an immortal principle which had no beginning and which can have no end. To them life is no longer a riddle. Its meaning and purpose are fully understood. Life, say they, in its relations to human destiny, is but as the prelude to the oratorio, the dawn to the day, or the rivulet to the ocean! Their intuition of the unseen reality is so strong that they are impatient of the deductions of logic, and scarcely require proof of that, to them, so obvious and plain. To the sceptic and unbeliever they say, "more in sorrow than in anger,"

"Alas! for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress trees!
Who hopeless lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marble play;
Who hath not learned in hours of faith,
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That life is ever lord of death,
And love can never lose its own!"

Nor is this belief in a future state of existence confined alone to civilized men. Its conception and its effects on character and institutions are equally apparent among savage nations. While some are so materialistic in thought as to have no conception of any mode of life except the present, nor indeed any words in their language to express such thoughts, there are others whose imaginations have pictured to their minds a more blissful state than the present—a happy hunting ground—a sea of a "thousand isles," possessing in far greater abundance and excellence everything that is desirable in this, to which the Great Spirit will lead them at the close of their mortal career.

"Lo! the poor Indian, whose untutored mind
Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind.
Whose soul proud science never taught to stray
Far as the solar walk or milky way—
Yet simple nature to his hope has given
Behind the cloud-topped hill a humbler heaven,
Some safer world in depth of woods embraced,
Some happier island in the watery waste,
Where slaves once more their native land behold,
No fiends torment, no Christians thirst for gold,
And thinks, admitted to you equal sky,
His faithful dog shall bear him company."

But then there are others to be found, even among the most cultured and enlightened nations, whose temperaments, habits of thought, and modes of reasoning are the antipodes of the former class—men to whom imagination lends no wings, who prefer the hard-pan of the senses to the dream-land of the imagination, who would rather dig with the scientist than soar with the idealist, who prefer the substance to the shadow, the known to the unknown, the seen to the unseen, and who cannot realize the existence of life without a material organization, or thought without a brain.

Such men reason only from the objective; they "evolve nothing from their inner consciousness," recognize only that which is susceptible of proof or demonstration, and refuse to believe anything that is not manifest to the natural senses. These are the Grad-Grinds of science and the doubting Thomases of society, who will not believe that the Christ has risen unless they "shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put their finger into the print of the nails, and thrust their hand into his side."

In a word, the Materialist hears no voice that is not articulated from the vocal organs, sees no object that is not depicted on the retina of the eye, touches nothing that is not of the earth, earthy, hopes for nothing that is not on the plane of his senses, and looks upon the cherished beliefs of the Spiritualists as but dreams and phantasies of a heated imagination.

Man, viewed in the light of this philosophy, is but a highly organized body vitalized by a materially generated force, evolved originally from an infinite series of lower forms by the law of development, and returning again to the inorganic elements of which it is composed—this transient and mysterious principle of life being, as far as we can know, the "be all and the end all."

The gulf that divides these two classes of minds—Materialists and Spiritualists—is indeed wide and deep, and seemingly as impassable as the one recorded in the Gospels, which separated Lazarus in Heaven from the rich man in Hell.

Can differences so radical and fundamental be explained or reconciled? If the belief of one be deemed true, must not the other be necessarily false? There are those, indeed, who confidently assert that Revelation has definitely and forever settled the questions of man's origin and destiny; but the time has forever gone by when the doctrine of authority can settle these, or any other questions.

Science, not Scripture, is now the Court of last appeal in every matter appertaining to man and the Universe. Ancient Scripture may indeed assist, as all ancient writings do, in solving problems in Biology and in many other sciences. They are valuable as a record of facts in relation to the beliefs, religious experiences, and modes of thought of different races of men in different epochs of their history, but they are very far from being infallible, and of themselves can settle nothing.

But what says this Court of last resort to the great questions of man's origin and destiny? Of his origin, there seems now, since Darwin has spoken, a prospect of a final verdict in favor of evolution, or progressive development; but of his destiny, as it relates to any other state of existence, it has as yet come to no decision. In the presence of this great question of questions, science veils its face and is silent. Whether this silence will ever be broken, whether in the distant future the key to this mystery will be found, or whether, indeed, the key may not now be already found in those mysterious and seemingly spiritual phenomena that are occurring around us, the future alone can reveal.

But irreconcilable as the beliefs of the Spiritualists and Materialist are, need they necessarily divide them into hostile camps? Is there not some neutral ground—a common platform on which all can meet for "the doing of good, seeking of truth, and the promotion of fellowship?" Whatever may be the verdict of science in the matter of his immortality, one thing is sure, which is that the interest and welfare of every individual, so far as his earth-life is considered, is intimately related to that of every other person. No evil that happens to one but will in a measure affect all; and no good achieved by some but will in a degree be enjoyed by all.

We must, per force, travel the road of this life in company; and whatever the future may have in store for some, must, like the sunshine and the elements here, be shared by all, for Nature's designs and beneficence are as universal as her laws.

Whatever may lie beyond that we are accustomed to call the realm of Nature, is in fact still a part of her domain, and subject to her laws; for there can be no place in the Universe where Nature and law are not, nor any antagonism between the part we see and know, and that which for the present is beyond our ken.

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul."

The same æsthetic and moral culture, mental discipline, and intellectual development that are requisite to the happiness and well-being of man on this plane of existence, must be equally advantageous and necessary to the disembodied man, should such a state of existence prove to be in the order of Nature.

If, as we know, no force generated here can ever be lost or destroyed, and if virtue and culture conduce to the highest good of man on this stage of existence, must not his power and well-being be enhanced hereafter in the proportion these have been attained or evolved here, providing that death causes no break in his conscious identity?

Do not these facts, then, constitute an ample bond of union—a common ground on which the Spiritualist and Materialist can associate for their own individual culture, and for the promotion of the welfare of their fellow men? Nay, is not such an association a necessity? Is not one but the supplement of the other, and as necessary to each other to form the complete whole and to accomplish the ends of life, as the segment is to the complement in the completion of the circle?

Too intense a realization of the spiritual, has often in the past led to the neglect of the here and now,—the exceeding glory and eternal duration of the hereafter belittling the importance of the present, causing men rather to endure the imperfections of their surroundings and the poverty of their earthly homes, in the anticipation of that "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Thus we see that "whatever is right," and whatever the future of man may be, the highest good and best interest of the race, either in this life or the possible future, lie in the same direction. If at the end of a virtuous and well-spent life we awake to the consciousness of no other, nothing has been lost, as nothing can be. If the immortality in store for us by Nature, the dear mother of us all, is only that of species. If, as in other organisms, the specie only survives, while the individual members perish, we must accept it as we accept all her other gifts, for that which is in the order of Nature must be right. This consolation, at least, we have, that is not afforded by any of the world's historical religions, that "from nothing nothing can come, not even sorrow." But if, on the other hand, the intuition of the Spiritualist proves true, that "life is ever lord of death," and the dissolution of physical only the birth of the spiritual, then we are indeed doubly blessed, having had the life that now is, and the certainty of another, where, under better conditions, with all the advantages of our earth-life experience, the dropped threads and unfinished work of our initial life may be taken up and completed, and where all its imperfections, and failures shall eventually be corrected. Nor shall the shadow of any angry God or theologians' Hell be observable there, for Nature's gifts to her children are as universal as her beneficence is unlimited and impartial.

If we are destined to awake to another life beyond the grave, we may, from all her known works in this sphere of existence, and from the universal and minute economy every-where seen in her operations, confidently proclaim that Nature has given her guarantee that not one soul can ever be lost.

(Continued from No. 11.)

Conversation about Society and Churches.

BY G. L. HENDERSON.

DAUGHTER.—The reply of the judge, I think, threw some light upon the whole doctrine of punishment. "Young man," said he solemnly, "the law does not hang thee for having stolen a sheep, but that sheep might not be stolen."

This points also to the old doctrine of Loyola—so much abhorred—the "end justifies the means." Let me here repeat what I have already said about analogies. They lie above, beneath and around us like snares to the bird, fish or fox. The bird sees an abundant supply of food beneath the hoop, but it sees not the loop that crosses upon it, and conducts it to prison. The fox, with all its cunning, moves cautiously through his accustomed burrows where the trap lies hid. Every bush seems to be removed, and the passage more inviting than usual, but his next step perhaps leads him to imprisonment and death. The unsuspicious fish sees the fly bobbing on the water; sees several hungry companions in haste to make the dainty meal. He darts upon his prey, and is immediately launched upon dry land, a victim of misplaced confidence, cheated out of its life by a thing that resembles a fly—a mere analogy. You must excuse me, but you have yourself urged me to exercise the utmost caution in every case where analogy is used for the purpose of guiding the mind to what seems to be truth, when it frequently proves to be error, fatal and irretrievable. If the fox had hands, he would with a stick have felt cautiously, and spring the trap upon something less sensitive than himself. I must do what the fox cannot do. I must move cautiously, using all my powers to guard against any possible error that may lie hid in the magic circle of analogy; and dearly as I love you, I must be myself, and must not be merged in you. But when I find that each analogy is like lights in a street illuminating a common highway to a common heaven, I shall then boldly enter myself, and when I am once assured that this road and these lights lead from error to truth, from a world of hatred to a world of love; from a partial, narrow, gloomy church to one so impartial that it can exclude none; so wide that it will contain all the races of men; so grandly illuminated that all will not only be visible to each, but that each will become visible to himself. This would then indeed be the holy Catholic Church, the home of all that lives, as it will become the home of all that shall ever live.

FATHER.—And I add, this home, this Church of which you speak, as if you were already in it, or rather, as if it were already in you, has existed since that remote day when the mother could feel that her child was more to her than she was to herself; when her own happiness was swallowed up in the desire to protect and perpetuate happiness in her child, and when the father could face death for the mother and child, both or either, when love demanded everything and took nothing, for even when the life disappeared in defending the love, the love that remained to the ever-living man was worth more than the life that disappeared in the ever-dying unit. The love that was left atoned for the life that was lost. Show me a race of men in all past history who had outlived their love—love of home, love of clan, love of nation, love of man—and I will show you of an instance of the grand and final atonement—an atonement that ends in extinction.

In such a case the Universe becomes ashamed of its progeny and swallows it up. Cut me loose from all that I love, and this life itself is death. Life, even in its grossest forms, would become impossible if there were not some impulse that brought two lives together, in order that the life that is, should merge into the life that is to come. That impulse is love. This, and this alone, atones for life. When love becomes extinct, life will become extinct. But each individual has two outlets from death—the one by the reproduction of their person, the other by the reproduction of their character. The family is to a great extent an institution for the reproduction of both. But in a true Church, man finds the means of begetting principles and of perpetuating them forever, so that as the individual life is absorbed in the family life, and is perpetuated through it, so the character and principles which the highest individuals hold dearer than self—family, country—finds existence, culture, expression perpetually in and through a church.

Here the subjective man finds immortality; here the past speaks to the present, and the present to the future; here a common consciousness finds expression in a common conscience; here the little rill becomes a mighty river; here the aggregate intellect becomes a sun which lights the common mind; here the aggregate love swells and surges until it spouts out. Every barrier to human happiness, and the aggregate wealth flows in involuntary munificence, and flows back in increased beneficence. Here we stand, and with open arms welcome the child as it comes, a fresh contribution of love from the womb. At puberty we accept its promise to work and to serve humanity, to whom all service is due.

Still later we endorse and approve its right to reproduce a better than itself. At this great epoch we recognize it as the purified social unit, the under indissoluble factors of innumerable lives, each to rise higher and higher in the scale of being.

Later still, we welcome in him or her the teacher to illuminate, the guide to lead, the common friend; and when the last scene comes, we close the eye and lay the object back into the objective and place the subject in its true position, the rank of saints. I have not only shown you what the Church is like, but I have tried to tell you what it is. But you can describe nothing as it is, but only as it is related, and this we can only do by analogies. Analogies are then to the mind what crutches are to the lame limbs, substituted by the brain to lengthen the forearm, so that you for a time become a quadruped. And this is but just, for since the brain, in its interest, has robbed the body of two of its feet, why should it not make new feet of wood, and place them under the arm-pits to relieve the two who call for help, or demand the return of their ancient allies to their duty. But the brain, when it takes possession, never surrenders when it once places the man erect, it will never again permit him to crawl. Who ever saw a quadruped use crutches? They do not need them, and therefore cannot invent them. Crutches may be but poor substitutes for legs, but they are substitutes. And if the feet still complain, the brain still refuses to give back the hand, but it sets the hands to work to construct a carriage, and places the whole body in it, and thus the feet become content, because the oppression of which they complained has been considered and removed.

And you, my dear child, at the very moment when you were denouncing analogy as dangerous, invented one and walked on it, and was satisfied with it. You compared a church to a street, lighted at the general expense, because it was applied to the general use. Nothing more beautiful, nothing more appropriate. And let me close by pushing this analogy to the verge.

Who shall enter this Church, lighted by the accumulated wisdom of all ages, enriched by the voluntary contributions of myriads of individuals, adorned by the sublime inspirations of all genius, architect, painter, poet, musician and every branch of art and industry? The priest is but the custodian; I answer in the name of the people, all shall enter! Neither rank, nor wealth, nor virtue nor age shall be reasons for either admission or exclusion; come to share a common love, a common light, a common temple.

D.—I am satisfied, since I am not to merge, but to emerge. I am to love all, to be loved by all. My reason is to be the sacred inner temple, out of which I shall evolve a reason, the aggregate of which will constitute the sole human reason. In this Church I may meet with many who possess but little love and less reason. But, on the other hand, I shall meet with many who will love more than I can repay, and who possess more reason than I now or ever may, therefore I will always receive more than I can give. I enter this temple erect because the brain crowns the person. When within, I find in homage to the past, because we demand, take homage in the future. I accept and adore the present because it is the crown, the glory of all that went before. O society, take me to your heart, use me! O brothers and sisters, come with me and find rest, sympathy, love, in and on this great human heart—the Church of Humanity!

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. IV.

Thomas Paine was a drunkard, a w—e-master and a swindler. This is the testimony of his disciples. And now with a thousand times more charity for you than it is possible for you to exercise for me, I am your friend, Uncle C—B—.

It is all a mistake, friend B., as regards the personal character of Paine, and that thee is honestly mistaken. I will hope, in spite of the almost universal practice of preachers, in speaking of the merits or demerits of those who oppose their holy (?) religion. Ever since Paine came out publicly against Christianity, he has been maligned and vilified by every one who imagined it to be a meritorious act to destroy and annihilate, if possible, all that could in the least hinder or obstruct the cause of the "blessed Savior!"

In reply to a question put to Col. Burr, as to Paine's alleged vulgarity, intemperance and immorality, as disseminated by his political enemy, Cheetham, (and since retailed and magnified by every enemy of Free Thought,) he remarked, with dignity, "Sir, he dined at my table. I always considered Mr. Paine a gentleman, a pleasant companion, a good-natured and intelligent man, and decidedly temperate!" He was generous to a fault; he gave, at one time, his whole year's salary to head a private subscription for the use of the army when public resources failed, "and did more with his pen for liberty than Washington did with his sword," as John Adams himself declared. He wrote his "Age of Reason" to defend natural religion, and in direct opposition to Atheism!

As to his sexual immorality, that also is a falsehood of the pious clan, who hate to acknowledge that there can be any good outside of religion. There is not a thousandth part of the proof that Paine ever had illicit intercourse with any woman, that there is that hundreds of holy, pious, sanctimonious preachers have. Why, scarce a city paper issues a single number which does not contain one or more articles exposing some lecherous Rev., whereas the closest and most careful scrutiny of Paine's whole life, by both friends and enemies, has failed in adducing one atom of proof against him in that line. He was more moral, and more temperate than the majority of the great men of his day.

Being of Quaker descent, and living at a time when Quakerism was fairly puritanic in the rigidity of its morality, is of itself almost absolute proof that he never did, and never could, deserve that vile name which thee applies to him. His life was filled with good deeds, and noble, generous actions. His pen was always wielded in defense of liberty, freedom and morality. He died calmly and peacefully, leaving a fortune of over $11,000, although it is so often said by his pious traducers, that he died in extreme poverty, and suffered untold horrors.

If thee wishes to read more of reliable evidence concerning his virtues and good deeds—judging him by what the first and best men of his own day said of him—I refer thee to the Boston Investigator of Jan. 28th, 1874, containing testimonials to his merits from seven Presidents of the United States, and many other good and trustworthy persons. I could fill pages with accounts of his good deeds, his labors and inventions for the general benefit of his race, but have already given more than enough to prove that, instead of being one of the worst of men, or even mediocre in merit, he was actually as good, if not better, than the fabled Jesus of Nazareth.

As to the abundance of thy charity for me outranking mine for thee, upon what grounds does thee base such an assertion? Remember, I have "been through the mill," and while thee has seen, felt and experienced only one side of the question, I have learned how hard it was to give up cherished theories and loved opinions, that a life-time had interwoven with all my past. I can realize as it is impossible for thee to do, this rending away of one's self from all that has grown so dear, and leaving behind name, fame, reputation, and more than all else, friends, whose love was life itself, and building up a new field upon entirely a new foundation, beginning a new life, and starting all from a new stand-point.

Charity! Why there is no limit to mine for all those who see not and know not the truth! who err daily through ignorance, though with the best of motives. Do I not feel that what men are, depends upon the condition and circumstances of their birth and surroundings, and that to blame them for not being perfect, is to blame what they cannot help? If I was born of wicked, improvident, reckless parents, who could not or would not educate me into knowledge, wisdom or morality, could I help it? Well, ought I not to feel the greatest and broadest charity for all people then, who do not see and know the right? Why I have so little of the feeling of revenge, that had I the power, I would blot out all punishment from the world! I would guide, guard, restrain and confine, but never punish!

My mother always blamed me for my excess of charity, and would often exclaim: "I do believe you would excuse the very Devil!" and Mr. S. often reiterates the same expression, and indeed why not have the greatest of charity for this worst-abused being in existence, granting that he does exist (which, of course, we Infidels deny), for no fate could, by any possibility, be sadder than his—a being all evil—created by a God all good, specially to be bad and to do bad and to make others bad. I really do not know which would be actually needing most of our charity, this God who was so cruel as to make a being so bad, or the vile thing that was so made from no demerit of his own! Respectfully,

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Snowville, Pulaski County, Va.

The New Scriptures,

ACCORDING TO TYNDALL, HUXLEY, SPENCER AND DARWIN.

Genesis—Chapter II.

"1. Primarily the Unknowable moved upon cosmos and evolved protoplasm.

"2. And protoplasm was inorganic and undifferentiated, containing all things in potential energy: and aspirit of evolution moved upon the fluid mass.

"3. And the Unknowable said, Let atoms attract; and their contact begat light, heat and electricity.

"4. And the Unconditioned differentiated the atoms, each after its kind; and their combinations begat rock, air and water.

"5. And there went out a spirit of evolution from the Unconditioned, and working in protoplasm, by accretion and absorption produced the organic cell.

"6. And cell by nutrition evolved primordial germ, and germ developed protogene; and protogene begat oozoon and oozoon begat monad, and monad begat animalcule.

"7. And animalcule begat ephemera; then began creeping things to multiply on the face of the earth.

"8. And earthy atomon-vegetable protoplasm begat the molecule, and thence came all grass and every herb in the earth.

"9. And animalculæ in the water evolved fins, tails, claws and scales; and in the air, wings and beaks, and on the land they sprouted such organs as were necessary as played upon by the environment.

"10. And by accretion and absorption came the radiata and mollusca, and mollusca begat articulata, and articulata begat vertebrata.

"11. Now these are the generations of the higher vertebrata, in the cosmic period that the Unknowable evolved the bipedal mammalia.

"12. And every man of the earth, while he was yet a monkey, and the horse while he was a hipparion, and the hipparion before he was an orodon.

"13. Out of the ascidian came the amphibian and begat the pentadactyle; and the pentadactyle by inheritance and selection produced the hylobate, from which are the simiadae in all their tribes.

"14. And out of the simiadae the lemur prevailed above his fellows and produced the platyrhine monkey.

"15. And the platyrhine begat the catarrhine; and the catarrhine monkey begat the anthropoid ape, and the ape begat the longimanous orang, and the orang begat the chimpanzee, and the chimpanzee evolved the what-is-it.

"16. And the what-is-it went into the land of Nod and took him a wife of the longimanous gibbons.

"17. And in process of the cosmic period were born unto them and their children the anthropomorphic primordial types.

"18. The homunculus, the prognathus, the troglodyte, the autochthon, the terragen: these are the generations of primeval man.

"19. And primeval man was naked and not ashamed, but lived in quadrumanous innocence, and struggled mightily to harmonize with the environment.

"20. And by inheritance and natural selection did he progress from the stable and homogeneous to the complex and heterogeneous; for the weakest died and the strongest grew and multiplied.

"21. And man grew a thumb for that he had need of it, and developed capacities for prey.

"22. For, behold, the swiftest men caught the most animals, and the swiftest animals got away from the most men; wherefore the slow animals were eaten and the slow men starved to death.

"23. And as types were differentiated the weaker types continually disappeared.

"24. And the earth was filled with violence; for man strove with man, and tribe with tribe, whereby they killed off the weak and foolish and secured the "survival of the fittest."

THERE is probably but one woman connected with the Plymouth church or the scandal whom Beecher hasn't kissed—that's Mrs. Beecher. It was a narrow escape, for she, too, might have fallen had she yielded to one of those paroxysmal kisses.

Editors' Notes.

WE SEE Dr. Liess is out with No. 3 of the Free-thinker, and the hope is held out that in the future it will appear more regularly. We hail it with pleasure, and hope it will be fully sustained. The price is so small it is really no tax to any one.

WE HAVE again to ask the indulgence of our contributors whose articles we have been unable to find room for. We have many valued communications on hand which we want to lay before our readers as early as possible. We again ask all to be patient; we are trying to do the best we can.

WE FAILED in our last to notice that our young friend Common Sense of Paris, Texas, has recently doubled its number of pages, and changed its dress somewhat. It is an able, earnest little sheet, and is dealing hard knocks to the errors and follies of the past and present. It is published monthly, at 75 cts. per year. It is still very willing to add names to its list.

THE BRILLIANT Common Sense of San Francisco makes its regular weekly visit to us, and we always find in its clean, bright pages rich and valuable reading. No paper is more ably conducted. Those who wish a portion of Spiritualistic literature blended with Scientific and Liberal matter, should patronize it. We cannot have too much common sense. It is a sixteen-page paper, weekly; price $3 per year.

WE WISH to again call attention to Koch's Patent Binders for THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are well made; the name of the paper is in gold letters on the front; the arrangement for holding the papers securely is perfect, and quickly applied. Those who care to preserve their copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER intact, should have one of these Patent Binders. The postage on them has been doubled, still we will send them at the same price—$1.10. Who next?

ON PAGE 14 we again give our Book List. Owing to the outrageous Postal Law recently enacted by our worse than useless Congress, doubling the postage on papers and books, we have been compelled to raise the amount of postage. This is a necessity, as in many cases the postage will equal the profit we make upon the book. We will be glad at all times to fill orders for books, whether in our List or not, for readers in all parts of the country. "Every little helps."

J. WILLIAMS THORNE, who was so unjustly expelled from the House of Representatives of North Carolina, because his belief was not sufficiently orthodox, and his God was not of the required pattern, has sent us one of his pamphlets—The Great Ecclesiastical Trial—containing sixty-eight pages, and a full account of the disgraceful proceedings, as well as several poems, essays and letters by Mr. Thorne. Thousands who have heard of this case will be glad to read the account in detail, and also to learn Mr. Thorne's theological views. Such can be accommodated. Price twenty-five cents. We have them for sale. Address us, or the author at Ridgeway, N. C.

WE TAKE pleasure in again calling the attention of our readers to the advertisement of our personal friends, G. L. HENDERSON & Co., who are prepared to send to parties in any part of the country any kind of merchandise to be had in this city, and much cheaper than can be purchased in the usual course of trade. Those who have entrusted them with commissions, we learn, have expressed full satisfaction. We will say to our readers that both G. L. Henderson and Hugh Byron Brown are ardent and earnest Liberals, and are justly worthy of your confidence and support. We fully endorse them for their honesty, integrity and punctuality. Read their advertisement again on page 15, and see what they have to offer, and if you want to save money in the purchase of goods just give them a trial.

WE GRATEFULLY acknowledge the sympathy and consideration some of our patrons evince in response to our requests for arrears to be settled, and we hereby thank our kind patrons who have thus responded. A few have expressed a consciousness that we could not in this large city get along without money, and that our expenses must necessarily be heavy. One friend told us, he knew we could not live on "air pudding," and that we required something more tangible and solid.

We wish it were in our power to get up THE TRUTH SEEKER at a less expense, but do not see how we can do it. A certain amount of funds are necessary, and we hope the tax will never be so heavy that the Liberals of the United States will refuse to meet it. Those who can aid us by sending us new subscribers, will confer a favor upon the cause. Every additional name adds to our strength, and will be duly appreciated.

Those to whose notice these pages come, and who are not already patrons, and they approve of the efforts we are making in advancing Science and Free Thought, are requested to come to our aid and to allow us to add their names to our list. The hard times, and, we fear, too much indifference, have induced many to withdraw their support from us, [or, what is just the same, decline to send in their renewals,] and we need new recruits to fill their places. We are resolved to work faithfully to the end, and Friends let us all work together. Every dollar that is sent us helps in diffusing light and truth. We ask not for luxuries or comforts, but the necessary force to keep the machinery running. Fail us not.

Dr. Bland's Lectures.

Dr. T. A. Bland of this city will answer invitations to lecture within two hundred miles of the city of New York on reasonable terms.

His repertoire embraces the following subjects:

1. The Age of Brain.
2. The Victories of Science.
3. The Triumphs of Philosophy.
4. The Science of Society.
5. Plato and Epicurus.

Committees and societies wishing to make an engagement will address T. A. Bland, 11 Clinton Place, New York.

Working for Jesus.

A couple of American blatherskites, Moore and Sankey, are in London preaching in the streets and public places to ignorant assemblages about the terrors of an angry God and a burning hell, and they have succeeded in frightening considerable numbers to the church, and to bow to the priests to escape the eternal fires aforesaid. As a return of the compliment, Mr. Varley of Liverpool, (said to be an uncle to our somewhat notorious townsman, Henry Varley, otherwise called "Reddy the Blacksmith," who a few years ago was arraigned for killing a man in this city,) is now with us, using his best efforts to frighten people into getting religion. Sundays he holds forth in Barnum's Menagerie or Hippodrome among the wild beasts, and nights and days through the week he is haranguing assemblages of little children from six to twelve years of age, and is endeavoring to show them what great sinners they are, and how sad and hopeless their case is unless they succeed in finding Jesus.

He has a stereotype form of presenting his argument for drawing children to the Savior, and presents it upon every occasion. He asks them to suppose there is a great friendship between himself and Queen Victoria, and that she loves him very ardently, but he finally commits a grievous offense against her, and by the laws is doomed to death; but to avert this dire calamity, the Prince of Wales steps forward and suffers death in his place, and thus satisfies the sense of justice of his mother, and at which she is greatly pleased. Mr. Varley then appeals to the children, and asks them if, in that case, he ought not to feel very grateful to the Prince of Wales? He tells them this is just what Jesus has done for them, and calls upon them fervently, to come forward and embrace him, or stand up and acknowledge him. Of course, under such an appeal, little children will rise up for any one who they think has died for them. Then a song closes the bargain, and they are "born again."

Mr. Varley's picture of queenly or divine justice is a little bit abhorrent. What kind of justice would it be in Queen Victoria to become incensed against poor

Varley for doing what he could not help, and exacting his death for the offence, but after, to be willing her own first-born and innocent boy should suffer death in his place? What should we think of the Prince of Wales, who would thus freely sacrifice himself for another, to please his angry mother? And what should we think of Varley, who would thus consent that the innocent boy should be put to death for the crimes that he himself had committed? This is, perhaps, a fascinating illustration of the beauties of Divine justice and the lovely plan of salvation, but we "can't see it."

We are somewhat rejoiced, however, to learn that our Mr. Varley proposes to return to England with his uncle, and join him in the preaching business. He insists he can preach as well as his uncle can, and that it will be so glorious, when he arrives at the gates of heaven, to see ten thousand children flocking there, who come by his agency. What beautiful pictures!

A Touching Letter.

In our issue for Feb. 15th we made a brief appeal to our readers in behalf of a Liberal German Brother who was sick with consumption, too weak to work, no money with which to purchase food for his wife and babe, and no friends to call upon for aid. We had an interview with the party and found him an intelligent man and an ardent Liberal. He was in this city at the time, but afterwards went to Elmira, where his wife has connections.

Our appeal, like most of the appeals we have made, was not immensely successful. A very few responded in small amounts.

A few days ago we received the following sensible letter from his Christian wife, and although not designed for publication we will lay it before our readers:

MY DEAR SIR: I hope you will not think ill of my writing for help to you again. But indeed I am in a very peculiar situation. I wrote you in my last letter that we were living with friends in Elmira, also that they were strict Catholics. I had hoped to receive help from the Liberals but that hope seems to be in vain. I communicated that hope to my friends and they said I would not receive any help from that source. About three weeks ago they told my husband that unless he became a Catholic they would do nothing more for him. Of course if they turned their backs on us we would have been left to starve or go to the poor-house as I am not able to work on account of our child who is only three months old, and very troublesome. I told my husband that the only thing he could do was to say yes and become a Catholic—or indeed the name hypocrite would be better applied, as he is still as firm a Liberal as exists, as you know. I myself am a Catholic, but it tortures me to see him say yes to what he firmly believes to be untrue. I should be very happy were he a Catholic from his own choice, but never from necessity, as I should lose all respect for a man were he to say yes against his conscience. It is hard to think that he must become a hypocrite on his dying bed for the want of a few dollars. If you can do anything no matter how little, I beg of you to do it as soon as possible; it will comfort him in his dying hour to think that he can die a Liberal as he has always been. May you be happy in this life, and if there is a next world, may your portion be there among the select, is the earnest prayer of your supplicator.

MRS. MARY E. ZAMZOW.

Elmira, N. Y.

Please direct all letters to MR. C. A. ZAMZOW, No. 110 West Water street, Elmira, N. Y.

Friends of Liberal thought, is it not hard that in this land of liberty and plenty an honest and decided Liberal should be compelled to deny his firm convictions and even apparently relinquish his principles for the sake of a place to lay his sick body, and the few mouthfuls of food he requires to keep him alive for a few weeks at most, and all for the want of a little help from those who entertain the same belief he does?

Were it in our power, we would gladly contribute to his comfort more than we have been able to do, but our own necessities are such we cannot.

Friends with liberal hearts, those of you who are able to do something for this worthy, needy brother, and feel the disposition to do so, let us urge you not to delay this impulse. The motive is a good one, and the needs great. Let not this man be compelled to forswear his belief in the hour of death for the use of a bed and a moiety of food. We endorse this man's honesty and truthfulness.

Donations may be sent to our care, or directly to the party. Address as above.

A Witness and his God.

BY G. L. HENDERSON.

We had supposed that the time had gone by when the value of evidence in court was made to depend upon the amount of faith a witness might have in any of the existing creeds. But it seems an attorney has still a right to enquire into the speculative opinions of a witness in order to impair his evidence in the minds of a jury, who might happen to hold opinions differing from those of the witness.

But recently a judge of a court in New York City rejected the evidence of Joseph Treat, M.D., because Victoria C. Woodhull declared that he had no belief in a personal God, or in a future Hell for the wicked. And yet Dr. Treat's word is worth more without an oath, than that of the immaculate Victoria, were she to swear upon a stack of Bibles as high as the Andes.

A similar attempt was made, on March 5th, in the District Court of Mower county, Minn. I had taken the witness stand, and was about to take the usual oath, as a witness in the case of McCormick & Co. vs. Henderson & Trask, when R. A. Murray, attorney for plaintiffs, objected to my oath, on the ground that I disbelieved in a God and in future rewards and punishments. Sherman Page, Judge of the court, promptly decided that the evidence should be taken, and the attorney might afterward ascertain whether I had a sufficient amount of orthodoxy to satisfy the jury that I could tell the truth. To test this matter, Mr. Murray, (who was merely doing the best he could for his client,) put the following questions:

"Do you believe in the existence of a God?"

"I do."

"What kind of a God is it?"

"The Universe."

"Do you believe in the Christian Religion?"

"I do not. There is a Christian religion, but it is a mere superstition, as I believe."

"Do you believe in any obligation toward God?"

"I believe in every obligation that binds me to my fellow men and to animals; but I know nothing about the gods."

Here the learned counsel for McCormick & Co. and the Holy Trinity & Co. stopped seemingly well satisfied that his two clients had won their case. That the first would get a judgment against me in this world, and that the other would surely damn me in the next.

Allow me, however, to say, that I am assured that ten out of twelve of the jurors believed the truth of my statement, and gave judgment for McCormick & Co. for just what I had offered to pay his agent in my office, as his just due, and that this same number was in favor of a verdict of "no cause of action," on the ground that the plaintiff should pay the cost of an action where he could have had his money without a suit. The counsel referred, with the utmost complacency, to the enormous wealth of the great reaper builders. He said, "The defendants will have less money when my clients get done with them." I happen to know one of the members of that firm, and I feel assured that, had he heard the evidence, he would not have allowed me to pay one cent of the cost. I do not in this reflect upon the jurors. I think, that after a long and protracted contest, they did the best they could to do justice. The merits of the suit is a matter which does not interest the public at large, but the right of an individual to hold any set of opinions which he may deem the best for him, without being subjected to insult on the witness stand, by every petty attorney, who may set up an inquisition into his private opinions or religious beliefs, is a matter that does, and should, interest every man who claims the right to speak, to think, and to speak freely what he thinks. The Greeks poisoned Socrates because he denied the thirty thousand gods of his time. Christ was crucified because his fellow Jews found him guilty of blasphemy, supposing that he claimed to be a god. Giordano Bruno was burned at the stake, on the 17th day of February, 1600, after two years imprisonment in the dungeon of the inquisition, in the city of Rome, because he affirmed the "Del Infinito Universo e Mondi"—that the Universe was all in all.

In the reign of William and Mary, Robert Aiken, a lad of fifteen years, was hanged at Edinburgh by a mob of Presbyterian clergymen because he pronounced the doctrine of the Trinity an unthinkable, contradictory falsehood. Servetus was burned for preaching what Dr. Channing and Theodore Parker were applauded for uttering to intelligent audiences in the city of Boston. Witches were once hanged at Salem, and Quakers on Boston Common. Now a man who would affirm a belief in witches would be looked upon as an object of pity; and Quakers testify without an oath.

Gen. Cole, in his very able closing plea for the defence, set forth the absurdity of bringing into the courts any questions as to the religious opinions of witnesses. He stated that John Stuart Mill, John Tyndall, Thomas Huxley, and Ralph Waldo Emerson, all held opinions similar to those of the witness, and that it was merely the last remnant of that barbarous and persecuting spirit, which in a former age, poisoned, crucified, or burned philosophers and reformers, hung witches, expatriated Jews, and imprisoned and tortured men and women for the sake of their opinions.

Mr. Murray assured the court and the jury that I was on the God subject insane, and repeatedly declared to the jury that the evidence of a man who did not believe in God Almighty ought to be rejected. "He tells you," said the learned counsel, "that he owes obligations to men and animals; that he would not even cheat a dog, but he says nothing about his obligation to God. Is such a man to be believed under oath?" I hope Mr. Murray will do all he can to get God into the Constitution of the United States, and when once there, let him be described in accurate legal language, giving the color of his eyes, and hair, height and thoracic measurement; whether he parts his hair in the middle and wears a mustache; also as to what kind of clothing he wears, if any; whether he owns real estate, and how much. If clothed, it would be interesting to know whether they are made by a Howe, Wilson, or Singer machine. If he owns a farm, it would be worth while to know whether he prefers a McCormick reaper or a Marsh harvester in cutting his grain. But the most important thing will be to assist a witness how to swear in court, and how to answer proper legal questions put by such attorneys as was employed to defend McCormick & Co. If the legal national God is to be of the Presbyterian type, one in three, and three in one, one of the three Gods having been born by a Jewish maiden in the year one of this era; or whether he is to be of the scientific type, a self-existent Universe, infinite in extent, duration and variation, outside of which there can be no existence. Then the person and attributes of God will be definitely known and legally defined, and when a person is asked on the witness stand, what his God is, he can describe him according to the "Official Regulation," and his evidence will be received at par. In some respects, the orthodox God and the scientific one are alike, but they also differ very materially. They say God is everywhere present. So is the Universe, (at least I will swear that I have always found a Universe where ever I have been). They say that God has always existed. So has the Universe, at least I will swear that it has existed as far back as I can remember. They say that God is unchangeable and never varies. So is not the Universe, for it is infinite in its power of variation, and never reproduces the same form, so far as I have been able to observe. They say the second person of the Godhead was born of a virgin, making him an Anthropomorphic God. I will swear that so far as I know, every plant, animal and virgin has come from the Universe, and gone back to it.

Let us then have a strictly legal regulation God, or forbid forever all attempts at meddling with the religious opinions of any person, either in the courts or as a test of qualification, either for office, veracity or virtue. When a man or woman is so unfortunate as to possess an organization predisposed to crime, it matters little what his creed may be. If the Orthodox "regulation" creed affirmed that there were three hundred gods all in one, and every god had to be born by three separate and distinct virgins, and yet but one virgin, the ignorant and credulous would accept it, if they were promised heaven for accepting and hell for rejecting. But crime would not cease. Rape, murder, perjury, and war would continue under one form of superstition as well as another. And when a man or woman has an organism predisposed to virtue, and is possessed of a mind capable of rational enquiry and logical reasoning, he may disbelieve in ghosts, witches, angels, devils, gods, and yet be truthful, honest, chaste, humane; for by his very nature, he would feed the horse that plows his field, and caress the dog who watches his house, or rescues his drowning child. How much more must he love his wife and child who are bound to him by all that is good and noble in the nature of man. This is what is meant by "obligation to men and animals."

[From Shaker and Shakeress.]

BERLIN, N. J., Jan. 26th, 1875.

DEAR FRIEND EVANS: For several years past I have desired to write an article for the Shaker and Shakeress, on the position of Christ in relation to war, but you have so many better writers within your own society, I have thought you would not care about communications from so imperfect an outsider as myself. I will, however, send you a few lines and you can do with them as you think best.

During the late terrible war, nearly all the ministers in this nation preached war as a Christian duty. Their texts were always the words of Christ, where he commanded his disciples to take swords. Had they understood the true meaning of that command, instead of its favoring war it would have been a most emphatic and decided testimony against war. When he sent forth his apostles to preach, he commanded them to take neither gold, silver, brass, purse or scrip, nor two coats apiece, and at the same time told them he sent them even as sheep among wolves, and that they should have power over all devils.

Now, if swords are necessary for protection, by whom could they be needed more than by people who go as sheep in the midst of wolves? If Christ believed in war, why did he not arm them then? What was the sequel? Why, they went forth as he had commanded, and a divine power went with them and opened the hearts of certain classes to supply the wants, and the same divine power restrained the wolves, their enemies, so that no one could lay hands on them. They needed no swords, though like sheep among wolves, for the Lord God of Hosts was as a wall of fire about them.

When they returned he said unto them, "Lack ye any thing?" and they replied: "No, nothing." He said to them, "Take swords, and he that hath no sword, let him sell his coat and buy one." They answered, "Here are two, and he told them they were enough. If his intention was to fight, would he have expected to conquer all that would come against him with two swords? Nay, verily. He had no intention of fighting. The same scripture declares that he knew his hour had come. Why then did he want swords? For the purpose of bearing a final and decisive testimony against war by showing that though armed he would not permit his disciples to fight. If his disciples had no swords people might have questioned whether he would not have fought if he had been armed. But having swords and forbidding his disciples to use them, even to save his own life, was a testimony that none need doubt nor mistake. Yet the blind leaders of the blind, who with their followers are all wallowing in the filth of their own lusts, have taken this last testimony of Christ against war, plain and simple as it is, and made it mean just the opposite of what Christ intended, so that in the late war were seen people who professed to be the followers of the Prince of Peace, mangling and destroying each other. Orthodox arrayed against Orthodox, Methodists against Methodists, and so on through a hundred different sects, all arrayed against each other, all praying to the same imaginary War Demon for success against each other, while priests all over the nation were shouting, "Christ commands his disciples to take swords, and therefore it is the duty of Christians to mangle and kill those who never harmed them, at the beck of ungodly demagogues, to preserve a Union that each generation has a right to dissolve."

Your Friend, J. HACKETT.

Friend Hacker is right—and wrong—right, in his idea that war is wrong—wrong, in his idea that Jesus and the apostles were infallible in judgment, perfect in knowledge, and that the Protestant Bible is the word of God, a finality.

Jesus and the apostles were all born Jews—born of Jewish women, and educated by them, under the Mosaic Law, and traditions then existing.

John, the Baptist, and his disciples had a similar schooling.

Jesus was over thirty, when he began a new departure, under influences, coming from far above all heavens, ever known to the Jews, and from spheres, into which David had not yet ascended.

Tilton has borne strong testimony to the fact, that early imbibed theological ideas have a tremendous power of coercion on the soul.

Jesus and his disciples, like Ann Lee and her disciples, were converts to the missionary labors of the Christ spirit, who came to introduce, to humanity, a New Order—the Resurrection.

By the Law, was the knowledge of the sins of the flesh, in the marriage relation. It taught use, not indulgence, of the reproductive forces. Under that law, Jesus and his disciples could attend weddings. In Christ, they ceased to marry, and to attend marriages. They neither bought nor sold, private property. If they used war power, in the temple, it was white under the inspiration of the God of the house, for the purpose of restoring that house to its normal condition, as a Jewish temple. There was no Christianity about the temple, nor any Christian services performed therein.

The Christ spirits impressed Jesus that he had been transgressing.

Calvin Green, a deeply-inspired man, claimed that Jesus himself put the sword into the hands of the Jews, by which they took his life.

Is it not quite as simple to admit, that when Jesus and his disciples armed themselves with two swords, they anticipated spirit assistance, similar to what they received when clearing the temple? that the Christ spirit withdrew from them? Hence the exclamation, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me!!!"

This accords with the present light of the writer of this article, for which none other is responsible, accountable or accusable.—Ed. Shaker and Shakeress.

B. F. UNDERWOOD will speak at White Hall, Ill., March 30th to April 4th, inclusive.

Chillicothe, Mo.,	April 6, 7 and 8
Ottumwa, Iowa,	April 10, 11 and 12
Mt. Pleasant, Iowa,	April 13, 14 and 15
Oskaloosa, Iowa,	April 17 and 18
Toledo, Iowa,	April 19, 20 and 21

His next engagements are at Osceola, Red and Sidney, Iowa; Lincoln, Neb.; St. Joseph, Mo.; and Paola and Columbus, Kansas.

THE fanatics and Infidels of one generation become the heroes and philanthropists of the next.—S. H. Haywood.

TYNDALL now stands at the flood-mark of scientific investigation, and must bear the surging of every tide.—S. H. Haywood.

Did Christ Exist?

MR. EDITOR: D. Winder [in the R. P. Journal] wants a more refined literature for Spiritualism. Does he give it to us in his article on "Bible Spiritualism," in Vol. XIX. No. 21, where he says: "I recognize that Christ existed with God as his only begotten son before time began, and that he was the medium or agent in the production of the material Universe," etc. If this be "refined Spiritual literature," it is so ethereal that I can't see it. The expression, "before time began," is very definite. Will Brother Winder tell us what the condition or state of the Universe was "before time began"? and when did time begin? It cannot be that any part of the human race were in existence before time began, or did Christ exist with God before he was born?

Let us have the proof that Christ existed with God before time began; we want tangible, positive proof, not the orthodox proof that is found in a book. (N. B. Spiritualists will not be satisfied with the testimony of the witness himself, or of his apostles; that testimony is too "far-fetched," if not "dear bought.") Were there any suns, or moons or stars in existence "before time began"? And what particular hitch took place in the Universe that produced the birth of time? I am anxious to know. I had always supposed that orthodox Christians were the only people that believed in this notion of the great antiquity of Jesus Christ; but it seems that some professed leading Spiritualists cannot throw off their early religious ideas, but must try to make "Revelation and Spiritualism harmonize," as if it were necessary to make the fundamental doctrines of one philosophy harmonize with the jargon of the Bible. M.

Atheism and Morality.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

Belief in a God, together with a belief in future rewards and punishments, it is said, is the only true foundation of morality, and is absolutely necessary to prevent the world from becoming a Pandemonium. Atheism, we are told, destroys the moral responsibility of man and extinguishes every guarantee of virtue. "Virtue with immortality expires," says the poet Young.

But it is very certain that belief in one or more gods neither insure us sound principles of moral action, nor conscientious practice of precepts which, in any age, make up the established, recognized, moral code. The history of the world attests that religion and morals, in principle have nothing in common. Epicurus, one of the most Atheistic of ancient philosophers, was, according to the concurrent testimony of a host of writers of antiquity, one of the most abstemious and virtuous Athenians of his day, even though aversion to his teachings has caused his name to be proverbialized for general licentiousness; and of Lucretius, the Atheistic poet as well as philosopher, Mr. Frothingham says, "Few nobler minds have lived, not many as noble," while on the other hand, "David, the sweet singer of Israel, the darling of theologians, the man who has been extolled for his faith and piety by many millions of tongues, was morally a very bad man, a liar, an adulterer and bebauchee, a cruel conqueror who tortured prisoners of war and a murderer.

Max Muller, in his "Science of Religion," says "the fact cannot be disputed away that the religion of Buddha was from the beginning purely Atheistic. The idea of the Godhead, after it had been degraded by endless mythological absurdities which struck and repelled the heart of Buddha, was for a time at least, entirely expelled from the sanctuary of the human mind, and the highest morality that was ever taught before the rise of Christianity, was taught by men with whom the gods had become mere phantoms, and who had no altars, not even an altar to the unknown God."

It was the opinion of Lord Bacon that "Atheism leaves men to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all which may be guides to an outward moral virtue, though religions were not; but superstition dismounts all these and erecteth an absolute monarchy in the minds of men. Therefore Atheism never did perturb states, for it makes men wary of themselves, as looking no further, and we see the times inclined to Atheism (as the times of Augustus Caesar) were in civil times, but superstition hath been the confusion of many states and bringeth in a new primum mobile that ravisheth the spheres of government."

Theodore Parker, a zealous opponent of Atheism, says of Atheists, "They seem to be truth-loving and sincere persons, conscientious, just, humane, philanthropic and modest men. They are men who mean to be just to their nature and their whole nature. They are commonly on the side of man, as opposed to the enemies of man; on the side of the people against the tyrant; they are, or mean to be, on the side of truth, of justice and love. I think they are much higher in their moral and religious growth than a great many men who are always saying to God, 'I go, sir,' and never stir. These are men who have made sacrifice to be faithful."

If the belief in God were so salutary in a moral point of view, its good effects should be in proportion to the universality and intensity of the belief. When has it been stronger or more general than during the ages that followed the establishment of Christianity; yet what scenes of horror and what spectacles of depravity the world presented during that reign of faith. Of the Byzantine empire Mr. Lecky says, "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly despicable form that civilization has yet assumed."

There has been no other enduring civilization so absolutely destitute of all the forms of greatness, and none to which the epithet mean may be so emphatically applied. The Byzantine empire was pre-eminently the age of treachery. Its vices were the vices of men who had ceased to be brave, without learning to be virtuous."

Surely belief in God did very little for morality in those days. To-day, if we go among the lower classes—the ignorant, the vicious, the depraved, the outcasts of society, we do not find them Atheistic; but on the contrary, these classes are composed of the strongest believers in a God, and are the first at the approach of death, to avail themselves of the advantages which religion holds out.

Morality depends not for its existence or support upon the supernatural. It is founded on the relations which exist between men. Its object is the happiness of man—not the glory of God. And we must look to secular and not to religious agencies for the improvement of man, morally as well as intellectually and physically.

Jerrie's Release.

A FABLE, BY A. O. GENUNG.

One day as I passed by the bright gilded cage,
Where my little brown thrush sat silently swinging,
I ventured to ask, just my thoughts to engage,
"My birdie, why are not you sweetly singing?"
Strange, strange to relate, yet no more so than true,
My pet soon directed his glances at me
And said: "My dear master, I'll tell you
Why I am so remiss in my minstrelsy.

"O poor little me! O poor little me!
I languish in prison all day long,
My happy mates no longer I see,
Then how can I sing my gladsome song?
I am kept here to mourn throughout all the long year,
Far away from my friends, in a dismal goal,
With none to condole with me; none to give ear
When I grieve for the fields where no dangers assail.

"How well I remember my mother's warm nest,
Where, heedless of storms and windy weather,
All shielded from harm by her soft downy breast,
I lay with my brothers and sisters together.
O how sad is my lot; so many long hours
Have passed since that day—they are ages to me—
I fear that the grass, and the bees and the flowers
Will no longer be there, should I ever go free.

"At night, when I sit in my lonely cell,
How often I visit my comrades in dreams,
And again with my dear mother's brood I dwell
In woodlands where murmur their swift running streams.
Ah me! could I soar with my dear mates once again,
With my boisterous mates—which can only atone
For imprisonment here—I would never remain
To sharpen my bill on cuttle-fish bone.

"Ah well, if I thought that man's happiness lies
In crushing the weak, and in aiding the strong,
I would never protest if the birds should arise
And unite to prevent such a terrible wrong.
I know of no bird, be he ever so bad,
Who would build him a cage and imprison therein
A poor butterfly, to grieve lonely and sad,
And mayhap to die; it would be such a sin.

"I wonder if in the wide world there can be
One so lonely as I, one so cheerless and sad.
O why do they not show more pity for me,
And send me away to be happy and glad?
O poor little me! O poor little me!
I sigh for the branches all day long,
And never a grub nor a worm do I see,
Then how can I sing my favorite song?"

As my poor little Jerry—for that was the name
I had long ago christened him—ceased to speak,
My heart was sore troubled with feelings of shame,
As I saw a great tear trickle down his brown cheek.
You can guess what I did! I told Jerry to go,
And to prove my sincerity, opened the wicket;
When with joy, that none but freed prisoners know,
He bade me farewell and was lost in the thicket.

Now the moral of all my sad story is this:
In living my life, I have learned one thing;
If in acts toward others, you would not be remiss,
Give to all his just rights, be he peasant or king.
And boys, if any there be who read this,
Never steal the poor birds, neither robin nor wren,
For none but the vicious would rob them of bliss
They enjoy when at large; and bad boys make bad men.

An Illinois Letter.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Perhaps a few words from this region may be of some interest to your readers; and as we have lately been enjoying a small ripple of religious excitement in this community, it affords an opportunity and subject for a few thoughts of interest to Liberals. This community is strictly orthodox, with the exception of about a dozen, more or less, of Liberal thinkers. The saints lately became frightened at the progress and boldness of the few Liberals here who have the courage to investigate and question the dogmas of the holy (?) church of Jesus; and last week a gentleman of the cloth, under the name of Prof. Hamlin of McEndry College in this State, appeared among us, and it was announced that he would lecture or preach at the C. P. church on Saturday evening, Sunday and Sunday evening.

I attended on Saturday evening—having previously learned that he would discourse upon the resurrection of Christ. The Rev. began by asserting that all Infidels, etc., admit that Christ lived, was crucified and buried, and that all Infidels, etc., admit that the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John were written by the men whose names they bear, both of which assertions all Infidels and all other persons who have read the Liberal literature (or a tenth part of it,) know to be untrue. We do not all admit that Christ lived and died, nor that those gospels were written by those men, as the gentleman stated.

During the course of his argument, (I mean his discourse, for it was no argument,) he referred to the passage in the writings of Josephus, as evidence in favor of Christ, when all intelligent persons know that passage is a forgery, which has been often and clearly shown to the world, not by Infidels only, but by Christians themselves—Dr. Lordner and Prof. Bellamy, Christian historians.

The same Professor attended Sunday-school at the same church the next day, and in the course of his instructions to one of the classes, he remarked, (in answer to a question on one of the so-called miracles conflicting with the laws of nature,) "There are no such things in existence as the laws of nature."

Such an assertion needs no comment from any one, for it does not even rise to the dignity of nonsense, and is as innocent of truth as some of the accounts of miracles in the Bible. This assertion came from a Professor of a college in this State, in this Nineteenth Century; such teachers as this bigoted ignoramus have kept the world in darkness in past ages, and prevent progress still. C. J.

Vienna, Ill., Feb. 18th, 1875.

Labor Reform.

The late war tended to demoralize the community more than any event that ever happened to us. Huge fortunes came out of it as if by magic, and a great impetus was given to general extravagance, "putting on style," and shirking work. Peddling and agencies of all kinds, so one can live "respectably," with as little labor as possible, have taken the place of learning a trade and working at it. We have too many non-producers, and yet from our defective financial and business arrangement, even skilled workmen wander around in idleness.

The great aim of this generation is wealth, no matter how acquired; and, failing to reach this, no one wants to stop short of "respectability;" said respectability consisting, not in being an ordinary "working-man," however estimable, but something better paid and more regarded by the community. For it is a notorious fact, that the working classes are held in about as little estimation by their employers as the late Southern slaves were by their masters.

This is a natural consequence of the division of society into separate classes, some inferior to the others, the dividing line being pecuniary, and having no relation whatever to personal qualities. The "master" to-day was in most cases only the "man" yesterday; but to leave the men and rise among the masters seems generally to revolutionize the whole nature, giving new eyes, a new heart, new opinions and creating a new being. Human nature, like everything else, is governed by conditions and surroundings.

This is a country of free schools and newspapers. Education and enlightenment penetrate in degree everywhere. It is this education and enlightenment which is constantly seeking for higher and better social conditions than is the lot of the general agriculturist and working class. It manifests itself in granges and trades-unions. The "lower classes" are crowding the upper ones, and clamoring for a greater share of the general wealth.

Now, as there must be a natural limit to the number of non-producers, as well as to the patience of those whose labor produces everything and supports all, it is plain that there must ultimately come a struggle between those up and those down. Those down must be kept down by "strong governments," and the republic fail, or the up must enter into equitable arrangements that will gradually obviate all, and ultimately merge all classes into one great producing and distributing community where all have equal interests and a sufficiency of everything. The working classes are no longer a brutal and ignorant mob, but all capable of reasoning and being reasoned with.

As a people, we must go backward or forward.

Modern discoveries and appliances prevent retrogression, so forward we must go, driven by the inexorable necessities of progress and development. Forward to what? More wealth for the masses, with better conditions and surroundings! The ancient way to acquire wealth was:

"That they shall take who have the power,
And they shall keep who can."

And this primitive mode is not yet out of fashion, but accomplished by chicanery what was once done by force. But it is plain, from the contingencies of the case, that existing accumulations must be divided by anarchy and force, as has always happened in political conquests, or some means must be devised to create a new share for those without anything. The advantages of the latter course, for all sides cannot be questioned. To divide would be to destroy. To create a new share benefits all.

But how shall this new share be created? How shall existing capital and labor come in contact, not in war, but in peace? What steps shall be taken to enlarge or double our annual productions, with a more equitable division of them? We lack no ingredient of power. We have abundance of labor and food, exhaustless raw material, and an indefinite but adequate amount of fixed capital in the shape of mills and manufactories of all kinds. No nation on earth is so favored in every particular. Shall the selfishness and greed of the few stand in the way of justice to the many, as has always been the case heretofore, establishing despotisms to support its aristocracies? or have we, as a new people, with a new form of government, as yet acquired new light for the settlement of industrial and social questions?

J. F. BRAY.

New-York Liberal Club.

MARCH 12TH, 1875.

Physiology of the Skin.

By PROF. CHARLES HEITZMANN, M.D., late of Vienna.

In the previous lectures I gave here I considered the skin as an organ of protection, of excretion, of absorption and respiration. We will now take a view of the most intricate performances of our general covering.

Every particle of the skin is endowed with life except the epidermal formation; namely, the upper layers of the epidermis, the hair and fat-globules in the sub-cutaneous tissues. The whole body is built up by a highly complicated matter or protoplasm; single lumps of which we find, for instance, in infusions or suspended in the blood, and are called colorless blood corpuscles. We may put a drop of blood from the living frog or newt on the slide and cover it with a thin glass, the edges of which have been oiled for the purpose of preventing evaporation; frogs and newts being cold-blooded animals, we are able to study the life of their colorless blood corpuscles in a room of moderate temperature, while we have to heat the specimen when taken from a mammal or man until it reaches 90° or 100°.

The first thing we observe under the microscope is that a lump of protoplasm changes its form by putting forth hyaline flaps or small off-shoots, sometimes one, sometimes several, and varying in shape. During such change of form, the net-work representing the living matter becomes narrower in the central part of the lump, while, on the contrary, the peripheral parts become protuded, apparently, by the pressure of the invisible fluid contained in the mesh-work of the living matter. That however this fluid actually does exist, although it is not perceivable, can be proved, when foreign bodies or particles of food are imbedded in the protoplasm, which float to and fro in the midst of the same during the change of form of the living lump.

The motion belonging especially to the living matter is called contraction, and is essentially the same, as well in the amoeba as in the colorless blood corpuscle of beast or man, or in the apparatus known as muscles. The visible effects of this motion are the increase of the granules forming the knots of the net work, shortening of the uniting threads of the same, and therefore the narrowing of the meshes filled with what we then term "protoplasmic fluid."

The next phenomenon observed is the creeping of the lump. This creeping can be seen in the same manner on amoeba, or colorless blood-corpuscle, on pus-elements and on corpuscles which are suspended in our saliva. When one of the protuded offshoots of the protoplasm sticks to the surface of the glass, there is a fixed point, toward which the whole lump is dragged after, when the contraction of the living matter ceases. It is evident that during such a contraction, certain fluid parts can be pressed out from the interior of the lump, and this may form the simplest appearance of the process termed "secretion." The result of the same is the production of an almost watery fluid, in which different chemical substances are held in solution.

If we add with care a drop of water to the drop of blood, we observe phenomena similar to those that are produced by the application of the electric current. The contraction of the living matter leads to the protrusion of large hyaline flaps, which do not disappear, but by and by become enlarged and separated from the principal lump. The separated present structureless globules which become solved and form the secretion termed "mucus." In this jelly-like fluid there are suspended many of the remains of the lumps of protoplasm, though diminished in size and mutilated.

Under certain circumstances the living matter itself undergoes changes which lead to the formation of fat. The fat globules are transformed particles of living matter, which first adhere by means of delicate, slender threads to the neighboring net work, but afterwards become separated and float in the protoplasmic fluid. From the latter they became pressed out by the contraction of the remaining living matter, and these are suspended in a watery fluid, giving to the same a cloudy, milky appearance. This process leads, for instance, to the production of milk, and can be considered as a third kind of secretion, in which the transformed living matter is mixed with evacuated protoplasmic fluid.

You might ask me, ladies and gentlemen, if all this is not mere imagination, speculation and hypothesis, or whether these statements are based on facts? Let me assure you these are all true facts, direct observations, indeed, the results of the work of many years of careful investigation and study by the best and most trustworthy naturalists. These facts can be easily demonstrated, as well as how the formation of the sweet fluid called milk goes on, which is used with pleasure by most people without the knowledge of its origin.

We come next to the secretion, called "perspiration." The sweat-glands lay almost on the borders between the cutis and the sub-cutaneous tissue; they are simple tubes which form coils on the surface of the skin with funnel-shaped openings. The blood vessels of these glands are mostly small arteries, so that the fluid coming in contact with the epithelium of the sweat-gland, belongs in the greater part to the arterial blood, like in the kidneys; and indeed there is some similarity in the secretions of the two organs.

The perspiration is a fluid of an acid re-action, consisting in a great degree of water, which contains the less solid parts in solution. The salts are solved in the same which exist in the organism, as well as fat-acids, which are more to be smelled than analyzed. In perspiration are also found urea and ammonia, but not constantly uric acid; mostly in the perspiration of individuals suffering from gout. Peculiar to this excretion is sometimes a blue, staining substance, namely, indigo, which gives a bluish tint. The perspiration is secreted in the form of single, sticky drops, as during the agony of death or severe pain and anxiety. It is asserted that such perspiration is of an alkaline reaction. How this sticky perspiration originates is not known, but Brucke, of Vienna, thinks it is a fluid which fills up the tube in a state of rest when no secretion takes place in the gland and is pressed out from the tube itself. Another theory is, that under the influence of intense excitement of the nervous system many of the epithelial elements evacuate their contents into the fluid and cause the denser consistence of the perspiration.

The largest sweat-glands are to be found in the armpits, and these are provided in their extensive layers with numerous muscle-fibres. The secretion of these is very different from the perspiration of other parts, as perceivable by the sense of vision and smell.

The quantity of perspiration varies in different individuals in different parts of the body under the same circumstances. Some portions of the body are more favored by a profuse perspiration than others, and these portions consequently have to be better protected, because a good deal of our healthy condition depends on the easy and uninterrupted performance of transpiration. Reinhard asserts that cheeks produce most of the perspiration, somewhat less the palmar surface of the hands, and least of all, the forearms. The quantity of perspiration depends, first, upon the action of the nerves. Under an excited or depressing influence of the nervous system, the quality of the perspiration becomes changed, and the same is the case with its quantity. Anxiety, fear, accidents increase our perspiration suddenly in a remarkable manner. Students going to a rigorous examination, and soldiers going into battle for the first time, very often suffer from greatly increased perspiration. Brown-Sequard and Barther produced an increase of perspiration on the cheeks by putting irritating matters on the surface of the tongue. On the other hand, Goltz of Strasburg, proved by many careful experiments, that the section of a sensitive nerve causes dilution of the blood-vessels at their peripheric distributions, explaining it thus, that there follows a paralysis, but on the contrary, an increased activity of the nerves, causing a dilution of the vessels, and hence a highly increased temperature in the parts supplied by them. Such a dilation of the blood-vessels can easily be produced in a direct way after a temporary contraction of the same by means of cold applications, which are left remaining on the skin for a time, and the evaporation of which is prevented by waterproof coverings; and further, by hard work imposed on the muscles, as for instance, in riding on horseback, in working with the shovel, and in gymnastic exercises.

Perspiration is augmented, secondly, by the use of certain meats, exciting beverages, such as spirits, tea, coffee, hot water and certain drugs. These are often used as remedies for the purpose of producing perspiration in diseases in which a profuse discharge of the sweat-glands can be taken as a sign of recovery. It is always a bad symptom when perspiration cannot be produced. It is well known perspiration reaches its highest activity during digestion.

The quantity of perspiration is much influenced by the temperature of the surrounding atmosphere. It takes place in the easiest way when the temperature is high and the air very dry. If the temperature of the atmosphere is high even, but loaded with moisture the perspiration is much prevented. It is a remarkable fact that the increase of the heat of the body never surpasses 120° or 140° of Fahrenheit, even when the temperature of the surrounding medium has been raised to 200° and more. This is stated to place also by experiments on animals; if the temperature of the surrounding air reaches a degree sufficient to cause death in a short time.

A wrong impression prevails about the beneficial effect of profuse sweating. By the enforced irritation of the skin, usually a greater activity of the heart takes place, and this is the cause why those fond of exaggerated cold bathing never attain a very old age, being liable to a dilation of the heart just in the same way as in the case of persons who take too much muscular exercise; as gymnasts. Although muscular exercise, as well as cold bathing, is conducive to health, if immoderately used they shorten life.

The weight of the body can be very rapidly diminished by profuse perspiration. Exact experiments on this subject have been made by Southwood Smith on the stokers of gas-works. He ascertained that the maximum loss of weight of men who worked in a very high temperature for a period varying between forty-five minutes and seventy-five minutes ranged between three pounds and five pounds and two ounces; the greater loss occurring in a warm, clear and somewhat windy day the lesser on a cold and foggy day. The same is the case with jockies who have to attain a certain light weight before they engage in horse racing. A person, for instance, weighing 140 pounds will in three or four days reduce his weight to 120 pounds, simply by very active exercise several hours daily. Such a forced reduction in weight becomes sometimes very dangerous and in some instances produces death.

ERASMUS WILSON remarks, that the secretion of perspiration is alone modified by the greater or less activity of the other secretions, particularly of the lungs and kidneys, the functions of these organs being frequently vicarious with the skin, and vice versa; thus during the Summer, and in warm climates, the perspiratory secretion is augmented, while the exhalation from the lungs and the activity of the kidneys are diminished, while in the Winter and in cold climates the reverse is the case. On leaving a warm room, especially after indulging in stimulants, for the cold air, a sudden check is given to the cutaneous function, while that of the kidneys is suddenly and actively called into exercise.

Peculiar formations are the beautiful acinous glands on the eye-lids, termed the meibomian glands, which secrete the oil for the protection of the eye, and the ceruminous glands in the external auditory canal, which produce the waxy matter protecting the organ of hearing. It is remarkable that the latter are constructed like the sweat glands, and notwithstanding produce fat.

Another function of the skin remains for our consideration; namely, sensation. Already a superficial consideration of living organism is enough to show there are two different action of nerves, one by which the impressions coming from the outer world will be perceived and cause sensation; the other by which the motor apparatus, namely the muscles, will be excited for the purpose of producing motion. By the excellent and nearly contemporaneous investigations of Chas. Bell and Magendie, we learned to distinguish two kinds of nerves—those that minister to sensation and others to motion. We are not to imagine that the nerves so different in their functions are constructed in an essentially different manner; only the direction in which the conducting of irritating impulses goes on is different; namely so, that the sensitive nerves leads the impression from the periphery toward the center, while the motor nerves lead the same from the center toward the periphery. Besides the motor impulses there can also be conducted from the center toward the periphery other ones, such as impulses in glows, called secretory nerves. Furthermore, we know prohibitory nerves which prevent motion by being irritated, and finally trophic nerves for the regulation of the nutrition of the organs. The assertion that such regulating nerves exist is based on the fact that certain skin diseases strictly follow the region of the ramification of certain nerves, and moreover the disease itself is caused sometimes by lesions of certain nerve-fibres.

Not all the nerves leading impulses from the periphery toward the center are simply nerves of sensation. There exists nerves with a specific faculty of conducting; for instance, the nerves of vision, those of hearing, of smelling, of taste, and of the sense of touch; moreover, nerves serving for conducting general sensation. We do not know whether there exist in fact such different kinds of nerve-fibres, or whether only the irritations that act on the same nerves are so different. It is not yet explained whether the sensation of warmth and cold, that of different temperatures is conducted by the same nerves which serve to the sense of touch, or whether there exist really different nerves for touching and perceiving different temperatures. I mention all these nerves because they are assumed to be present in our skin, and moreover certain appearances compel us to believe in the presence of the so-called reflex nerves, which conduct impressions from the periphery towards the centre, and then excite motor secretory actions as first demonstrated by Marshall Hall. When we touch the membrane covering the surface of our eye-lids and eyes, the eye-lids are closed immediately; after a slight irritation of the mucus membrane of the nose, then follows sneezing; and after irritation of the skin, scratching with our hands, entirely without the influence of our will, even during sleep. I also mentioned that a reflex secretion of the sweat-glands can also be observed.

Each and every nerve-fibre may conduct the irritation applied on the same by mechanic, thermic or chemical influences toward the center, to wit: the brain and spinal cord; but in the latter organs the irritation proceeds by the way of the motor or reflex nerve-fibres. The sensation itself is not localized on one point of the sensible nerves, but always radiates toward periphic distribution of the same; even our imagination itself is sufficient to produce sensation, when the periphic distribution of the nerves is wanting. The man who lost a limb, very often feels intense pain in the toes or in the foot after these having been removed. Some persons can tell beforehand the advent of good or bad weather by such feelings. Similar observations were also made on noses, which after their loss were newly formed out of the skin of the forehead. When such a newly-transplanted nose is touched, the sensation originates as if the forehead were touched. Later such newly-formed nose loses entirely the capacity of sensation and finally gets it again with the right impression of touch, apparently because the neighboring nerves enter the transplanted flap of the newly-formed organ. On these facts is based a funny anecdote. A man accustomed to shaving himself while bathing, once chanced to faint while the razor was in his hand and unfortunately cut off his nose with the same, and by falling one of his toes was also singularly severed. The surgeon being immediately called in, and by means of sutures the bit of the toe was fixed to the face and the nose to the foot. Now this unhappy man suffered from a corn on his nose, and in damp weather having "caught a cold," was compelled to take off his boot to "blow his nose."

The sense of touch, although dispersed on the whole surface of our body, varies considerably in intensity in different parts. Of course it can be refined to a high degree, as we observe, for instance, in blind people who are enabled to spell, and play cards by the aid of their sense of touch. An example is known of a blind sculptor who touched a statue and copied it with admirable accuracy. The finest sense of touch exists in the points of the fingers, especially the second finger, which is often the index or pointing finger for the other organs of sense.

Besides the sense of touch in the skin, there is located another sense, which assists to feed our own body—the so-called "general sense," to the perception of which belongs, for instance, the sensation of pain, of titillation, of shudder, of chill, of malaria, etc. It is possible the sensation of titillation is a special perception of touch, and appears when the nerves of touch are slightly and successively irritated, or different groups of nerves are irritated one after the other. The sensation of pain seems to belong, according to the views of Johannes Muller of Berlin, to the intense irritation of the nerves of sensation which provide the skin, besides those of the sense of touch. This is proved in diseases where the sense of feeling is entirely lost, and notwithstanding a tolerably good sense of touch remained. These observations were carefully made by Vieusseux, a physician of Geneva, on his own body. The same is the case with the sensation of cold and warmth, which can be lost without the loss of the sensation of touch. The reason why we feel cold or warm, depends, however, not alone on the temperature of the surrounding medium, but very much on occurrences in the whole organism. In certain fevers, especially in that termed purulent infection or pyæmia, the patient feels terribly chilled, to such a degree that he rattles his teeth and trembles all over his body, notwithstanding the thermometer shows a very high elevation of the temperature of the skin.

The question was once raised, whether we possess a sixth sense, belonging to the skin, namely, that of perception without direct contact of an irritating agent. Spellanzani, an Italian naturalist, observed that bats, even in a perfectly dark room, get out the way of obstacles, never touching them with their wings. He deprived the flitter-mice of their eyes, and proved that they were enabled to keep clear of obstacles placed in their way with the same cleverness as before, as for instance, not touching threads extended across a room during their flitting. The existence of a sixth sense of perception does not follow from these perfectly reliable observations, because our nerves of the skin are enabled to perceive the radiating rays of objects, without direct contact, as for instance, the rays of warmth coming from the fire-place. That such perceptions can be felt by animals only, and never by man, is a matter of course; but is it not surprising to observe the fineness of the eyes of an eagle, the subtlety of the sense of smelling in dogs? Thus it may be that the sense of touch is much more developed in flitter-mice than in other animals.

Finally, let me say a few words about the general nutrition of our skins. The blood-vessels play surely the greatest role in providing the same with nourishing material, and they are subject to the regulating influences of the nerves. The skin of the face becomes suddenly red in anger and suddenly pale in fear. How could we explain such rapid changes without the influence of nerves?

The protoplasm itself, which constructs the whole animal body, possesses the property of contraction, and facts exist which prove the contraction of protoplasm of the skin, and can be observed by the naked eye. Frogs, for instance, show different hues of their skin, evidently dependent on the contraction of the protoplasmic bodies provided with coloring matter, with pigment granules. After we stretch the membrane of a common frog, under the microscope, in the beginning it is covered with dark lines, but being stretched for some time, it looks granular, because the whole mass of pigment is united with small lumps. The irritation belongs directly to the protoplasm and excites it for a contraction; at first the nerves become excited, and compel the protoplasm in bodies to change their forms. The chameleon, a species of lizard living in the southern part of Europe and in Africa, has the property of changing the color of its skin, showing the blue, green, gray, brown or black tints, thus the drawing of its body being either streaked, roan or of a plain color. Brucke stated that different exciting influences of the nerves easily produce changes of color. Poisoning with strychnine makes the skin pale; in diseases it becomes spotted after the section of a quantity of cutaneous nerves, there appears tooth-like ramifications on the skin, which finally gets black. Before the animal dies, it is mostly pale, but soon afterwards it is interspersed with large dark spots. Pouchet of Paris, has found that different fishes have different colors of their skins in light and in darkness. Fishes which look bright in the light, and dark in the twilight, get the latter hue also when deprived of their eyes. Such observations show of what an important influence the nerves are for the vital functions or manifestations of the protoplasm.

In former times it was asserted that the nutrition of our body takes place in such a way that the elder tissues become substituted by new ones, so that we change every part of our body every seventh year. This opinion is a false one; when the living matters produce its own kind by growing, when it restitutes parts of the body that have been lost, as in healing of wounds, the elder elements do not disappear. Observations on the skin illustrate this fact in the simplest way, since granules of insoluble substances brought into the Corium or the Rete malpighii, remain there without change of their quantity during the whole life. Tattooed drawings, performed, for instance, on the forearms, as is done often among the laboring class, the cinabar giving the red, and the indigo the blue color, remain unchanged during life; only a certain portion of these substances is brought into the next lymphatic glands, after the tattooing of the forearms for instance into the axillary glands, as stated by Veichow of Berlin, where they remain without change, either by the application of washing or cauterization, nor are they altered by the process of nutrition.

The subject of the lecture was discussed by Drs. ATKINSON, HOEBER and LAMBERT. Dr. Hoerber called attention to the want of more knowledge on the part of the people of America as regards the laws of health, the importance of air and light, and the proper functions of the skin. Physicians are often called to see patients, who, from not attending to the simplest rules of health, and necessary cleanliness, find themselves feeling badly, and expect the medical man to prescribe some ointment or embrocation to be rubbed upon the surface, which, in fact will do no good, when, if the simple laws of health were observed, neither the doctor nor the druggist would be necessary. Nothing pertaining to the health and happiness of the people is of higher importance than that the masses duly understand the functions of the skin.

PROF. LAMBERT referred to the importance of early retiring to bed, and thought the necessity of it is not sufficiently understood. He said of a large number of people in England who had attained to a very old age, and to whom a series of forty questions were propounded touching their habits of life, but two of the questions were answered alike, and one of these was that they had always retired early to bed, and consequently rose early in the morning. Soon after the midnight hour the body exhales a different character of perspiration than in any other portion of the twenty-four—more laden with fetid gases and effete qualities that the system requires be thrown off, in order for a healthy condition. This may at any time be perceived by entering a sleeping-room a short time after midnight, where two or more persons are sleeping, and the odor is different from what it is in any other part of the day. It is also apparent in our street cars on a cold morning, when the doors are kept closed and the body is closely wrapped, thus retaining the offensive odors arising from the perspiration of the night. When the car in the morning is full this mixed fetid odor is highly unpleasant. It is better always to retire one or two hours before midnight, that sleep may come to the slumberer before the time for this peculiar perspiration occurs. If a person remains up till after this time, though he may lie later in the morning, he is not as well refreshed, and feels feverish and languid. It is also wrong to "waken children and get them up after they have gone to bed, even though friends should call in. It disturbs their healthy slumber, and they do not feel so well for it the next day.

PROF. HEITZMANN made a few closing remarks.

A "Hard-Shell Baptist" Sermon.

[Delivered on a flat-boat at Island No. 10, on the Mississippi river. I was there and had it taken down, and want it preserved in THE TRUTH SEEKER for my grand children to read. UNCLE TOM.]

The text was this: "And they shall gnaw a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam, where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born." "Now my brethering, I'm a plain unlernt peacher of the gospil what's been fore-ordained and called to expound the scripturs to a dyin world from the day of wrath. 'For they shall know a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam, where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born.' My beloved brethering, the text says they shall know a file—it don't say they may, but shall. There's more than one kind of file; there's the hand saw file, rat-tail file, single file, double file and profile, but the kind of file spoken of here isn't one of them kind neither, because it is a figure of speech, my deer brethering, and means going it alone and gettin ukered; 'for they shall know a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born.'

"And my deer brethering there's more dams besides Hepsidam, there's Rotterdam, Haddam, Amsterdam, milldam and don't care a dam. The last of which, my deer brethering is the worst of all, 'for they shall know a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born.'

"Where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born." This point of the text my brethering is another figure of speech and it isn't to be taken as it says; it doesn't mean the howlin wilderness where John the hard-shell Baptist was fed on locusts and wild asses but it means my deer brethering the city of New Orleans the mother of harlots and hard lots where corn is worth six bits a bushel one day and nary red the next, where niggers is thick as black bugs in a spilt bacon ham, and gamblers, thieves and pick-pockets go skiting about the streets, just like weasels in a barnyard, but my deer brethering, take care you don't find when Gabriel plays his last trump, you've all went it alone and got ukered, 'for they shall gnaw a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born.' There's nothing like religion, my brethering; its better nor silver nor gold and jim-cracks and you can no more git to heaven without it than a jay bird can fly without a tail. Thank the Lord, I'm an unedicated man, my brethering, but I've sarched the scripturs from Daan to Beersheba, and found old Zion right side up, and the hard-shell religion the best of all religions. And it's not like the Methodists who expect to git into heaven by hollering hell fire, nor the Universalists who gets upon the 'broad-gage' and goes the 'whole hog,' nor the United Brethering who take each other by the seats of thar trowsers and try to lift themselves into heaven, nor the Catherlicks who buy through tickets from thar Priests; but it may be likened, my brethering, unto a man who had to cross a river and when he got there, the ferry-boat was gone, and he just rolled up his breeches and waded over. Hellelujah! 'for they shall gnaw a file and flee unto the mountains of Hepsidam where the lion roareth and the whang-doodle mourneth for its first-born.' Pass the hat, brother Flint and let every Hard-Shell shell out. Amen."

SCIENCE desires not isolation, but freely combines with every effort toward the bettering of man's estate. The lifting of the life is the essential point.—Prof. Tyndall.

A few fearless scholars have embarked upon the high seas of scientific thought and research. Truth is the prize for which they seek. For its sake they are willing to float a flag which is always regarded as hostile by those who choose to forever remain anchored in the harbors of tradition and superstition.—Haywood.

THE Concord clique of philosophers have been in past years most bitterly denounced in orthodox circles, and the patriotic old town itself has been called "the hot-bed of moral poison." But now the leader of that radical coterie, the revered Emerson, lectures acceptably before the theological students of Andover Seminary.

Address to an Atom.

BY AN UNCOMFORTABLY CONSCIOUS AUTOMATON.

Mysterious particle,
Intangible and most indefinite article,
Which even Science cannot fix or focus;
Are you indeed of all this hocus-pocus,
Mischristened Cosmos, protoplast? If so,
'Tis pity that the happy status quo
Of universal dumb inertia ever
Was broken up by vortices or voices.
'Twere surely better far that space had never
Re-echoed to objectionable noises,
Or witnessed all this pother,
Of biologic bustle, whose chief law seems Bother!
Why could not you,
And all your fellow-motes, far, far too prankful,
In the embraces of the boundless blue
Rest and be thankful?
A plague on all your forces and affinities!
A mob of monads, to my notion,
Surpasses one of demons or divinities
Only while idle. With the earliest motion
Began the immitigable mischief. Why
Must you in chaos outthose primal capers,
Which were the "promise and the potency
Of — all the woes that fill our morning papers?
'Tis surely a reflection most unpleasant
To think that all the plagues that haunt the present,
Spring from that moment in the hidden past,
When the first molecule, weary at last
Of immemorial motionlessness, stirring,
Jostled his neighbor atom. What a whirling
Went through astounded space!
Thought pictures a grim grin upon the face
Of him, the Prince of Evil;
Only then, of course, there was no devil.
At least of the New Creed that's one prime article;
Though I have little doubt
He was incipient in that self-same particle,
When fidgets caused the first great stirabout.

If Science's "dry light," at its meridian,
Finds men no more than automatic midges
In its cold ray, the history that bridges
The space between us and the first ascidian
Were better blotted.
To archetypal atoms was allotted
An easier fate than to the complex mass
Of "clever matter," which has dared to pass
For man, but is, for all its prayers and panics,
A problem in molecular mechanics!
If Conscience be but chemic combination,
And Love a mere molecular affinity;
What boots all Life's superfluous botheration
Of mad and painful dreams, that limn Divinity
On fool-projected limbos? Life's a swindle,
If taken a la TYNDALL.

And, let who may in that demoniac war win
("Survival of the fittest!")—yet, as groping
Less anxiously, less fearing, striving, hoping,
An ape was less a dupe than is a DARWIN.
That Atom must be a misguided duffer
Who'd join a Co.; alone it could not suffer.
Why should it long for partnership and pain so?
I would I were a monad—I'd remain so;
And as for "nascent thrills" and ganglia, drat 'em!
They're things for which I should not care an atom!

—Popular Science Monthly.

The Magic Urn.

Hark! Whence come all these lovely strains
Of music? Who can tell?
What sil'ry sounds do thrill my veins!
O, do not break the spell!

Is what the people used to call
"High Heavens" wherein dwell
All Graces,—Beauties,—Goodness,—all?
Pray who of you can tell?

Or is it where—some people tell—
One "Satan" plays his game?
Can Music emanate from—well,
I'm overcome with shame!

No, no, my Friends, not in the Sky
Do Bliss and Glory dwell;
No Singing Angels from on-high,
Of Heaven's Kingdom tell.

Nor is it luring music, played
By demon-hands below!
No dreaded spectre ever swayed
To terrify us—no!

The charming melodies you hear,
Are sung and played by Man;
They show his joy, when Fortune's near,
His woe when under ban.

Behold! From yonder Magic Urn
Do Love and Music start!—
They emanate from, and return
Into the Human Heart.

New York, Nov. 1st, 1874.

S. EDINGER.

Friendly Correspondence.

W. D. BRISTER, New York Mills, N. Y., writes: I like your paper more and more, and would hardly know how to do without it.

J. W. TULLER, Lone Rock, Wis., writes: For a number of years I have been wishing for just such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long may it prosper.

S. M. W.—, M.D., New Kingston, Pa., writes: The reports of the New York Liberal Club are of the greatest interest to me—in my estimation, the best feature of the paper.

S. HOAG, New York Mills, N. Y., writes: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and ardently hope you will be sustained in the enterprise by the Free Thought of the age. The day is at hand when it will be an honor to be called an Infidel.

H. H. JANESVILLE, Iowa, writes: I have been a reader of your paper for a year, and I am very much pleased with it and the fearless stand you take in defense of truth and against religious bigotry. I shall do all I can to extend its circulation. I heartily wish it a long and prosperous life.

MICHAEL KELLY, Falls City, Pa., writes: I am much pleased that you are doing so well in the management of your paper, and hope ere long to see it a weekly. Language is inadequate to express all the good wishes I feel for it. If I believed in prayer as our Christian friends do, I would pray that it might have a long life.

J. G. GRAY, Orange, Ind., writes: Allow me to say I am much pleased with your paper and that I am much in your way of thinking. In fact, I am becoming quite an enthusiast in that direction. With great pleasure I hand your papers around for others to read, and I have succeeded in obtaining several subscribers. Long may the light shine!

J. D. L. MONTAGE, Wilson, Kansas, writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is a very creditable paper and a good medium for the dissemination of useful knowledge. I like it for its boldness in grappling with error and superstition. Go on in the noble cause you have enlisted. Tear up the root of bigotry, cut down the seeds of ignorance, and sweep out of the way the enemies of physical and mental freedom.

J. D. HAGEMAN, Bushnell, Ill., writes: Put me down as a life subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER if it continues in the future as in the past, a bold champion of Free Thought and Liberal sentiments. I have taken it from its commencement and am well pleased with it, and wish you an abundant success. I am a Materialist and was once a Methodist in good standing.

SAMUEL KNODLE, Mt. Morris, Ia., writes: I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER; and hope it may live and grow strong and prove mighty in pulling down the strongholds of superstition and priestcraft. THE TRUTH SEEKER has now a well established mission, and if Free-thinkers do not appreciate the great importance of sustaining their publications they are not as wide awake and liberal with their money as our opponents. Vive la TRUTH SEEKER.

J. BURGESS, Zanesville, O., writes: I am much pleased with the valiant little TRUTH SEEKER. It is bold and fearless in promulgating truth, and I think it is doing vast good in exposing the superstitions of the day. Since I received the copy of "The Heathens of the Heath," I could hardly stop after commencing it. I find it one of the best books I ever read to forward the cause of Liberal thought, and to dispel the darkness which surrounds us by the dogmas of Christianity.

JOHN HEBERLING, Miles, Iowa, writes: I am so far much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and hope I may continue to be favored with its perusal. It contains much valuable information suited to the times. I hope its Editor will continue to be the right man in the right place, as he has thus far shown himself. I recently handed a copy of the paper to one of our teachers with the request that he read it. He replied, he thought Free-thinkers as a class were very bigoted persons. I thought him much mistaken and that he had got the boot on the wrong foot.

S. FOSTER, Marysburg, Minn., writes: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best paper for its size in the world; but there is no money here in the timber. We are not in the city where may be seen a few dollars; but I would not do without the paper if it cost five dollars a year. My family, consisting of ten, all esteem it highly. I am an Atheist, and preachers step out of their way to get around me. They call me the "Wheel-horse of Infidelity" for their part. I have read THE TRUTH SEEKER with great benefit. I am not in this respect like Mr. Snode. I would not, by the by, be whipped as you whipped him for twenty-five dollars.

UNCLE TOM. H. DODGE, Oxford, O., writes: DEAR FRIEND BENNETT:

With pen and ink, and paper, too,
I write another line to you,
To let you know that I am well,
And in Long Street I still do dwell.
* * * * *
Go, gentle lines, thy message bear,
Go with the writer's fervent prayer,
Haste thee away in rapid flight,
Swift as the beams of morning light.

CHARLES JONES, Fairbury, Ill., writes: I feel grateful for the opportunity of supporting such an illustrious paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have been taking three papers, but there are none of them I look for so anxiously as I do for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe you speak the truth when you say you wish to publish a fearless, outspoken sheet, exposing the errors, superstitions and fallacies of the past and the present. You have accomplished your aim, rather remarkably so far, and so long as you preserve the same course you will find me one of your most ardent supporters; and I will induce as many of my Liberal acquaintances to subscribe for your paper as possible. My recompense will consist in your exposing the abominable practices of Churches, ancient and modern, in the future as you have in the past. The people are in need of this kind of knowledge, and for some fearless man to teach them the absurdity of the old systems of religion, and I feel that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is able and willing, and I hope sympathizing friends will not withhold their needed support.

E. W. PIKE, Pittsfield, Ill., writes: My wife and myself were brought up strictly orthodox, but we have been growing more and more skeptical for the last twenty-five years, and to-day we would rather part with all other papers than be deprived of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Its utterances are none too radical for us. We endorse it, and heartily wish it success. We are comparative strangers in this place; having been here but a few months. It is a very religious town of some 2000 inhabitants. Four revival meetings have been held here this winter, and running at the same time. Those who do not belong to the Church are very much afraid of Infidelity. I wish to order some books soon.

S. C. STRATTON, Leetonia, O., writes: I notice letters in your paper from many parts of the country, but none from this point. I wish our friends to know how our orthodox friends are progressing here. I will briefly state what I have heard from the pulpits lately. First, that God is as much glorified in the damnation of a sinner as by the salvation of a saint. Second, that every individual born into the world is a child of the Devil and an heir of hell; and without being born again cannot be saved. Third, that unbelievers and skeptics that do not, or will not, accept the humanity and divinity of Christ as God are fools. They misrepresent our belief, treat us coolly and uncourtously; but, Brother Bennett, we will set them a better example.

PERRY N. ALLEN, Hastings Centre, N. Y., writes: I admire your paper and hope to be a constant reader so long as you shall continue to print it. I like its manly, outspoken and independent manner together with its open pages for the hearing of those who differ from yourself. It fills a want long felt, and I know of no paper that answers this purpose so well. Although I am a Spiritualist and believe in the continued existence, and in this respect differ from yourself and some of your contributors, yet, as you said in one of your recent articles with regard to us, so say I. I have a warm side for all independent Free-thinkers and lovers of reform and improvement. Wishing you the best of success and support, I will remain your friend and brother in the cause of truth seeking.

LEVI WOOD, Galesburg, Mich., writes: I make you another remittance, as I don't wish to be in the debtor column. I cannot say as Mr. Snode did, that reading THE TRUTH SEEKER has done me no good. Your one article about Noah and his ark to my mind is worth a year's subscription. Neither can I agree with Mr. S. that Infidelity, so-called, consigns all that is good in the human heart to perpetual annihilation, or in other words, robs the human heart of all hope of immortality beyond this life. I know of many in this priest-ridden, creed-bound community, acknowledged to be the best of our citizens, who are denominated Infidels, and yet they have an abiding faith of a life beyond this. Persevere, Bro. Bennett, I know your paper is doing good.

BENJ. REESE, St. Charles, Ky., writes: As my trial trip is over, and I find I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, I enclose $1.75 for it one year. I have long thought that a screw or two was loose in the old "Salvation Ship," but three months' reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER has convinced me that all the screws are loose, and nothing can be expected but a general shipwreck some of these days. THE TRUTH SEEKER through your perseverance cannot fail to release thousands from the fetters of their early education. I wished to send you a list of subscribers. The only excuse is the hard times. Many of my neighbors come promptly to hear what THE TRUTH SEEKER has to say. They had a hundred times over rather hear what it had to say than the old Elder Harkins that comes around here once in a while, spinning his orthodox yarns.

MRS. C. A. SYME, Brooklyn, N. Y., writes: Please find enclosed $4.00 for subscription for two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER. One my own for the present year, now half expired, and the other for one copy which I wish you to distribute as specimen numbers, to any you may elect as suitable persons, who would read so radical a paper, and accept and promulgate the grand ideas it advances. Please do not send any change, for I consider that no trifling sum of money can repay you for the great good you are doing the people by disseminating the splendid truths and profound principles which every number enunciates. How deeply it is to be regretted that the state of public opinion is so low that your efforts are not better understood, and more highly appreciated. Please allow me to express in particular my approval of your admirable articles on Labor Reform, Social Science, Finance, and several masterly essays on the mutual relations of Materialism and Spiritualism; the one being the body and the other the soul, or the life and the form of everything that exists. These should not be divided but ever united, as they are entirely dependent upon each other—Matter upon Spirit for vivification, and Spirit upon Matter for manifestation; and both only leave lower forms of manifestation for higher and more perfect ones. So that Materialism and Spiritualism should be indissolubly united, forming Universalism, including all there is in the kingdoms of both Matter and Mind.

JOHN KEAY, North Lawrence, O., writes: I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER a power for good; it must live and continue its formidable attacks upon the strongholds of bigotry, hypocrisy and superstition. I am pleased with the manner in which it has improved since I became a subscriber. The scientific, historic and anti-dogmatic essays speak highly for their authors. Without any disagreement with Mr. Paden—the biographer of his Satanic Majesty—I must candidly say he did not finish his history. It is useless for any person to tell me there is no such being as the Devil. I have the most positive evidence of him of my respectable neighbors, who related their experience at a revival meeting recently held here. One convert had proved the Devil to be a coward, which elicited the following remarks from a diminutive, parasitic, sanctimonious, theological vendor of mansions and brimstone: "Ah, dear brother, the Devil is too much for any man, but when any man and his Savior are united the Devil flees." Another brother, who, by the by, before going to church the same evening had made an affidavit before a justice charging a man with bribing him, said Satan would not fight a man face to face, but come sneaking around and he said "get behind me Satan," he fled (an open sessemce). The other said the Devil had taken the coat off his back (a close encounter truly). Since I heard the above authentic testimony of the existence of the King of Hell I do not entertain a doubt as to his personal existence. But as the three men alluded to are older men than myself, and have conquered without a scar to bear record of the conflict, I feel no terror and believe I shall also prevail. Quantum suf.

THE VALCOUR FREE LOVE COMMUNITY had but a brief existence, and recently "broke up" with anything but Love and good will.

CATALOGUE OF STANDARD AND POPULAR RADICAL AND SPIRITUALISTIC BOOKS.

FOR SALE BY D. M. BENNETT, Editor
"TRUTH SEEKER," 335 B'DWAY, NEW YORK.

All orders, with the price of books
desired, and the additional amount mentioned for postage, will meet with prompt attention. Postage is free where no postage is mentioned.

Ancient Symbol Worship.....	$2.00	15
Antiquity of Man, by Lyell.....	3.00	20
Autobiography of J. S. Mill.....	2.50	20
Ancient Faiths, by Inman.....	27.00
Alice Vale, by Lois Waisbrooker.....	1.25	16
American Crisis, by Warren Chase.....	.25	4
Answers to Questions, Practical and Spiritual, by A. J. Davis.....	1.50	20
Apocryphal New Testament.....	1.25	14
A Peep into Sacred Tradition, by Orrin Abbot.....	.50
Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine.....	.50	8
Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine, Paper.....	.25	6
Arcana of Nature, by Hudson Tut- tle, Vols. I and II.....	1.25	16
A B C of Life, by A. B. Child.....	.25	4
Arabula; or, The Divine Guest, by A. J. Davis.....	1.50	16
Approaching Crisis, by A. J. Davis.....	1.00	14
Apostles (translated from the French), by Renan.....	1.75	20
Astronomy and Worship of the An- cients, by G. Vale.....	.20	4
A Stellar Key to the Summer Land, by A. J. Davis. Paper Covers.....	.30	8
Astro-Theological Lectures, by Rev Robert Taylor.....	2.00	26
A Kiss for a Blow, a book for chil- dren, by H. C. Wright. Small Edition.....	.60	12
Large Edition.....	1.50	16
An Eye-opener, by Zepa. Paper Covers.....	.50	8
Bible in the Balance, by J. G. Fish.....	1.50	16
Blakeman's 200 Riddles.....	.20
Bible in India.....	2.00	20
Beliefs of the Unbelievers, by Frothingham.....	.20	4
Better Views of Living, by A. B. Child.....	1.00	12
Brotherhood of Man, and what Follows from It.....	.25	5
Book on the Microscope.....	.75	5
Book of Religions, by J. Hayward.....	2.00	15
Bible Chronology, by M. B. Craven.....	.10	2
Bailey's Festus.....	1.25	20
Buechner's Man. English Edition.....	4.00	20
Boccaccio's Decameron.....	1.50	15
Pradlaugh's Is there a God?.....	.05
Buddhist Nihilism, by Max Muller.....	.10
Buechner's Materialism.....	.25
By-and-By, by E. Maitland.....	1.75	15
Buechner's Force and Matter.....	3.00	20
Bastian's Modes of Origin.....	1.25	15
Beginnings of Life, by Bastian.....	5.00	25
Buckle's History of Civilization.....	6.00	40
Birds and Reptiles, by Figuier.....	4.00	25
Body and Mind, by Maudsley.....	2.00	20
Babbitt's Health Guide.....	1.00	10
Burroughs' Notes on Walt Whitman.....	1.00	10
Correlation of Forces, by Youmans.....	2.00	20
Cooper on the Soul.....	.90	10
Clodd's Childhood of the World.....	.50	5
Cranial Affinities of Man and the Ape, by Professor R. Virchow, of Berlin.....	.25	3
Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences.....	2.00	15
Confucius and Chinese Classics.....	2.00	15
Confucius' Life and Teachings, by Legge.....	4.00	15
Child's Book of Religion, by Froth- ingham.....	1.00	10
Confessions of an Inquirer, by J. J. Jarvis. Very interesting.....	1.50	15
Curious Myths of the Middle Ages, by S. B. Gould.....	2.50	20
Clergy a Source of Danger, by Jamison.....	1.75	15
Christianity before Christ, by M.B. Craven.....	.25	4
Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in all Ages and Na- tions, by Wm. R. Alger.....	3.50	40
Contrast, Evangelism and Spiritu- alism Compared, by Moses Hull.....	1.50	16
Criticism on the Apostle Paul, in Defence of Woman's Rights, etc., by M. B. Craven.....	.25	4
Conjugal Sins against the Laws of Life and Health, by A. K. Gard- ner, A.M., M.D.....	1.50	16
Constitution of Man, by George Combe.....	1.75	16
Common-sense Thoughts on the Bible, by Wm. Denton.....	.10	4
Common Sense, by Thomas Paine.....	.20	4
Christ Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle.....	1.00	24
Christ and the People, by A. B. Child, M.D.....	1.00	24
Christianity and Materialism Con- trasted, by B. F. Underwood.....	.15	4
Christian Amendment, by Abbot.....	.10
Christianity no Finality; or, Spiritu- alism Superior to Christianity, by Wm. Denton.....	.05	2
Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity, by B. M. Craven.....	1.00	16
Chapters from the Bible of the Ages, by G. B. Stebbins, Detroit, Mich., 400 pages, tinted paper.....	1.50	24
Christian Propagandism, by Abbot Claims of Spiritualism, embracing the Experience of an Investi- gator, by a Medical Man.....	.25	4
Compulsory Education, by Abbot.....	.5	2
Christianity, by S. B. Gould.....	2.00
Dictionary (Webster's unabridged) Pocket, flexible cover.....	12.00	ex
Descent of Man, by Darwin, 2 vols. ($2 per vol.).....	4.00	48
Descent and Darwinism. Oscar Schmitt.....	1.50	15
Devil's Pulpit, by Robert Taylor.....	2.00	20
Deluge, by Wm. Denton.....	.10	4

Dawn, a Novel of intense interest. Death and the After-life, by A. J. Davis.....	1.75	24
Debatable Land, by the Hon. R. D. Owen.....	.75	12
Dr. Bartol's new book, the Rising Faith.....	2.00
Eating For Strength.....	2.00	15
Essay on Man, by Pope, cloth, gilt.....	1.00
Early Social Life of Man.....	.25	4
Errors of the Bible, demonstrated by the Truths of Nature, by Hen- ry C. Wright, paper.....	.25	8
English Life of Jesus, by Scott.....	2.00	15
Enigmas of Life, by Gregg.....	2.00	15
Exeter Hall, a Theological Ro- mance, paper.....	.60	10
Empire of the Mother over the Character and Destiny of the Race, by H. C. Wright.....	.50	8
Elective Affinities, by Goethe.....	1.25	16
Electrical Psychology, by Dodds.....	1.50	16
Epidemic Delusions, Dr. Marvin. Fear of the Living God, by Froth- ingham.....	.25
Footfalls on the Boundary of An- other World, by Robert Dale Owen.....	.05	2
Free Thoughts concerning Relig- ion; or Nature vs. Theology, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	1.75	24
Faithful Guardian, an Inspira- tional Story, by J. Wm. Van Namee.....	.50	4
Fountain, by A. J. Davis.....	1.50	16
Fugitive Wife, by Warren Chase.....	1.00	12
God in the Constitution, by Brad- ford.....	.35	8
Good Sense, by Baron D'Holbach.....	.10	2
Gates Ajar, by Miss E. S. Phelps.....	1.00
Gates Wide Open, by Geo. Wood.....	1.50	16
Gist of Spiritualism, by Warren Chase.....	.50	8
Gospel of Good and Evil, by Sil- ver.....	1.50	20
Great Harmony, by A. J. Davis, 5 vols., viz., Vol. I. The Physician; Vol. II. The Teacher; Vol. III. The Seer; Vol. IV. The Reformer; Vol. V. The Thinker, each.....	1.25	15
God Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle.....	1.25	15
Gibbon's History of Rome, 6 vols., sheep.....	10.00	ex
Geology of the Stars, by Winchell.....	.15
Genesis and Ethics of Conjugal Love, by A. J. Davis. 142 pp.....	.50	5
Gregg's Creed of Christendom.....	2.50	15
Harbinger of Health, by Andrew J. Davis.....	1.50	20
Harmonial Man; or Thoughts for the Age.....	.50	8
History and Philosophy of Evil, paper.....	.50	6
Hayward's Book of all Religions.....	1.75	24
Helen Harlow's Vow, by Lois Waisbrooker.....	1.50	20
How to Bathe, by E. P. Miller, M. D., paper.....	.30	8
Hedged in, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.....	1.50	16
History of the Intellectual Devel- opment of Europe, by J. W. Drap- per, M.D., LL.D.....	5.00	60
History of the Conflict between Science and Religion. Draper.....	1.75	15
Human Physiology, Statistical and Dynamical; or, The Conditions and Course of Life of Man, by J. W. Draper, M.D., LL.D., 650 pp., cloth.....	5.00	60
Hobbes' Works, 16 Vols., Royal 8vo.....	25.00
History of European Morals, by Lecky.....	6.00	40
History of Rationalism in Europe, by Lecky.....	4.00	30
Higher Law, by Maitland.....	1.75	15
Hegel's Philosophy of History.....	2.00	15
Half-hours with Modern Scientists, cloth, 12mo., reduced to.....	1.00	15
History of American Socialism, by J. H. Noyes.....	3.00	20
Historic Americans, by Parker.....	1.50	15
His Marriage Vow, by Mrs. Cor- bin.....	1.50	15
Injurious Influences of Schools.....	.25	2
Influence of Christianity on Civil- ization by B. F. Underwood.....	.25
Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays, by Francis W. New- man and F. E. Abbot.....	.10
Is the Bible Divine? by S. J. Phin- ney, paper.....	.35	4
Is there a Devil? The argument pro and con.....	.25	4
Incidents in my Life, first series, by Cooper.....	1.00	16
Is it the Despair of Science? by W. D. Gunning.....	.15	4
Impressible Conflict and the Unity of God, by Emma Hardinge and T. G. Forster.....	.25	4
Ingersoll's Gods and other lec- tures, neatly bound.....	2.00	30
Is Spiritualism True? by William Denton.....	.15	4
Irreconcilable Records of Genesis and Genealogy, by Wm. Denton, paper.....	.25	8
Incidents of Life, second series. Home.....	1.50	15
Junius Unmasked; or, Thomas Paine the author of the Letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence.....	1.50	16
Jehovah Unveiled; or, the Charac- ter of the Jewish Deity Deline- ated.....	.35	8
Joan of Arc, a biography.....	1.00	12
Kant's Critique of Pure Reason.....	2.00
King David and his Times.....	1.50	20
Key to Political Science, by John Senff.....	1.25
Keran, with explanatory notes, by George Sale, 8vo., 670 pp. Best edition yet published.....	2.75	40
Law of Marriage, by C. L. James.....	.25	4
Looking Beyond, by Barrett.....	.75	12
Life Line of the Lone One, by Warren Chase.....	1.00	2

Life of Thomas Paine, with criti- cal and explanatory observations of his writings, by G. Vale.....	1.00	16
Life of Jesus, by Renan.....	1.75	20
Love and its Hidden History, by P. B. Randolph.....	1.50	16
Legalized Prostitution, or Mar- riage as it is and as it should be, by C. S. Woodruff, M.D.....	1.00	16
Letters to Elder Miles Grant, by Moses Hull.....	.25	4
Living Present—Dead Past, by H. C. Wright.....	.50	8
Les Miserables, by Victor Hugo.....	2.50	20
Library of Mesmerism, by Wells.....	4.00	25
Love, from Michelet.....	1.50	15
Life of Fourier, by Shaw.....	1.50	15
Life of Parker, by Weiss, 2 Vols.....	6.00	30
Lessons for Children about Them- selves, by A. E. Newton, cloth.....	.50	5
Lectures on the Bible, by Voysey.....	.10	4
Modern Thinker, Nos. 1 and 2, each.....	1.00
Mental Medicine, by Evans.....	1.25	14
Ministry of Angels Realized, by A. E. Newton.....	.30	4
Manual for Children (for Lyce- ums), by A. J. Davis, cloth.....	.70	16
My Affinity, and other Stories, by Lizzie Doten.....	1.50	20
Mediumship, its Laws and Condi- tions, with brief instructions for the formation of Spirit Circles, by J. H. Powell.....	.25	2
Moravia, Eleven Days at, by T. H. Hazard.....	.10
Married Woman Biographies of Good Wives, by L. Maria Child.....	1.25	16
Modern American Spiritualism, 1848-1868, by Emma Hardinge.....	2.75	32
Moral Physiology, by R. D. Owen.....	.05
Myths and Myth-makers, by John Fiske.....	2.00	20
Mystery of Matter, by Picton.....	3.50	25
Morning Lectures (twenty dis- courses), by A. J. Davis.....	1.50	18
Mediums and Mediumship, by T. R. Hazard.....	.10	2
Mental Cure.....	1.50	18
Martyrdom of Man, by Reade.....	3.00
Man in the Past, Present, and Fu- ture, by Dr. L. Buechner, elegant English Edition.....	4.00	20
Masculine Cross, or Sex Worship, illustrated, paper, 50c., cloth.....	1.00
New Physiognomy, by Wells, gilt. Nebula, Meteoric Showers and Comets.....	5.00	25
Nature's Laws in Human Life; an Exposition of Spiritualism.....	.25	2
New Testament Miracles and Mod- ern Miracles.....	1.50	20
Nature's Divine Revelations, by A. J. Davis.....	.60	8
Night Side of Nature, by Crowe.....	3.50	48
Oriental Religions, by Johnson.....	1.25	20
Origin and Development of Relig- ious Belief, Heathenism and Mosaism, by S. B. Gould.....	5.00
Old Theology Turned Upside Down, by T. B. Taylor, A.M., pa- per.....	2.00
On the Vision of Heaven, by Prof. Newman.....	.75	10
Orthodoxy False since Spiritual- ism is True, by Wm. Denton.....	.10	4
Origin of Species, by Darwin.....	.10	4
Origin of Civilization and Primi- tive Condition of Man, by Sir J. Lubbock.....	2.00	24
One Religion, Many Creeds, by Winans.....	3.00	34
Papa's Own Girl, Marie Howland.....	1.50	32
Pilgrim and Shrine, by Maitland.....	1.75	26
Paine's Political Works, 2 Vols., of about 500 pages each.....	1.50
Philosophical Dictionary by Vol- taire.....	5.00	1.00
Porsons and Events, by A. J. Da- vis.....	5.00	60
Planchet—the Despair of Science, by Epes Sargent.....	1.50	18
Penetralia, by A. J. Davis.....	1.25	16
Philosophy of Spiritual Inter- course, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	1.75	24
Positive Primer, being a series of familiar conversations on the Religion of Humanity. Reduced price.....	.60	8
Plato's Phaedo on Immortality.....	.75	10
Plato's Divine and Moral Works.....	1.25	14
Plutarch's Morals, 5 Vols.....	2.00	15
Prosimos's Religious Experience, by R. D. Owen.....	15.00
Poems from the Inner Life, by Lizzie Doten.....	.05
Philosophy of Creation, by Thos. Paine, through Horace Wood, medium, paper.....	1.50	20
Poems of Progress, by Lizzie Do- ten.....	.35	8
Parturition without Pain, by M. L. Holbrook, M.D.....	1.50	20
Pentateuch—Abstract of Colenso.....	1.00
Progress of Religious Ideas through Successive Ages, by L. Maria Child, 3 Vols.....	.25	4
Physical Man, his Origin and An- tiquity, by Hudson Tuttle.....	6.75	72
Plain Home Talk and Medical Com- mon Sense, by E. B. Foot, M.D. 1000 pp., 200 illustrations. Price, with a fine chromo.....	1.50	20
Question of Hell, by a Puritan.....	3.25
Radical Discourses, by Denton.....	1.00
Ravalette, and the Rosicrucian's Story, 2 Vols. in one, by P. B. Ran- dolph.....	1.50	16
Radical Rhymes, by William Den- ton.....	1.25	12
Rabelais' Works, 2 Vols.....	3.00
Religion of Humanity, by Froth- ingham.....	1.50
Religion of Inhumanity, by Harri- son.....	.20
Religious Ideas and Beliefs, origin and development of, by Morris Einstein.....	1.80	26
Religious Demands of the Age, by Miss Frances Power Cobb, 12mo., paper.....	.50	10

Radical Problems, by Bartol.....	2.00	15
Strauss' The Old Faith and the New, preceded by the author's Prefatory Postscript, 12mo.....	2.00	20
Songs of the Sun-lands, by Miller.....	1.50	10
Supernatural History of the, by Wm. Howitt, 2 Vols.....	3.00	40
Spirit Works; Real, but not Miraculous, by Allen Putnam.....	.35	6
Soul Affinity, by A. B. Child.....	.20	4
Satan, Biography of, by A. K. Graves.....	.60	6
Sermon from Shakespeare's Text, by Denton.....	.10	4
Sacred Gospels of Arabula, by A. J. Davis, cloth.....	.60	20
Sunday not the Sabbath.....	.25	4
Sexual Physiology, by R. T. Trall, M.D.....	2.00
Self-Abnegationists; or, The True King and Queen.....	.50
Soul of Things, by Elizabeth and Wm. Denton.....	1.50	15
Social Evils, by Mrs. M. M. King.....	.25
Spiritual Philosophy vs. Diabolism, by Mrs. King.....	.25
Spiritual Delusions, by D. D. Lum.....	1.50
Strauss' Life of Jesus, Very rare.....	12.00
Science of Thought, by Prof. C. C. Everett.....	2.00
Secret History of the French Court.....	1.25	10
Sartor Resartus, by Carlyle.....	.75
Songs of Life, by S. W. Tucker.....	.20	4
Science of Evil, by Joel Moody.....	1.75	20
Spirit Manifestations, by Rymer.....	.10	4
Syntagma, Taylor.....	1.00	12
System of Nature; D'Holbach.....	2.00	48
Startling Ghost Stories, from authentic sources.....	.50	8
Self-Contradictions of the Bible.....	.25	4
Sefena; or, The Mental Constitution, by Merton.....	1.00
Science of Knowledge, by Fichte.....	2.04	15
Science of Rights, by Fichte.....	2.00	15
Strange Discoveries respecting the Aurora and recent Solar Researches, by Richard A. Proctor, F.R.A.S.....	.25	3
Spectrum Analysis Explained.....	.25	3
Spectrum Analysis Discoveries.....	.25	3
Symbolism, Ancient Pagan and Modern Christian, exposed and explained, 16 plates, 172 cuts.....	3.00	30
Safest Creed and other Subjects, by O. B. Frothingham.....	1.50	20
Startling Disclosures in Spiritualism, by N. B. Wolfe.....	1.50	20
The Truth about Love.....	1.50
The Past and Future of our Planet by Wm. Denton.....	1.50	15
Transformations of Insects, by P. H. Duncan, F. R. S., elegant, illustrated, Extra gilt.....	7.50
The Sun, by Guillemin, illustrated.....	1.50
Treatise on the Intellectual, Moral and Social Man, a valuable work, by H. Powell.....	1.25	14
Tale of a Physician, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	.75	10
The Heathens of the Heath; a Thrilling, Radical Romance, by Wm. McDonnell, Esq., author of "Exeter Hall," &c. 500 pages. 12mo. Paper covers, $1; in cloth, neatly bound.....	1.50
The Essence of Religion, by Feuerbach.....	.50	6
The Relation of Witchcraft to Religion.....	.15
The Essence of Christianity.....	3.00	20
The Patriarchs, by Frothingham.....	1.00
The Parables, by Frothingham.....	1.00
Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius.....	1.00	10
Tyndall's Fragments of Science.....	2.00	15
Tyndall's Light and Electricity.....	1.25	15
Tyndall's Great Inaugural Speech.....	.25	2
Tyndall's Forms of Water.....	1.50	15
Tyndall's Heat as a Mode of Motion.....	2.00	15
Tyndall On Sound.....	2.00	15
Tyndall On Radiation.....	.50	6
Tyndall's Six Lectures on Light.....	1.00	10
The Safest Creed, and twelve other discourses, by O. B. Frothingham.....	1.50
The God of Science, by Abbot.....	.10	2
The Present Heaven, by Frothingham.....	.05	2
The Sabbath, by Parker Pillsbury.....	.10	2
Truths for the Times, by Abbot.....	.10	2
The Inner Mystery, an inspirational Poem by Lizzie Doten.....	.20	4
The Voices, by Warren Sumner Barlow.....	1.25	20
Theological and Miscellaneous Writings of Thomas Paine.....	2.50	24
Thomas Paine's Pilgrimage to the Spirit World.....	.75	12
Tobacco and its Effects, by H. Gibbons, M.D.....	.20	4
The Temple; or, Diseases of the Brain and Nerves, by A. J. Davis, paper.....	1.00	16
To-Morrow of Death, by Figuier.....	1.75	14
Three Plans of Salvation.....	.10	4
The Hereafter, by Hull. Paper.....	.55	8
Testament, New, shown in its true light, by J. P. Whipple.....	.50	4
Universology Basic Outline of, by Stephen Pearl Andrews.....	5.00	60
Unwelcome Child, by Henry C. Wright. Paper.....	.30	8
Unconscious Action of the Brain, Unity of Natural Phenomena, by Salgey.....	.25
Voices of Prayer, by Barlow.....	1.50
Vestiges of Creation.....	.25	4
Vainey's Researches in Ancient History, Very rare.....	.75	16
Vainey's Ruins.....	1.50
Vivid Truths, by A. B. Church.....	1.00	12
	.50	4

All books not mentioned in this list to be had in this city will be sent postpaid, at the Publishers' prices. Address,

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

PARTURITION WITHOUT PAIN;

OR

A Code of Directions for Avoiding most of the Pains and Dangers of Child-bearing.

EDITED BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D., Editor of the Herald of Health.

Contains suggestions of the greatest value.—Tilton's Golden Age.
A work whose excellence surpasses our power to commend.—New York Mail.
The price by mail, $1, puts it within the reach of all.

EATING FOR STRENGTH, A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

BY M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

The book is for the most part uncommonly apt, coming to the point without the slightest circumlocution, and is more to the point than many larger works.—New York Tribune.

One of the best contributions to recent hygienic literature.—Bos. Daily Advertiser.
What is particularly attractive about this book is the absence of all hygienic bigotry.—Christian Register.

One man's mother and another man's wife send me word that these are the most wholesome and practical recipes they ever saw.—E. R. Branson.
I am delighted with it.—H. D. Baker, M.D., of Michigan State Board of Health.

Sent by Mail for $1. Lady Agents Wanted.

SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY.

A Scientific and Popular Exposition of the Fundamental Problems in Sociology.

BY R. T. TRALL, M.D.

25,000 COPIES SOLD!

The great interest now being felt in all subjects relating to Human Development, will make the book OF INTEREST TO EVERY ONE. Besides the information obtained by its perusal, the practical bearing of the various subjects treated, in improving and giving a higher direction and value to human life, CAN NOT BE OVER-ESTIMATED.

This work contains the latest and most important discoveries in the Anatomy and Physiology of the Sexes; Explains the Origin of Human Life; How and when Menstruation, Impregnation and Conception occur; giving the laws by which the number and sex of offspring are controlled, and valuable information in regard to the begetting and rearing of beautiful and healthy children. It is high-toned, and should be read by every family. It contains eighty fine engravings. Agents wanted.

SYNOPSIS OF CONTENTS.

The Origin of Life.
The Physiology of Menstruation.
Pregnancy.
Parturition.
The Law of Sex.
The Theory of Population.
Hereditary Transmission.
Rights of Offspring.
Good Children.
Monstrosities.
Temperamental Adaptation.
The Conjugal Relation.
Courtship.
Choosing a Husband.
Marrying and Giving in Marriage.

Sexual Generation.
Impregnation.
Embryology.
Lactation.
Regulation of the number of Offspring.
The Law of Sexual Inter-course.
Beautiful Children.
Woman's Dress.
Intermarriage.
Miscegenation.
Union for Life.
Choosing a Wife.
Woman's Superiority.
The Marriageable Age.
Old Age.

N. B.—Professor Wilder, of Cornell University, says the above book is the best of its kind ever published, and commends it to his students. We will send all the above books, post-paid, to one address, for $3.50.

This work has rapidly passed through Twenty editions, and the demand is constantly increasing. No such complete and valuable work has ever before been issued from the press. Price, by mail, $2. Address

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York.

Scottish Western Loan Co.,G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,

Bankers,

*Le Roy, Minnesota,GEN'L SUPPLY AGENCY,

BRANCH OFFICE, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

H. B. BROWN Sec'y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner. Interest collected and paid annually at Gilman, Son & Co.'s Bank, 47 Exchange Pl. New York. No expense to loaner. Title and security guaranteed in every loan made by us. We pay 9 per cent. until money is invested.

The Agency will purchase and forward goods in any quantity to any part of the United States, and transact any business whatever for parties living at a distance, thereby SAVING to the purchasers from

20 TO 50 PER CENT.

The Agency is also prepared to transact any business that may be entrusted to them, such as effecting Insurance on Life and Property, renting property and collecting rents, searching records and examining titles, procuring legal advice, negotiating the sale or exchange of real estate, investing money for capitalists, obtaining desired information, and imparting advice other than legal; in short, we will undertake the execution of any legitimate business which persons in the country may require to have done in New York City.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TO

LIFE INSURANCE

On the most SAFE and reliable plan.

PRICE LIST OF CLOTHING.

Grey Union Sack Overcoats,	$5 50 to $6 50
Black Wool Sack Overcoats,	8 00 to 10 00
Blue Chinilla ditto,	9 00 to 11 00
Mixed Fur Beaver Overcoat,	14 00 to 16 00
Grey Reefing Jackets,	3 50 to 4 75
Black All Wool Sack Coats,	8 00 to 9 50
Black Cloth Frock Coats,	6 50 to 8 50
Black All Wool ditto,	8 50 to 15 50
Black Union Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 2 50
Black All Wool ditto,	2 50 to 4 00
Union Cassimere Sack Coats,	4 00 to 5 50
All Wool ditto,	6 00 to 8 00
All Wool Cassimere Suits,	13 00 to 17 00
Cassimere Pants and Vest,	7 00 to 9 00

Spring and Summer Clothing.

Cottonade Suits cut in Sacks and Walking Coats, from Light Weight, all wool, Fancy Cassimere Suits cut in sacks and walking coats, Cottonade Pants lined and unlined,	6 50 to 8 00
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants,	10 50 to 20 00
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants and Vests,	1 50 to 2 50
Spring Overcoats in Cassimere,	2 50 to 7 50
Light worsted Coats and Vests, all designs,	4 00 to 8 00
Black cloth Frock Coats,	9 00 to 20 00
Black cloth Sack Coats,	7 00 to 20 00
Union and all wool Black-Doeskin Pants,	6 00 to 16 00
Union and all wool Black Cloth Vests,	4 50 to 6 50
Linen Sack Coats,	2 50 to 9 00
Linen Pants,	2 00 to 5 00
Linen Vests,	1 00 to 2 00
White Duck and Marseilles Vests, all designs,	1 00 to 2 00
Alpaca Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Blue Flannel Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Heavy Satinet Suits, various styles,	400 to 7 50
	7 00 to 8 50

The above articles of clothing are all of Superior Quality, good material, and well made, and are not surpassed by any in this city.

Measurements for clothing should include length of limbs, circumference of body over chest and stomach.

Dry Goods!

Cassimeres, all colors, per yard,	75 to 2 00
Black Doeskins,	1 00 to 2 00
Broadcloth (double width)	2 00 to 5 01
Calicoes (by piece)	07 to 12
Ginghams	10 to 10
Dress Goods	25 to 30
Alpacas	21 to 32
Brown Sheetting,	8 to 16
Bleached Sheetting,	7 to 10
Hosiery (all colors) per dozen,	1 25 to 4 00

Millinery and Dress Goods.

Fine French Silk, per yard,	.50 to 2 00
Toquay Silk,	.60 to 1 00
Turquoise Silk,	.40 to 1 00
Fancy Satin and Silk, (remnants)	1 00
Cotton and Silk, (mixed)	.50
White English Crape,	.50 to 1 50
Ribbons,	.30 to 40
Gross Grain Sash Ribbons,	.20 to 40
Velvet, any color,	.20 to 40
Bridal Net, 3 wide,	.50
Bonnet Frame Lace, per dozen,	.80 to 3 00
Kid Gloves, per pair,	.30 to 1 40
Ostrich Feathers, each,	1.00 to 4 00

Miss Nellie Henderson will give her personal attention to the Millinery Department, and will fill all orders for articles of whatever kind, not mentioned above, at as low a price as can be bought of any one or any-where.

ORDERS FOR GROCERIES

Of not less than 5 lbs.

Will be promptly filled at wholesale prices, adding 5 per ct. on sums over $20 and 10 per ct. on sums less than $20.

COFFEE.

Green,	No. 1, 35 cts., No. 2, 30 cts.
Roasted,	No. 1, 37 cts., No. 2, 33 cts.

TEAS.

Oolong,	25 to 60 cents per pound.
Japan,	45 to 95
Young Hyson,	35 to 1.15
Imperial,	40 to 90
Twa Kay,	25 to 40
Eng. Breakfast,	40 to 90

ORDERS FORHATS, CAPS and FURS.

Wool Hats	from .45 to 60 cts. apiece.
Fur Hats	..80 to $4.00
Silk Hats	.. $2.00 to $8.00
Cloth Caps	..75 to $1.50

Furs from $2.50 to $60.00 per Set.

BOOTS and SHOES.

Boots, Calf, (pegged)	$2.75 to $6.00 per pr.
.. (sewed)	2.00 to 7.00
.. coarse, (pegged)	2.25 to 4.50
Shoes,	1.00 to 5.00

Families and neighbors by ordering not less than 1 dozen can obtain "bottom" prices, while cost of freight will be correspondingly reduced.

SPECIAL ATTENTION

Given to purchasing

Sewing-Machines, Jewelv

and Musical Instruments,

We can furnish most of the older Sewing Machines at 20 to 40 per cent. less than retail price.

We can send a superior two-thread hand machine for $13.
Also a superior Shuttle Machine complete for $20.

We will also make selections for

Public and Private Libraries,

Or procure any single book that may be ordered.

We can supply Agents with fast selling and profitable Novelties and Notions, and Merchants with Job Lots from Auction.

MERCANTILE COLLECTIONS.

On collections less than $50, twenty per cent.

On collections exceeding $50, ten per cent.

OBTAINING PATENTS.

From $25 to $100.

Negotiating the Sale or Exchange of Real Estate, from 2 to 5 per cent.

The commission for procuring Legal Advice, and for investing Capital, will be fixed by correspondence.

Confidential letters requiring labor and research, should include a fee adequate to the service required, but all letters of simple enquiry, enclosing stamp, will receive prompt attention.

Odds and Ends.

Young folks grow most when in love. It increases their sighs wonderfully.

It makes a great difference whether glasses are used over or under the nose.

ANYBODY can build a castle in the air, but it takes more than a genius to live in one.

When a cat sings, does she not do it on pur-puss? She simply does it to a-mews herself.

A YANKEE editor, in his financial article, says, "Money is close, but not close enough to reach."

FIRST IRATE FEMALE: "I'd hate to be in your shoes!" Second ditto: "You couldn't get in them!"

A YOUNG man has sued his barber for cutting off his moustache. The barber says he didn't see it.

IN New York, if a young man cheats at croquet, the young ladies caress the flange of his ear with a mallet.

The easiest and best way to expand the chest is to have a good large heart in it. It saves the cost of gymnastics.

The fool seeketh to pick a fly from a mule's hind leg; the wise man letteth the job out to the lowest bidder.

"Is that your child?" asked a policeman of a young girl. "No, it belongs to some mother woman," was the reply.

AN Iowa editor recently announced that a certain patron of his was "thieving, as usual." It was written thriving.

"The water cure is no new invention," said Stiggers, "it is as old as the deluge, and even then it killed more than it cured."

A METHODIST minister being recently asked if he had moved to his new appointment, said, "Yes, but it is a dis-appointment."

A NEWARK chap, who on short acquaintance married a widow, ran away when he discovered that she was the mother of twenty-two children.

A YOUNG LADY being asked by a rich bachelor, "If not yourself, who would you rather be?" replied, sweetly and modestly, "Yours truly."

A PREACHER, who was formerly a newspaper reporter, does not say, "Let us pray," but says, "Let us interview the throne of grace."

The editor of the Panama Star apologizes for the non-appearance of his paper by saying, that he had to leave off to dig shot out of his legs.

"THE Lord never meant for us to bile over with religion this cold weather!" said a Duluth deacon, as he dismissed church and went home to hug the stove.

A SWEET little boy, only eight years old, walked into the scene of a teachers' examination at Oswego, last week, and bawled out, "Annie, your feller is down to the house!"

"SHE is a perfect Amazon," remarked a pupil of his teacher to a companion. "Yes," said the other, who was better versed in geography than history, "I noticed she had an awful big mouth."

"FAITH," said an Irishman, who could not get into his cabin at Billings, his wife having turned the key upon him, "it's meself that's regularly locked in." "In!" said his companion—"in where?" "Why, in the street."

A SAILOR, passing through a grave-yard, saw on one of the tombstones, "I still live." This was too much for Jack, who, shifting his quid, ejaculated: "Well, I've heard say there are cases in which a man may lie, but if I was dead I'd own it."

"Yes, sir!" yelled a preacher in a Dakota church one Sunday morning, "there's more lying and swearing and stealing and general devilry to the square inch in this here town than all the rest of the American country," and then the congregation got up and dumped the preacher out of the window.

"Poor things!" murmured Solomon Burch of the State Journal. "Who?" inquired the deacon. "Why, them bally girls. They're so fearful dissipated. They can't hold out very long. They say they get on tight's every blessed night o' the week!"

SAYS a wife to her husband, as the curtain descends on the prostrate form of Juliet: "Ah, when we were married you vowed were I taken from you, you would kill yourself on my tomb, as Juliet did on Romeo's. You wouldn't do so now." "Only kill yourself, my dear, only kill yourself," replies the husband, "and see whether I would not keep my vow."

A YOUNG lady of Danbury, whose company is much prized by an enterprising merchant, took charge of a class of little girls the other Sunday. After the lesson she told the children that if they wished to ask her any questions, she would answer them. "Will you answer true?" asked a bright-eyed cherub. "Certainly," said the teacher. "Well, then," said the little one, hesitatingly, "do—do you love Mr. B—?" The teacher collapsed.

A DETROIT gentleman, walking behind two children the other day, heard the boy enquire, "Will you be at the party tonight?" "I shall be there," answered the Miss, "but I may as well tell you now that your love is hopeless. Mamma is determined, father is set, and it isn't right for me to encourage your attention. I can be a sister to you, but nothing more. Therefore you needn't buy me any valentines nor give me any more gum."

BISHOP AMES tells a story of a slave master in Missouri, in the olden time of negro vassalage, who said to his chattel: "Pompey, I hear you are a great preacher." "Yes, massa, de Lord do help me powerful sometimes." "Well, Pompey, don't you think the negroes steal little things on the plantation?" "I'se mighty 'fraid they does, massa." "Then, Pompey, I want you to preach a sermon to the negroes against stealing." After a brief reflection, Pompey replied: "You see, massa, dat won't do, 'cause 'twould throw such a col'ness over the meetin'."

BEECHERING A LITTLE.—Sammy Seuter, a little frowzy head of about eight summers, out in Michigan, has been thought to possess a small stock of shrewdness or common sense, but the following letter to his father, who was on a visit to relatives down in New England, shows that he's "up to snuff." The visit by his father was out short just three weeks by the reception of the epistle. The knowing ones in the neighborhood are having lots of fun. Thus runs the letter:

"DEAR DAD: Nothing of konsiderabul importance has transcurred since I last rit to yu. The same old just like it was is abowt all that happins here enny more. Ma is not so verry loansome, as she sed I needunt rite to yu to hurry back. She sed it was her christion dewty to let yu enjoy yourself, and she was alwus glad to have yu go awa. This is what she told that preacher man, an he sed he didunt blame her. He kums here moar often than he did. He an ma is readin a story in a Shekago paper which kums every night an he brings it over an tha reed it. It ain't got no killin or injun in it, an I kant git head nur tail uv it. Its sumthin about Moul'tem an Tilt'em an Beech'em, sum fellers which was awful good frens an told lise on each uther. Las nite ma axed him did he believe Beech'em was guilty, an he sed he did, but mussent let on, cuz it wood hurt religun. Then she axed did he blame him, an he sed it was woman to err. What he ment I dont no. Then ma sed she dident blame the woman ether if tha was both crisions. She sed every body otto have a finity, an yu wussent her finity. Then he sed to me if I wussent sleepy, an I sed no, an he offered me five cents to be a good boy an say my prayers an go to bed. I sed hugh, I ain't no five cent harpin, so he lafed an gimme ten cents an I went. Miss Spyser sed this mornin was ennybody sick to our howee las nite cos a lite was burnin so late, an ma sed she was sittin up a rittin to her deer good husban. This is awl for the presunt. Yure fecksionate son, SAMMY."

DR. WM. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMPTIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH,

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere. Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.
CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.
CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.
CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.
CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.
Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S OXYGENATED BITTERS.

The OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSLEY'S Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.
JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,
Proprietors,
8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE to facilitate the use of the CATARRH CURE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

D. M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED, AND PRICED SEED ANNUAL 1875.

Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.

Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

BEST AND CHEAPEST

SEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

till Apl. 15. R. H. SHUMWAY, Rockford, Ill.

A NEW BOOK.

THE

Doctrine of Descent

AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

THE Boston Investigator!

THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL
IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 34 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its FORTY-FIFTH year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

THIS PAPER IS ON FILE WITH

Where Advertising Contracts can be made

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION,
FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 16. { D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, APRIL 15, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY,
SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional, for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

ALAS, ANOTHER OF 'EM.—The Rev. J. L. Ross of Niles, Mich., has been sentenced to six years in State Prison for the forgery of a deed, on which he obtained $1,000.

A BEAUTIFUL girl of Montgomery, Ala., was killed by the explosion of a lamp while on her knees praying. And still we have people right here in our midst who will persist in praying.

REVIVALIST HAMMOND is praying for the conviction of the San Francisco sinner who stole his overcoat. Why not follow the injunctions of his master, and give the thief his coat, his vest and his overshoes?

A MONUMENT is to be erected to the memory of the brilliant Edgar A. Poe in the City of Monuments—Baltimore. The teachers of that city have raised $1,500 for an obelisk of pure Italian marble, with bas-relief of Poe on one end of the panels, and appropriate emblems and inscriptions on the other three.

A BROOKLYN MINISTER STEPPING DOWN AND OUT.—The Rev. George K. Woodward, pastor of the Evergreen Methodist church, has seen fit to relinquish his connection with the church upon the grounds that he has been arraigned before the Conference for falsehood. Five specific lies were proved against him, though not of great magnitude.

PROF. MAX MUELLER is reported as soon to leave England for the Continent, to make necessary arrangements for the translation of all the Oriental Bibles into the chief languages of Europe. Many of the most learned Oriental scholars are to assist him. The Bibles of the East are much older than the Jewish Scriptures, and the originals of the better portions of them.

SLANDERED FROM THE PULPIT.—In the Court of Review, Montreal, Canada, judgment has been rendered in the case of D. Ritchie vs. the Rev. Father Blanchard. The case arose from the defendant having made damaging remarks concerning Ritchie from the pulpit, which tended to injure his trade. The Court condemned Father Blanchard to pay for damages and costs.

A BALLOON VISIT TO EUROPE.—Prof. Donaldson contemplates a balloon voyage from New York to London next autumn, the expenses to be paid by William K. Belknap of Cincinnati, George L. Bruce of New York city, Nathaniel Grey Hadaway of London, and Narcisse Pelletier of Paris. These gentlemen are to provide $40,000 for the expenses, and give the Professor $20,000 if he makes the trip from New York to London within forty-eight hours, or $10,000 if he takes seventy-two hours.

EFFECTS OF PIOUS TEACHING.—Joseph C. Teter, son of the Rev. I. P. Teter of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, was sentenced about two weeks ago to serve five years in the Iowa State Penitentiary. The crime for which he was sentenced was for stealing cattle, and he seems quite an expert in that line, for he succeeded in getting away with twenty-five head at one time and seventeen at another. His father has long been one of the leading Elders of the M. E. Church in Iowa, and no doubt reared his son so as to love God and follow in the footsteps of his divine master.

THE fish of Lake Erie, imprisoned by ice, have been dying because they had too much water and not enough air. Now the fowl on Lake Huron are starving because they have too much air and cannot get at the fish through the ice. There seems to be a predicament for the fish in either case.

THE LATEST clerical scandal is reported from Knoxville, Tenn., the unfortunate man being the Rev. Archibald Hines, who is accused of having stolen fifty cents from a bowl in the cupboard of a member of his church. The case is undergoing a rigorous investigation; thirty witnesses have already been examined, and more are to come. Mr. Hines denies the charge, and declares that the whole thing is a conspiracy, set on foot by a Knoxville Brown to ruin his reputation and drive him from the pulpit, and he has begun a suit for slander against his accuser.

DR. WILKES, in his recent work on physiology, remarks that "it is estimated that the bones of every adult person require to be fed with lime enough to make a marble mantle every eighth month." It will be perceived, therefore, that in the course of about ten years each of us eats three or four mantle-pieces and a few sets of front door-steps. It is awful to think of the consequences if a man should be shut off from his supply of lime for a while, and then should get loose in a cemetery. An ordinary tombstone would hardly be enough for a lunch for him.

THREE baptisms by immersion will cure any disease and insure salvation. Such is the belief of a new sect at Manton, R. I. Converts are numerous, the baptisms taking place out of doors in icy water. The other day a woman recanted upon getting her feet in the freezing stream, forgetting expected reward in present chills, and tried to get away. The minister, however, would not allow backsliding. He is big and brawny. Seizing the woman by her clothes, he immersed her the required three times. Between each dowse she screamed and struggled, but could not escape.

A TIGHT SQUEEZE.—They are telling the story since Dr. Talmage's sermon, that a Brooklyn resident—name not given—appeared at the gates St. Peter guards for admission to Paradise. The saint turned to the registry pages: "Where are you from?" "Brooklyn." "I don't think we can admit you; rules very strict. In fact, can't do it. Think of that scandal." It is said that the Brooklyn man looked steadily at Peter and crowded three times. His saintship colored, fumbled his key a minute, and then said: "Well, you can go in; but don't you do that again to me."—Brooklyn Union.

THE RED CAP.—The Catholic portion of our community have been feeling very jubilant, lately, over the promotion of "his Grace" or "his Eminence," Arch-bishop McCloskey, to the Cardinalship, the first ever on the Western continent. The "Red Cap" is said to have arrived from Europe for him, soon to be followed by the "Red Hat" and the other trappings and insignia of the exalted position; and on the heels of all this, it is said the Pope is coming over himself, to make his home in the United States. Well, let him come, if he wants to. Since we have got used to the Brooklyn Scandal, we think we can stand almost anything. We make a prediction, however, that in 1975 there will be very little use for the Pope's tiara, the Cardinal's "Red Hat," the bishop's mitre, the priest's surplice and gown, or the monk's cowl. These all belong to a past age of superstition, and, as science and intelligence spread over the world, such emblems of ignorance and barbarism will be cast aside.

TRYING THE PREACHERS.—The Methodist Conference, just across the river, in Jersey City, have this week been in session and have been "hauling over the coals" a number of their brethren, for derelictions and short comings. The first was the Rev. J. B. Howard, charged with insubordination. The second was Rev. M. F. Wayne, who had used funds to which he had no right, or had contracted debts he had no ability to pay. The third case was the Rev. Mr. Stratton's, also for improper use of funds. The fourth case, that of the Rev. J. A. Owens, who had written articles for The Independent that absolutely shocked some of the good brethren, who declared the articles Atheistical, and calculated to do much injury to the cause of Christ. The brother's writings were strongly condemned by some of the stricter clergymen. Will these teachers of the ignorant multitudes ever learn to do as they ought?

UNSAFE TO THINK AND REASON.—In the Newark Conference of the M. E. Church, recently held in Jersey City, a motion was made that a committee be appointed to investigate the charges of heresy preferred against the Rev. W. I. Gill, A.M., author of Evolution and Progress. The work was bitterly criticised as rejecting "Bibleism," "miracleism," and out-Huming Hume. Dr. Adams charged that "the book was thoroughly infidel in its tendencies, and that its theory of evolution was not only opposed to revelation, but a clear denial of the personal existence of God." The motion to appoint a committee was adopted. That is right, Rev. Sirs. If a man among you dares to embrace the light of science and truth, if he presumes for a moment to doubt the musty old theories of superstition, and the "revelations" of the Dark Ages of the past, haul him up before your tribunals, cashier him, condemn him, turn him out. If he reasons and accepts science, he can be one of you no longer. But drive him out. We will accept him. There is room in our ranks for thousands of bright minds like his, who have tired of the old husks of theology and superstition, and prefer the luscious fruits of science, reason and truth. Let them come.

We recently noticed Dr. Gill's work in our columns. It is peculiarly able, and is worthy the perusal of every thinking, enquiring mind. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts.

THE BEECHER TRIAL, as we go to press, is drawing near the close of the fourteenth week. Mr. Beecher has been six days under direct examination. As we expected, he has followed the same line of defense he pursued last summer before his select church committee. He positively denies, under oath, the statements of Tilton, Moulton, Mrs. Moulton and Mrs. Cary. The issue is joined. There is certainly bold-faced perjury somewhere. If Mr. Beecher is telling the truth, they have all lied most egregiously, and if they have told the truth, he is lying either "sublimely," as he indicated to Moulton, or most damnable, as thousands believe is the case, and we must confess we are of this number. Which is the more probable, that three respectable people, the first of whom Mr. Beecher on many occasions has extolled in the most extravagant language; the second of whom he frequently said was "the noblest friend God had ever raised up;" and the third of whom he said, "she was the noblest of her sex," should, without adequate cause, conspire together to bear false testimony against a friend, or that a person guilty of an offense of the kind charged, should persistently deny it? We decidedly think the latter more probable. Mr. Beecher began by making an untrue defense, and he feels obliged to adhere to his mistaken course. Many are seeking excuses for him, by claiming he is justified in misstating the facts to screen Mrs. Tilton, but it is a fearful position for a public teacher, a minister of what is called the "Church of Christ," who has so many years occupied a prominent position before the public, to solemnly and repeatedly, day after day, deliberately commit perjury. It is a sad picture to contemplate; it must have a serious effect upon the morals of the community, and must shake to the very foundation public faith in the Christian Clergy. It is amusing, were it not so saddening, to see the labored efforts Mr. Beecher is making to explain away his letters, Mrs. Tilton's letters, Mr. Moulton's letters, and Mrs. Morse's letters. His theory is specious and plausible, and with the most consummate acting, gesticulation, and mimicry, he aims to affect the court and the jury, but we apprehend by the cross-examination and the rebuttal much of it will be torn to shreds and leave the poor old man exposed to the gaze and condemnation of the world. One of the blackest features in the whole business is his willingness to defame, pull down, and blacken the characters of so many others that he himself may soar and shine. The ending is not yet, and we only hope it may not be a bloody or a deadly one.

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XV.

Things were now at their worst in Boston. After the horrible execution and tragedy which had just taken place, the sleuth hound of the Church laid its nose afresh on the track of "the enemies of the Lord," and hunted them to death in every quarter.

Distrust spread anew through every household, and the long-faced debauchee and gloomy Christian madman held high carnival under the banners of as dark and as accursed a superstition as ever characterized the most savage nations.

Scarce an hour had elapsed after the double tragedy near the jail, when Huskins was again in clover. A pliant and unconscious tool in the hands of a number of clerical vagabonds, who, through motives of gain, lust, revenge or jealousy, sought to remove some obstacle out of their way, he was ever on the alert to take a hint from them, and to do their behests as that of "the Lord's." Hence, at the very moment alluded to, and while the villain Sloucher and his two companions, now no more, were engaged in accomplishing their own nefarious ends, he was once more engaged actively in his cherished vocation, and before the sun had sunk in the western sky, he had added five new victims to those already in prison.

During all this terrible period, when men were drunk with superstition and with blood, Salem was, of course, the great centre of the hideous excitement. Day after day she continued to fill the dungeons of Boston with sane, good men and women on the nonsensical accusations of mere children whose ludicrous and worthless drivelling had more weight with both the Church and State, than the solemn and truthful asseverations of the noblest and best in the land.

If the various religious beliefs, and especially those of Christendom, had not been civilized by science, and through the progress of secular knowledge, we should be devouring each other to-day as monsters seen through the microscope in a drop of putrid water. One of the strongest evidences of the divine essence of man is, that he has survived religion, and is becoming a lone worshiper in any corner of the universal temple that accords with his inner convictions. Mentally we are the products of civilization, physically we are the products of cannibalism. The first of these propositions may be established through a glance at the Stone Age, while the latter rests upon the immovable foundation, or fact that there is not one of us but swallows daily a portion of some far-off progenitor in some shape or other. To be sure, we do not sit down to the repast after the manner of those given to "cold missionaries;" but the fact is incontrovertible, that we do the deed after all, no matter how inviting or recherché the collation.

An analysis of the human family in all its social, its moral and its physical relations—in all its intellectual and religious aspects, must take the starch out of any creed or philosophy that assumes God has anything special to do with religious beliefs or with society. He has made universal laws which never fail in their mission, and which influence all and pervade all without respect to things or persons. Through these alone he exacts obedience, and through these alone he receives it. Through these alone and their various expressions, he educates us, and we all recognize alike the necessity of bowing to them in all essential respects.

This accomplished, he has left us to build our baby-houses as we please, and we have built them with a vengeance. Had he considered unity of thought and sentiment in matters of religious belief necessary to his glory, all men would think alike in this relation; and as they do not think alike, each man has a perfect right to think just as he pleases. He has created no code of physical laws for the few. Why, then, should he institute a code of religious laws that are not in universal operation? The fact is, we must make our own religion and morals, whether on the "white-souled Elizabeth" principle, or on that which appears to be more in consonance with the true dignity of woman and in keeping with the purity and fidelity of her nature, as a wife and a mother.

There never was a grosser falsehood than that put forth by society, when it assumes to be modeled in mercy, justice and truth. It is, as a general thing, a compact of the strong against the weak, of the rich against the poor, of the learned against the illiterate, and of the proud against the humble; and, perhaps, we may add, vice versa. This may be all necessary to the development of the race, but it is not an outgrowth of the great principles we have just enumerated. We build into our social fabric whatever the majority considers necessary, and thus legalize it without reference to its consonance with what we call the divine will. Just look at it, ten wives for a Mohammedan, one for a Christian layman, and none for a Catholic priest, and all assuming to be in direct conformity with the will of him in whom there is no variable-ness neither shadow of turning.

Irregularities such as these, and the various phases of society which have characterized the different portions of the globe from time immemorial, prove that we are the sole builders of our social compacts, which are assuming new shapes almost daily. So that in this we are left free to act and free to assume untried burdens as we will, and to throw them off if we find they do not sit easily upon our shoulders. The fact is, society seems to have been framed originally by the weak and cunning to restrain the more powerful and the licentiousness of brute force. And this very idea was the last which passed through the brain of Alice Ravenswood, as, in the golden light of her fading senses, she saw Maurice Fitz Raymond hastening to meet her through a flowery dell that lay on the shining verge of the fairy realms of dream land.

New life and hope sprang into the household at the villa when Maurice and Francis Elencourt, accompanied by Firefly and Martha, appeared suddenly among them. The invalid, who was conversing with Emily Graham, Robert, Titmouse and John Langton, was at first convinced that Alice was of the party also; but soon discovering the true state of the case, her heart died within her once more. Her good sense, however, quickly came to the rescue, for, in the return of Maurice and Francis—whom she soon recognized and greeted warmly—she could not but perceive the appearance on the stage of action powerful agents that could at once be brought to bear upon the recovery of her child, and her possible release from the terrible meshes in which she had become entangled. She saw that Francis would be of great importance in the dangerous and difficult work. In fact, she recognized that there were now five persons—not to speak of Florence—who would risk life and limb in the cause of the poor fugitive, for Titmouse had recently grown to be of no small importance in her eyes.

Florence and Francis, and John and Martha, stood out for the moment in bold relief from all this trouble—the two former especially, over whom no cloud appeared to hang. John, however, soon gave way to the stern conviction that, although Martha had for the time being escaped the hands of her enemies, they were doubtless still on her track. However, she was, under the circumstances, where she could now best conceal herself until some ray of sunshine broke through the gloom, so she and Firefly, who had been welcomed most affectionately by the invalid and the rest of the household, were, after they had for the tenth time recounted their strange and fearful story, led off by Emily to a place of concealment convenient to her own neat chamber, where, after some refreshment, they sought that repose which they little fancied they should enjoy, that night at least, beneath the hospitable roof of the villa.

Titmouse, whose eye was keen to intensity, recognized the horses as belonging to the barn-yard from which they had been stolen; and as it was at no very great distance from the villa, it was suggested that he should lead them thitherward cautiously, and turn them loose lest they should be found near the villa in the morning, and create some suspicion as to the use to which they had been put during the night. In a few moments the brave little fellow was out with them on his way, and within half an hour he arrived at a point where he had determined to abandon them.

Here however, he found a third animal which recognized the other two, and which he himself fancied belonged to the same owner as those he had in charge. When once free, all three started off at a gallop in the direction of their quarters, upon which the dwarf quickly turned his steps toward the villa, running at the top of his speed, when he could see the way clearly before him; for, with his usual penetration, he felt half convinced that the third horse had been used in the abduction of his young mistress from the ravine a few hours previously.

When Titmouse returned to the villa, he speedily communicated his surmises to John and Robert regarding the probable work in which the third horse had been engaged, else why should he also be at large at such an hour. The party in the parlor was soon made acquainted with the intelligence. On hearing it, Maurice bounded to his feet and looked wildly about, as if he sought some outlet through which he could at once fly to the succor of his betrothed.

For the sake of her mother, however, from whose eyes sleep had long fled, he suddenly resumed his seat, although large drops of anguish fell from his pale brow. Under the circumstances, he saw it would be worse than useless for him to leave the villa at such an hour, and the more so, as the information brought by the dwarf could not be made available until daylight, if it should even then be of any value.

Early next morning Peter Huskins was knocking with his heavy staff at the door of the Fanatic. He had not seen Sloucher since the time of the execution, and had now come to inform him of his good fortune, in having been able to overthrow five more of the "enemies of the Lord," who were, as he averred, "even more dangerous than the witches Ravenswood and Giles." He had, however, intelligence far more interesting and pleasant for the Fanatic, and that was that two men had been devoured by wolves during the night about two miles from the town, and that, from some fragments of their dress and other tokens, persons who had just returned from the spot, foolishly supposed that the victims were the half-breed and Nat the Noose.

Although secretly hoping that this news should prove true, as if so, it freed him forever of two men that might one day embarrass him, the Fanatic had his doubts as to the victims being his late companions, and these doubts were strengthened by the conviction that, had the two men named fallen a prey to the ferocious animals, Martha and Firefly must have suffered also, so that the remains of four human beings would have been found instead of two, and possibly those of the horses also. However, there was sufficient in the intelligence to arouse the interest of the scoundrel and to induce him to propose a visit to the spot, while he seemed to express the utmost concern lest the news should prove true.

As the scene of the disaster was not very far from the abode of the Fanatic, and as Sloucher was uneasy at having Alice and the witch-finder under the same roof, lest some chance sound from within might attract the ear of the latter, both men sallied forth, and were soon on their way to the spot where the half-breed and the Noose had met their terrible fate.

As may be presumed, Maurice Fitz Raymond, fatigued and all as he was after his own recent journey and adventure, never closed an eye since he entered the villa, but lay awake all night ruminating on the probable fate or condition of her whom he loved so dearly. Early as he was up and abroad, however, John Langton had anticipated him, and had already returned with Titmouse from an inspection of the point where the latter had encountered the third horse on the night before, which he visited in the hope of being able to ascertain the direction from which the animal had reached it. This hope, however, was completely frustrated; and now he had returned to the villa determined to carry out his idea of the previous night, in visiting the ravine with the ferryman, and ascertaining, if practicable, the direction taken by the single horse whose footprints they had already observed as distinct from those of the two others.

While declaring his design to Maurice, they were joined by Robert and Mr. Elencourt, who expressed a determination to accompany him, and this led to all present starting off for the ravine, save Robert, who considered it advisable to remain about the villa.

Soon, then, this party of four—who had picked up the ferryman on their way, and lifted a load from his heart in relation to Martha—found themselves in the ravine, and standing in the deserted wigwam of Red Wing. That some one had visited it during the night was evident, for John Langton and old Dick observed at once, that the fire of the previous evening had been replenished.

While looking about for some explanation, two Indians, with bows and arrows, who had been reconnoitering the party from a clump of evergreens, cautiously made their appearance on perceiving the ferryman. They were the two prisoners of the preceding night, who had escaped from the soldiers, and who had returned to the glen to await the arrival of Red Wing.

They were not afraid of being recaptured, as they felt assured the authorities would never suppose they would return to such dangerous ground, but that they had escaped to the depth of the forest to which the Noose averred the chief and the rest of the red men had already fled. When apprised of the safety of Firefly and of the terrible death that had overtaken the half-breed and his infamous companion, their joy knew no bounds; nor were they slow to enquire, with eager interest, as to the fate of the two fugitives, or to express their pleasure at their escape also.

This reconte was regarded as fortunate by the whites, as the two red men would be more keen to observe the traces of the horse supposed to have been used in the abduction of Alice, than any of her anxious and suffering friends. In a few moments, then, the whole party emerged from the wigwam and took up the trail of the night before until they came to the point where the traces of the struggle had been already observed by Titmouse, Langton and old Giles.

Just as they reached it, however, the quick ear of the Indians caught the sound of approaching voices, and instantly, on a sign from them, the whites stepped aside from the track and concealed themselves among the underwood.

Scarcely had they accomplished this move, when Sloucher and Huskins made their appearance. They were on their way to the place where it was alleged the bones of the half-breed and the Noose lay scattered about, a most revolting spectacle.

When they reached the precise point at which the struggle had taken place, Sloucher paused as if to inspect the ground, and see whether it presented any tell-tale appearance that might lead to the discovery of his having visited it but a short time previously. The movement was sufficient to prove to Maurice and his friends that the Fanatic had some knowledge of what had occurred, however he had obtained it; but then came the conviction that, had he been an active party to the abduction of any of the three women, he would have avoided re-visiting the place so soon after, or subjecting himself to the suspicions of any one who might chance to encounter him there.

Huskins was, of course, in total darkness as to the true state of the case, and could have no idea of why his companion had paused at such a point. But the truth was, as it lay but a very short distance from the track that took them to where the fearful scene had occurred the night before, the Fanatic, in his extreme caution and cunning, had seduced his companion to the spot, without the latter supposing that he was making the slightest unnecessary detour, so that he himself might satisfy his eyes that nothing had been dropped or left on the ground in the scuffle that might identify him with the diabolical outrage.

Being satisfied on this point, he resumed his journey, his companion moving forward mechanically with him, as it were; but just as he was passing the point where the whites lay concealed, Maurice Fitz Raymond, impelled by an irresistible impulse, sprang from his place of concealment and suddenly confronted him in the path.

If a thunderbolt had fallen at his feet, the villain could not have been more surprised nor startled. He had not heard of the return of the volunteers, and had fancied that Fitz Raymond was miles and miles away from Boston, or that possibly his scalp was now dangling at the belt of some victorious Indian. He gazed upon the expected apparition as if petrified, and seemed unable to utter a single syllable. Soon, however, he was himself again, and noticing the surprise of Huskins, who also had paused and stared in amazement at Maurice, he observed, in his usual drawing manner and tone:

"So, child of the Evil One, instead of being off serving the State, you have deserted your post so that you might assist the witch, Ravenswood, to set the champions of the Lord at defiance, and to still keep out of their way, as if her familiars were not able to take care of her without your aid."

On hearing the wretch apply the term "witch" to Alice, a powerful and sudden blow—one swift as lightning—from the clenched fist of Maurice, brought the Fanatic with a heavy thud to the earth; and Huskins, considering that one of the elect had suffered at the hands of an emissary of the foul field, raised his heavy staff with a view to avenging the blow. Before the stroke had descended upon the head of Fitz Raymond, who was eyeing the prostrate form of the Fanatic, the witch-finder found himself in the Herculean grasp of John Langton, who had leaped forward when he observed what was about to occur.

All the whites were unarmed, and now as Sloucher regained his feet with the spirit of revenge rankling in his foul heart, the staff that before seemingly served to support his weary steps only, assumed, with extraordinary celerity, quite a new aspect, for, with one swift sweep of the sinewy arm of the Fanatic, a long, sharp and shining blade was drawn from it, with what intent it was easy to divine.

Maurice perceived his danger, and fell back a pace, when Sloucher, noting the embarrassment of Huskins, determined to relieve him through one deadly thrust. No sooner was this idea conceived, than the murderous villain bounded forward, but before he could deal the death-blow, an arrow pierced the wrist of the hand which held the weapon, while another passed clean through both his cheeks between his two hideous jaws.

The conflict was ended, but the day was dearly bought; for, without attaining any object in the interest of the two fugitives, Maurice had compromised himself in the eye of the law, and had consequently embarrassed all his efforts to serve Alice, and perhaps had jeopardized his own personal liberty.

Titmouse, Francis, Giles and the two Indians now appeared on the scene, and when they also were noted by Huskins and his wounded companion, there was nothing left for the two latter but to retrace their steps to the town as best they could; for the Fanatic, whose tongue appeared to have been terribly mangled, could not utter an intelligible word, and was bleeding profusely. Now, however, he sought to use his left hand in dealing Maurice a death stroke; for, no sooner had his weapon fallen to the ground, than he seized it again, but John Langton soon deprived him of the means of doing mischief, having relinquished his hold on Huskins, who had become quite dismayed, and snatched the deadly blade from the grasp of the intending assassin ere he had well clutched it.

The return of the volunteers so soon after their departure, was the cause of much murmuring amongst the people, and great dissatisfaction among the authorities. As Maurice had anticipated, his name was called in question, and there were those, on the Boston side of the river, who did not hesitate to designate him a traitor. On all sides, then, he was embarrassed; and now he felt that, as his liberty might be jeopardized at any moment, and as his assault upon the Fanatic would be resented, and if possible, punished by the Church or at common law, he would have to depend mainly upon the exertions and influence of Francis in this the hour of his dire extremity.

Fortunately for him, Francis was a near relative of Lady Phipps, the Governor's wife, and was, besides, held in the highest esteem by his excellency, as well as by almost every officer of what might be termed the vice-regal court. It was, therefore, considered advisable, in view of what had just taken place, as well as with respect to the persecution of Alice and Martha also, that he should at once call upon her ladyship, and seek also an interview with his Excellency in relation to the assault upon Sloucher, and what was of greater importance, the cruel treatment and abduction of Miss Ravenswood.

In truth so serious an aspect did the case now wear, that if the story of the Fanatic and Sloucher were not forestalled instantly, the probability was that before many hours, notwithstanding that neither Titmouse, Francis nor Giles took any part in the affray, all the active friends of Alice, save Robert and Florence, would be hurried away to prison. For so powerful and so popular were Sloucher and Huskins with some of the authorities, a simple hint from one or both of them was at times sufficient to work sudden and swift destruction, even where it was least expected.

When, therefore, the Indians and the ferryman had turned away, and the remainder of the party had reached the villa, without waiting to investigate anything about the tracks of the third horse, Francis at once set about preparing for a visit to the residence of the Governor, where he intended to lay the whole case of his friends and relatives before her ladyship, and immediately afterward before his Excellency himself.

When John Langton had disarmed the Fanatic, he threw his weapon away. The keen eyes of Titmouse followed the shining blade, and saw that it fell close to the path they should have to pursue in returning to the villa. He noted a huge tree beside which it descended, and falling back a little as the party were passing the spot, he picked up the gleaming steel and was surprised to perceive how large and yet light its handle was, which served also as the head of the Fanatic's staff. He noticed, in addition, that at one point there was an appearance as though the smooth, round knob screwed off, and, determined to test the case, he brought all his strength to bear upon it, when he found it yield in the manner he surmised it would. After repeated turns, he held what might be termed the lid in his hand, whose removal revealed a hollow compartment of about four inches in depth and one and a half in diameter. At the bottom of this there were about three inches of solid wood into which the blade of the weapon was screwed—the whole handle being about eight inches long.

This cavity contained some papers carefully folded, but of what character Titmouse did not pause to consider. He did not disturb them, but observing that the handle could be detached from the blade, or suspecting that such was the case, he instantly set to work, and perceiving a narrow split or crevice into a tree into which he could insert the steel the whole length, in a few moments he turned the handle free from it, and concealed it about his person. This accomplished, he quickly overtook the party ahead of him, who had not noted his absence, and as soon as he reached the villa, he beckoned Robert to a private conference, after the latter had been made acquainted with what had just occurred in relation to the Fanatic.

When alone with his trusty friend, the dwarf produced his supposed prize, and unscrewing the upper part of the head once more, disclosed the contents of the cunningly devised compartment, informing Robert that it was the handle of the weapon used by Sloucher, or in other words, that it was the upper part of the Fanatic's huge staff.

A glance at the document, assured Robert that the dwarf had made a most important discovery, and instantly the invalid and all the household were made aware of the fact. Mr. Ellencourt, who was standing beside Florence, was just about to leave the villa to pay the visit already mentioned, when his attention was suddenly arrested by the intelligence of the discovery, and by the contents of one of the papers which had been thrust into his hand by Maurice with an exclamation of the wildest surprise. Francis perused it hastily, and then bounded out of the apartment as if demented, and without uttering a single sentence to any one present, soon disappeared among the shrubbery.

In the meantime, Huskins had led the wounded Fanatic to the gloomy retreat in which Alice and Madge Gordon were now wondering at what could have induced so early a call on his part, for Madge had recognized the voice of the witch-finder. A knock at the outer door, however, apprised her of the return of the murderer of her child, and once more she arose to admit him, having first cautioned the fugitive to bolt the door of the apartment in which they had been seated after a long and at times restless night, and not to open it save to a demand made in her own voice.

It was no unusual thing for Huskins to meet Madge Gordon at the Fanatics'; so now, without remembering that he had not seen her when Sloucher had admitted him some time before, he at once led in his companion, a horrible picture to look upon. The blood was clotted about his huge jaws, and his tongue had swollen to such a size that he could not utter a single word or sound other than a low, smothered howl. Although much surprised at his appearance, there was no compassion in the heart of the woman for the wretch who had so darkened her life, for a thrill of fierce joy shot through her veins as the witch-finder related the encounter between him and Maurice, and the sudden manner in which the arrows of the Indians had terminated the contest.

The Fanatic, unable to stand, sank upon his straw pallet with a countenance where pain and fury were struggling for the mastery. There he lay, with his eyes glaring wildly about, and listening to the circumstantial story of the witch-finder. But on catching a whisper from Huskins to Madge, to the effect that he feared the arrows were poisoned, he broke forth into a hideous yell that made the witch-finder leap to his feet, and that caused Alice to almost faint away in the adjoining apartment.

Huskins sat long with him, but perceiving after a time that, from his agony or weakness, he could comprehend but little of what was said, he took his leave, promising to send a leech and call again, but determined in the meantime, as he said, to direct all his energies to the punishment of Maurice and his party, and to the apprehension of Martha Giles and Alice Ravenswood, for whom he averred to Madge, the rope was waiting, as well as for others who suspected it less but deserved it quite as much.

When Huskins disappeared, and Madge had closed and bolted the door after him, she gazed for a moment upon the monstrous features of the Fanatic, whose mouth was now terribly convulsed, and whose eyes seemed closed in intense agony. She could have almost pitied the villain for the sake of humanity, were it not that there suddenly rang in her ears the dying words of her child. These once heard, however, she turned abruptly away, and, calling in a low voice, was at once admitted into the apartment where Alice was now seated in a state of utter bewilderment and alarm.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Spiritualists' Festival.

The twenty-seventh anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was celebrated March 31st, in Republican Hall by a hall full of people of highly respectable material shape. The Committee of Arrangements were H. J. Newton, President of the society; J. Bisco, the Treasurer; J. V. Newbrough, M.D.; M. C. Smith, J. A. Cozino, Secretary, and as many ladies. Three musicians volunteered their solo services—Mr. J. Inch, on the piano; Mr. Withers, one of the San Francisco Minstrels, on the flute; and Mrs. Wieland, who executed the skylark, accompanied by both the flute and piano. Numerous large, fragrant bouquets and fifty or sixty star-spangled banners gave the hall an air of festivity.

The entire afternoon was occupied by the programme of speeches and music, and the evening from eight to twelve was given up to a social reunion and dancing. Dr. Hallock delivered the opening address. Mr. Lyman C. Howe occupied the place of speaker, and after several rapid passages of his hands, in which he seemed to brush himself away from his brain, he shut up his eyes and said that Spiritualism is heaven's Hercules. It is not yet a science, but we must remember how long it takes fragmentary knowledge to grow into a science; how long it took astrology to grow to astronomy, and alchemy to chemistry. Yet this twenty-seven years old child is destined to disintegrate the chemical fossils of the past. It has convinced thousands of persons that there is life beyond the grave; and this last year it has brought scientists to its feet, in loving devotion to the new and delightful discovery of an agreeable truth; which even every skeptic would rather believe than not.

J. V. Newbrough, M.D., said that the anniversary celebration commemorated the beginning of an era that will overturn the tyranny of priests.

After speeches by R. G. Eccles of Missouri, and E. V. Wilson, the congregation sang "Auld Lang Syne" and dispersed until the evening dance.

Obituary.

We are pained to record the death of Mrs. Betsey Tasker, wife of Thomas Tasker of Scott Township, Steuben county, Ind. Mrs. Tasker died on the 6th of March, and was buried on the 8th by the Patrons of Industry, of which Order she was an enthusiastic and efficient member. The funeral was one of the largest ever held in this county, and attested the esteem in which she was held by her large circle of acquaintances.

Mrs. Tasker was a native of England, where she lived until about twenty years ago, when she, with her husband and family emigrated to this country. Her age at the time of her death was about sixty years. She leaves her husband—the well-known and highly esteemed "Tommy"—and six children, all of whom have arrived at the age of maturity.

Mrs. Tasker was a kind and devoted wife and mother, and her children regarded her with that filial respect and veneration due a kind and worthy mother. Her long and happy married life was never marred by even the slightest family discord, and her relatives and friends feel that in her death a link has been dropped from the family and social circles which can never be restored.

She was a firm and consistent believer in the doctrines of Materialism all the years of her natural life, and died firm in the faith. She gently refused the "prayers" of many attending Christian friends during her long and painful illness, and bore her sufferings with a true martyr spirit, remaining conscious to her last moments. May she rest in peace.

C. S. H.

"Yes, boys," said Nancy Bell, a female blacksmith of Iowa, as she straddled a horse's leg and yanked off a shoe, "I was brought up to this business, and so was my mother; and there ain't no Beecher scandals in our family, for a fact."

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 333 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Bible.

NO. XXIV.

Among the stories in the Bible that may well be classed as improbable, is the strange one of Samson and his remarkable muscular strength. His history commenced before his birth or before he was begotten. An angel of God appeared unto his father and mother and predicted they should have a son, that he should be a Nazarite and no razor should touch his head. The woman in due time bore a son and he grew up and the "Lord blessed him."

As is common with other young men, he soon fell in love. He saw a young woman at Timnath, among the Philistines with whom he was well pleased, and he importuned his parents to go down and procure the young lady for him. They consented to do so. He accompanied them and while on the way a lion confronted them, but our young hero was not at all dismayed. His affection for the young Philistine damsel was so ardent as to make him immensely strong, and though the lion roared against him, and though he had no weapons of any kind, and "nothing in his hand," he rent the lion as he would have rent a young kid.

The lion is held to be a most formidable beast, and for agility, quickness and great strength he is not surpassed in the whole animal kingdom. It is remarkable that a young stripling, as Samson was at that time, unarmed, and without even the assistance of a walking-stick or club, could easily demolish the king of beasts. But as the book asserts it, we are perhaps not at liberty to doubt it.

He had the desired interview with the Philistine maiden, and they were mutually pleased with each other. On his return he stopped to look at the carcass of the lion, and found that bees had taken possession of it, and had already accumulated considerable honey, of which he freely partook and gave to his parents. The bees must have been pretty lively in their operations to have taken possession of the carcass and partly filled it with honey in so short a time, or Samson must have unduly protracted his stay with the maiden.

It may be inferred, also, that bees in those days were less fastidious about their dwelling-place than now. Modern bees are too nice and particular to have sweet, clean hives, to take the putrefying carcass of an animal for a home; nor would our bees permit a person to abstract their hard earnings without vigorously defending their property and severely stinging intruders.

Samson gave a riddle pertaining to the lion and the bees on a subsequent visit to the Philistines, and his young wife gave his visitors the solution, at which he was displeased, and the spirit of the Lord coming upon him, he went down to Ashkelon and slew thirty-seven men, and took their spoil and garments and divided them among those who solved the riddle, and his wife was also given away. It seems a little singular that the spirit of the Lord coming upon him should make him so murderous; but in those days God appears to have been particularly bloodthirsty. Slaughter and carnage seemed to please him better than anything else.

Samson's fox trick is worthy of notice. Wishing to injure the Philistines he caught three hundred foxes and tied them together, tail to tail, and placed a firebrand between every two tails, and after he had lighted the brands he let them go, and they ran through grain fields, setting fire to, and burning all the grain in shocks, all the standing grain and the vineyards and olives as well. Were this story anywhere else than in the Bible it would be pronounced silly and incredible. It is hardly probable a man could catch three hundred foxes, no matter how strong he might be. They are extremely shy and difficult to catch, and a man can hardly be found who could catch a single fox by himself, much less three hundred, and they to stand still while he tied their tails together and attached firebrands to them. It was cruel on the foxes, to say the least. It is not very likely standing grain, vineyards, and olive trees would be set on fire, even if foxes should thus run through them. Growing vines and trees are not easy to ignite. The sap in the twigs and green leaves renders them quite incombustible, and a brand going swiftly by would hardly affect them. The Philistines to be avenged for this cruel wrong took Samson's wife and her father and burned them with fire, all of which we should call a burning shame.

Samson greatly distinguished himself when his brethren bound him with strong cords and delivered him to his enemies, when he suddenly burst the cords and with the jaw-bone of an ass slew one thousand of them. It was indeed an ass-tonishing feat, and never before or since was an ass' jaw-bone known to do such service. What those thousand men were doing while a single man was beating them to death with a jaw-bone we can hardly imagine. It would seem some of them ought to have been able to get in a blow once in a while. That jaw-bone must have been a peculiar one, for after beating a thousand men to death with it, Samson being exhausted and thirsty, asked the Lord for a drink, whereupon "God clave a hollow in the jaw, and there came water thereout" and Samson refreshed himself. It is not often jaw-bones can be found with such fountains of water in them. That specimen of jaw-bone seemed capable of dispensing both life and death. The ass that owned it must have been remarkable, and the jaw-bone still more so.

Samson was probably satisfied with these achievements, for twenty years passed before we hear anything further relative to his feats of strength, until he went to Gaza and had intercourse with a prostitute, and when the Gazites would catch him, at midnight he got up and walked off with the gates and gate-posts of the city as an ordinary man would with an armful of oven-wood.

Like most men in modern times, he had a decided fondness for women, and they got him into great trouble. He fell in love with a fancy woman named Delilah and was fond of dallying with her, and going to sleep with his head in her lap. After a number of trials on her part to learn where his great strength lay, he misled her on several occasions, she at length wheedled him into divulging the secret that his great strength lay in his hair; so when he was again asleep she called in a barber or hair-cutter and had his head shaved clean, and alas, when he awoke he found his strength was gone. The Philistines easily took him and plucked his eyes out, bound him with fetters and made him grind in the prison-house.

But his hair at length grew out again, and he became strong as before; and when the Philistines gathered together in great numbers to offer sacrifice to their God, and to rejoice that he had delivered Samson unto them, he was called by the people to make sport for them.

He was placed between the main pillars of the temple; and while the building was full of men and women and three thousand were on the roof, he took one pillar in his right hand and the other in his left, and bowed himself with all his might, and the house fell upon the lords and upon the people, completely crushing them to death, and himself also.

Now we are free to say we do not believe this remarkable narration, which is detailed by an unknown person, with no corroboration or substantiation save that found in the Jewish scriptures. We do not believe the man ever lived who was able to take the columns of a large temple, one in each hand, and hurl the structure to the ground. It is too big a story for our credulity to accept as truth. There have been many strong, muscular men in the world, but none capable of performing such a feat as that, though their hair was ten feet in length. By the by, it is not in keeping with the known physiological laws that hair imparts immense strength, or that the loss of it produces weakness. There is no special connection between the hair and the muscles. The hair is a desirable covering for the head, and when well dressed is regarded as an ornament, and in health usually grows luxuriantly, but it was never known to impart muscular strength. 'Tis safe to judge of the past by what is known of the present.

Samson is often said to be a plagiarism or copy of Hercules, who was also a mythical character, to whom was imputed very remarkable strength, and who performed astonishing feats. In his infancy while still in the cradle he is said to have strangled venomous serpents, which the jealous Hera sent to destroy him. He is also famed for twelve prodigious exploits performed by himself called "labors," among which were the slaying of a hydra, a boar, a lion, the harpies and other monsters. He had a big club which he is said to have wielded in a most fearful manner. The cleansing of the Augean stables was a feat which has immortalized him. We see there are some points of resemblance between Hercules and Samson, especially in the leonine part of their history. Both had slain their lions. Both also seemed to have been susceptible to the influence of the softer sex. Hercules was enslaved by a passion for Omphale of Lydia who made him spin for her and wear her clothes. The influence she exercised over him was much the same that Delilah wielded over Samson; thus we see the strongest men are liable in some points to become very weak. Hercules was said to have come to his death by putting on a poisoned shirt given him as a love-charm by his false wife, who had received it from the centaur Nessus.

With the exception of Samson's last feat of pulling the temple down on the heads of ten thousand people with three thousand more upon the roof, Hercules was undoubtedly the greater man of the two, but in that crowning exploit in Samson's career there can be no doubt he threw Hercules completely into the shade. There is an old saying that "the one who tells the last story has the advantage."

While we accord to every person the right to believe either in Hercules or Samson if they choose to do so, we claim for ourselves the right to doubt. We cannot see that we have any more ground to believe there were such men, than Jack the giant-killer, or Sinbad the Sailor. Some unknown writers have stated that such persons once lived, and that is all we know about them. We are at liberty to believe in them, or not just as the proof strikes us. We of course will have to be classed among the unbelievers.

Christianity Examined.

NO. VII.

In our previous articles in this series, we have shown conclusively that the Christian religion had its prototype in India from one to three thousands years prior to the present era. We have seen that the name even of the Savior that the Hindoos worshiped at least four thousand years ago, was nearly the same in orthography and character as the head of the Christian Church. The incidents of their reputed origin, birth, life and death are very similar. We have seen also that the dogmas of the Christian religion were taught in India many centuries earlier than in Palestine. The crucifixion, the symbol of the cross, the monastery and many rites practiced by the Church were borrowed from the East.

All this, coupled with the great obscurity of the birth and life of Jesus, renders his existence problematical and mythical. It will be remembered he never wrote a line of his own life and history, and all we have touching the fact of such a person having lived is what we get from the four "evangelists," and when the facts of the case are duly considered, their testimony stands greatly in need of confirmation. There is no record that such books as Matthew, Mark, Luke and John were in existence till near two centuries after the time Jesus is said to have been born. Irenæus is the first Christian writer who refers to either of them, or mentions them, and that when the second century was well advanced. This is certainly presumptive evidence that they were not written or known till a long time after Jesus and those who lived at the time it is claimed he was on earth, were all dead and passed away. It must be seen at a glance that the authenticity of these books is of a very doubtful character, and much needs confirming before they can be taken as proof. In the early part of the Christian era numerous gospels were in existence, and many of them were known before the four gospels in the New Testament, but they were condemned as unreliable and uncanonical, and soon passed from notice. These facts prove that the writing of "gospels" was attempted by many persons, and that none of them were credible or trustworthy.

It is a most singular circumstance, if such a person as Jesus had an actual existence, and performed such wonderful miracles as raising the dead, making the dumb to talk, the blind to see and the lame to walk; if at his crucifixion the earth rent in twain and the sun was darkened three hours; if the dead who had been in their graves came forth and walked again with their former companions; if Jesus himself rose from the dead, and after remaining forty days with his disciples, then, in broad daylight, and in the sight of a large concourse of people, ascended up to heaven—we say if all these things occurred, it is singular no contemporaneous historians mentioned any of these facts. Though they were not Christians, they should have alluded to some of these events at least, and their not doing so casts additional suspicion upon the truthfulness of the story. True, in the writings of Josephus there is a single clause, detached and disconnected from the main text, saying, in substance, that about this time one Jesus lived and taught a new doctrine, and attracted some attention in Judea; but it is now admitted by the best Hebrew and Christian authorities, that this passage was never written by Josephus, but that it was interpolated into his writings without his authority and long after he was dead. The forgery is attributed to Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, one of the distinguished Christian Fathers, and who admitted he deemed it right to use falsehood and deception if good could be accomplished by it, and the true faith be established.

When we remember that all the early Christian writings were produced or manipulated by designing, unscrupulous men, who hesitated not to use fraud, if thereby they could accomplish their purpose, it is not strange if the confidence of those who understand the facts is shaken in the reliability of such early records.

That the system of Christianity is made up of Judaism and Paganism, is easily demonstrated. Its Deity, Jehovah, it took from Judaism, its Moses, its prophets and its sacred writings it took from the same source. Its Devil and hell it got partly from Judaism and partly from Paganism—the latter being doubtless the original source whence Judaism obtained it. The doctrine of the trinity, an incarnated son of God, a vicarious atonement by death on the cross, are of Pagan origin. The idea of a life of self-denial, abstemiousness and deprivation was borrowed from the Therapeuts and Essenes that existed in Syria, Egypt, and somewhat in Judea long before the time of Christ.

Into this composite creed was also blended some of the doctrines of Plato and other Grecian philosophers. That this was the fact, we will substantiate by a few quotations from some of the early Christian writers and "Fathers."

Justin Martyr, born in the first century, after studying the philosophies of Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle and Zeno, became a Christian, and in his "Apology," addressed to Antoninus Pius, says: "If, then, we hold some opinions near akin to those of the poets and philosophers in most repute among you, why are we thus unjustly hated? For, in saying that all things were made in this beautiful manner by God, what do we seem to say more than Plato? When we teach a general conflagration, what do we teach more than the Stoics? By declaring the Logos, the first begotten of God, our master Jesus Christ, to be born of a virgin, without any human mixture, to be crucified and dead, and to have risen again and ascended into heaven, we say no more in this than what you say of those whom you style the sons of Jove. For you need not be told what number of sons the writers most in vogue among you assign to Jove. There is Mercury, Jove's interpreter, Æsculapius, Bacchus and Hercules. As to the Son of God, called Jesus, should we allow him to be no more than man, yet the title of the Son of God is very justifiable on account of his wisdom, considering you have your Mercury in worship under the title of the Word and Messenger of God. As to our Jesus being born of a virgin, you have your Perseus to balance that; as to his curing the lame, the paralytic and such as were cripples from their birth, this is little more than what you say of your Æsculapius."

Tertullian, a noted Father recognizing the similarity between heathenism and Christianity, tried to cast the plagiarism thus upon the heathens. "The heathens, from a design of curiosity put our doctrines into their works."

Melito, Bishop of Sardio in Lybia, in writing to Marcus Antoninus, said: "The philosophy which we profess truly flourished aforetime, but having blossomed again in the great reign of Cæsar Augustus, thy ancestor, it proved to be above all things ominous of good for thy kingdom."

Origen, the most eminent among the Christian Fathers, admitted the same thing in his reply to Celsus.

St. Clement of Alexandria, wrote in the same vein.

Eusebius, most conspicuous among the early Fathers, hesitated not to admit the same facts, by saying, "Christianity reveals nothing new to mankind," and explains the same upon the hypothesis that "the Devil stole the Christian doctrines and gave them to the Pagan poets and philosophers." In his Ecclesiastical History, Book I. chap. 4, he asserted that the religion of Christ contained nothing new or strange, and that all good men who had lived in the past were good Christians.

We will defer further quotations at this time, but many more of early Christian authorities can be adduced to the effect that they did not claim the Christian religion to be new, but to be made up of the systems which had preceded it.

Investigating Spiritualism.

We have received the following letter from a patron:

VISTULA, IND., March 16th. 1875.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In your issue for March 1st, I noticed an account of your visit to Dr. Slade, the medium. There are several persons in this neighborhood who would be pleased to have you give Spiritualism a thorough investigation, and if it be a humbug, we should all very much like to know it; and if there is a reality in it, let us know that too. Visit Slade, Mansfield and all such mediums and watch well their modus operandi of Spiritual manifestations, and let us know "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth."

If you will give Spiritualism a thorough investigation, I am certain you will greatly augment the circulation of your paper in all parts of the country. Yours for the cause of Truth and Liberal principles,

DELBERT S. IVINS.

We respectfully reply to our friend. In the first place, we have not the time to visit all the mediums in this city and investigate them. It requires our attention sixteen hours a day to the duties we have assumed in getting up this sheet, worthy the attention of our numerous readers, together with the various details connected therewith.

Secondly, we have not the disposition to run after mediums. With all due respect to our Spiritualistic friends, we must say, as a rule we regard it as a waste of time and money. We are satisfied there are honest and worthy mediums in whom confidence can be placed, but the thousand and one of them all over the country who are puffing and advertising themselves as remarkable "test mediums," "healing mediums," "writing mediums," "speaking mediums," "trance mediums," "materializing mediums," "inspirational mediums," "physical mediums," and numerous other kinds of mediums, and who are trying their best to induce people to run after them and "shell out" their money to them, are enough to disgust the sensible portion of the public with the whole business. There is so often a species of charlatany and pretension connected with it, as to be positively nauseating to candid people.

We have much to say in favor of Spiritualists. Many of them have had the moral bravery to come out in opposition to the superstitions of olden times and pronounce in favor of truth and progress. They are an active, enthusiastic people, willing to work in earnest in advancing free thought, and they have accomplished more than any other element in our country in exposing and breaking down the tyranny of priestcraft and superstition. The majority of them are good Liberals, but from many of them we are compelled to differ. We think Spiritualists, as a class, are gullible, and too readily swallow whatever purports to come from spirits or the spirit world. On the other hand, we presume many Materialists are too "hard-headed," prejudiced and unfair. We have come to think an unbeliever can be bigoted as really as an Orthodox. A true liberal sentiment toward those who differ from us, and who arrive at opposite conclusions from ourselves, is a difficult achievement to accomplish.

We entertain the conviction that there is something real in what are called "spiritual manifestations." Though a large portion of it may be "bogus," there is often a force apparent that cannot be ignored. Whether these phenomena are produced by spirits, or whether they are the result of subtle powers of the mind and will, not yet fully understood, is a problem still unsolved.

We have to report a second visit to Dr. Slade, with a friend, when demonstrations occurred similar to those which took place at our first visit, with this addition—we placed ourselves upon the table, while Dr. Slade and our friend held their hands upon the top of it. We soon began to feel ourselves raised. We were three times lifted clear of the floor, table and all, and when we came down the jar was very perceptible, as if we had dropped a little distance. Our avoirdupois being one hundred and sixty-five pounds, the lift for the invisible power, whatever it may be, was not inconsiderable. The names of our father and other deceased friends were written on the slate, without out any visible hand touching the slate. We satisfied ourselves there was no trickery about the table, and that the lifting was fairly done. What the power is that performs the work, we do not pretend to say. As there is an intelligence connected with the manifestations, which seems not to be controlled by persons present, the Spiritualistic theory appears the more rational one; but the difficulty of understanding how a spirit can exist after the body is dead, how human beings, whose beginnings as individual organizations date back but a few decades become immortal, has not yet been surmounted.

Admitting, however, for the moment, that we are immortal—that we have a continued existence after this coarser body is laid in the grave, it by no means proves that we ought to spend our time in straining our eyes to see what is "beyond," or to be running after every person who pretends to be a "medium" to try and find out what and where the other world is. The accounts we get are so contradictory and often so absurd that it is idle to place confidence in them. With all that mediums can tell us; with all that spirits—so-called—can impart to us, we really know little about the "other life," and cannot, until we go there.

While our home is in this world, our work and our duty are here. There is enough in sight that we can easily know and comprehend to occupy all our earthly life, all our powers and abilities, without seeking to look into another world. It is far wiser to live for this life, while we are in it, to devote all our energies and all our strength to improving the condition of ourselves and those around us, than to give any considerable portion of our time in trying to discover what the future life has in store for us. There is great need in this world of suffering humanity, in the imperfect conditions of the race, the numerous defects of society, the wants of the poor, the needy and the ignorant to occupy all our time, all our benevolent motives and aspirations, all our attention, all our talents and all our strength without diverting our thoughts to that which is entirely beyond the reach of our vision.

Instead of living for the other world, let us live for this. Let us try to improve it to the extent of our power, and to make it as near a heaven as possible. Let us try to elevate ourselves, and to benefit our fellow beings in every way we can. If every person would make it his business to beautify this world and to contribute to the happiness of those living in it, it would certainly be a most excellent way to pass our lives, and if there is another existence after this, in no way can we better prepare ourselves for it, than in doing the best we can while here.

Science is what the world needs to-day—knowledge that will teach us how to live this life usefully, healthfully and happily. We need practical, worldly, every-day, matter-of-fact knowledge pertaining to the things of this life, far more than about angels or the spirits of our grandmothers, the kind of food

(Continued on Eighth Page.)

(Continued from No. 13.)

The Jews and their God.

BY ISAAC PADEN.

CHAPTER VII.

The idea that progression is limited to this life is a small idea of a God. As for the present condition of things, the character and standing of mediums, together with the spirit world and the manifestations therefrom. Kind reader, if you will grant us the privilege of presenting to you our best mediums, and the best spiritual manifestations, the same as has been done with the Jewish records, (rejecting thousands,) we give you a record corresponding with civilization, far in advance of that of the past, beaming with love and good-will to man, flowing forth from the spiritual mansions of heaven to the elevation of man on earth.

We now sum up our case, and after a thorough search we fail to find evidence in favor of the Jews and their God, in a moral or refined sense, "and why should we, if our positions be true?" But in shedding of human blood, and the destruction of life and property, if this be a proof of greatness and moral goodness, we yield the point. But as this is no credit to man in civilization, how can it be to a God? A king or ruler that kills off at least one-half of his subjects to frighten the other half into obedience, and fails at that, proves he lacks wisdom, and is not worthy to be a ruler. This is our honest logical conclusion, theology with all its anathemas notwithstanding.

Here our Christian friends may meet us by claiming we are judging God in the capacity of a man, which is not a parallel case, "for God's ways are not man's ways, neither are man's ways God's ways." This we cheerfully admit, but ask, where is the difference? Are God's ways above or below man's ways? Can a king do an act that would disgrace a subject and not tarnish his own character? We think not. We readily admit, man and his ways are far below God and his ways; similar to that of a child and its father. Should a father stoop to do childish acts, he would degrade himself and dishonor his fatherhood. This claim, when properly applied, adds proof to our position.

We also admit, to charge Abraham, Moses and all the Jewish prophets are lying impostors, who speak of spiritual personages, is that which we are not warranted to do under the existing circumstances. It would give the lie to all nations, including many individuals whose characters, for truth and veracity, are above impeachment, such as Job, Zoroaster, Cicero, Plato, Socrates, Confucius and many others among the heathen nations, and many worthy men in our day, such as Swedenborg, Judge Edmonds and thousands of others, all men of truth, who say they saw and conversed with spiritual personages face to face.

On the other hand, to say all that the Jews claimed is strictly true applied to Deity, is equally unwarranted and absurd. The first gives the lie to truthful men of all nations, past and present; the latter would be absurd and a disgrace to a civilized God, and has no corroborating evidence.

Therefore the chain of three positions is before us. First. Discard all human testimony, past and present, in relation to the existence of spiritual personages and spirit power.

Second. That God, whose power and greatness fills immensity of space, was, and is, (unless changed) subject to all the passions and attributes of an uncivilized and savage king of the lowest grade.

Third. That the statement of the Jews, together with other nations, in reference to the existence of spiritual personages and spirit power are in the main true, inasmuch as it accords with the claims of this our day.

Therefore, taking all things into consideration, past and present, we assume the responsibility to say the Jews were mistaken in their man-God, the personage who appeared to Abraham, Moses and others, and by them seen and talked with, appearing in every sense a man, in form, shape, size and features, and in fact was a man having only passed into spirit life, possessing a spiritual body, yet grasped for more power and affluence, with the sole object of excelling all other Gods like himself.

This accounts for his jealousy. A God who is Almighty, in fact has nothing to be jealous of; jealousy arises only where there is fear of rivalry. This man-God idea runs throughout Christendom, as well as heathendom, as can be seen as to the man Jesus, who is now a spiritual personage, and by the Christians declared to be their God, claiming his presence in spirit in their revival meetings, similar to that of the Hindus and other nations do for their God. As for justice and moral goodness, the Christians have no reason to be ashamed of their God [Jesus Christ]; that which he taught and practiced was, in every sense, a great improvement in moral goodness, as well as in civilization. Nowhere is he heard cursing the earth for man's sake, neither do we hear of him bragging, "I am a man of war; I shall stir up jealousy like a man of war." "Yea, I will cry like a woman in travail to destroy and devour at once; I am a jealous God, and vengeance is mine, and I will repay." "I will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh." What can be more savage? Such a disposition carried out would disgrace a Nero.

King George of England, whom our fathers rebelled against in all his tyranny, was far in advance in civilization to this. But Jesus, unlike the Jewish God, his teachings were seasoned with moral goodness and universal brotherhood. Should his worshipers be more like him, they would be more consistent; but, as it is, they mix up their God with the Jewish God, and call the plural one. Thus you see a mixture of brotherly love and human kindness combined with hate, bigotry, persecution, hell and endless damnation. It is quite common for theologians to quote all the law and dastardly acts and sayings of the heathen nations and their gods, without calling in question their many good acts and sayings, in order to give favor on the side of the Jews and their God. This is unfair and dishonest on the part of theology.

Be assured, kind reader, the imperfections of the heathen nations (as they are called) and their Gods did not exceed that of the Jews and their God; neither did the moral goodness and human kindness of the Jews and their God excel that of the heathen. But it is reasonable to believe many of those whom the Jews and Christians call "blind heathens," will stand before the judgment seat of justice on equal grounds with many who acknowledge the Jewish God and call Abraham their father. In this have I not got the man Jesus to back me, who said to the Jews, it would be more tolerable (that is, better) for Sodom and Gomorrah (two Gentile or heathen cities that had been engulfed by a fiery volcano) than for you Jews. Having now, dear reader, presented to your views a position, perhaps somewhat new or strange, and upon first thought may appear absurd; nevertheless, I have written out a few thoughts on this important subject with care and honest candor, knowing, assuredly, there is a mistake of great magnitude in the claims of theology. But if that which I have written does not carry upon its face a reconciliation of the sayings and doings of the Jews and their God, that no other position can do, then you may condemn. But if I have done honor to the God of the Universe, by discharging him of the authorship of so many low and degrading acts, charged by the Jews to their God, which would be a disgrace to any man or king in civilization, please give me credit for that at least. I have no anathema, to pronounce upon you for your disbelief, should you do so, neither have I praise or reward to bestow for your adhering to my theory; I consider you are your own master in this matter, and it is each and every one's individual right to exercise their best judgment. Therefore pause, reflect, consult justice, true honor and honesty, seasoned with good common sense; then decide.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

The Romance of Worlds.

Not quite a hundred years ago, an English astronomer found a world. It was christened Herschel.

Somebody, or somebody else has been and done and gone and nicknamed that world Uranus.

I think that somebody, or somebody else was very presuming.

Astronomers discover that this Johnny Bull world, not wholly unlike some folks in general, was subject to periodic flirtations—and noted them.

The immortal Leverrier, taking range by the notes, so pointed the long glasses as to detect the attractor, and behold another world!! of the feminine persuasion, I suppose. Right here I am minded of my own experience—early childhood experience.

On the top of a barn, a little girl, some years below her teens, dressed like a little lady, attracted my attention. Full of glee, she glided from eaves to ridges, and back and forth in all directions like a squirrel and a bird. Her love of adventure was at high carnival.

"Great souls,

By nature half-divine, soar to the stars

And hold near acquaintance with the gods."

Children and youth love as angels. May be worlds do so.

"The angels watch the good and innocent,

And where they gaze, it must be glorious."

Was Miss Landon wide of the mark in saying:

"Love is of heavenly birth,

But turns to death on touching earth?"

Among the didactics of my childhood was the following:

"The greatest pleasure in life is Love." Who will say it is not?

Does Love turn to dust on touching earth? An important question! My sainted mother taught me to keep it on the wing. No use, of course, to put me on the witness-stand.

What, for near a score of centuries, has been palmed upon the world as Religion, is now on trial before the tribunal of enlightened public sentiment. The next question on the calendar, to be brought before that high court of Judicature, is, can Love—the genuine article—touch earth, the animal plane, and retain its vitality?

'Tis not mine to say who shall take the witness-stand, nor that they will or will not be competent before the expiration of the honey-moon.

As in the Religion aforesaid, the cloak of imputed righteousness is in requisition, to cover over a multitude of sins, who can say and speak advisedly, that the so-called "holy bands of matrimony" are not desecrated by practices not nominated in the bond to reproduce the likeness of God? And who can say that much of such desecration is not the result of abnormal passions, superinduced by unphysiological meats, drinks and narcotics?

Will it always be so? It will not. The old earth must pass away, as well as the old heavens. The elements are already melting with fervent heat. We must have a new earth, as well as new heavens—a new reproductive order, wherein the highest trust vouchsafed to man will be held sacred—free from contamination.

Love, of a second quality, may touch this new earth and retain a measure of vitality.

Love, of the first quality, exists in the new heavens only. PRENTISS.

Abbot's "New Views" in Denial of the Doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:—Mr. Abbot says that the unexpected interest taken in his criticisms, on Tyndall and Spencer, will possibly embolden him to express some "new views" in support of his absolute denial of the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge, and the distinction on which it rests, of noumena and phenomena, with special reference to Spencer's doctrine of the Unknowable. He says that Spencer has borrowed the foundation of his doctrine "in substance directly from Sir W. Hamilton." Hamilton says, that the "great axiom," that the reality existing behind all appearances is, and ever must be, unknown, has been subscribed to by every thinker of note, from Protagoras to Kant; but, Abbot says, all these thinkers, to whom may be added Tyndall, Owen, Max Mueller and Stuart Mill, have run their "heads into a mudbank for the purpose of seeing the world to greater advantage;" and, he says, "whoever can detect the flimsiness of those portions of Hamilton's philosophy, which Spencer has made the essential basis of his own philosophy, will see that it will not stand."

Already it has become not modified but rejected by every thinker "who refuses to juggle with Spencer's "empty gibberish" about the Unknowable.

Abbot says that the present state of science, as to whether we know, or merely infer, the existence of an external world, and what the objects composing it really are in themselves, demands a new philosophy "to advance it beyond the bog in which it seems just now stuck fast." On these great philosophical problems, he says, the great religious questions of the day really turn, viz: Does God exist, or not? and if God exists, can man know God? Tyndall in his late address "craved the gracious patience" of his audience, while he made a brief reference to the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge. Quoting Mill, who said that "the question of an external world is the great battle-ground of metaphysicians, and who affirmed that all we know of external objects is that there are "permanent possibilities of sensation," from which we infer that their cause is an external reality? Tyndall remarks, that when I say that I see you, and that I can check my sight by touching you, Kant and Mill would tell him that he is "transgressing the limits of fact;" for all that he is really conscious of is, that his optic nerves, and the nerves of his hand have undergone a change; that all that he sees and touches, tastes and smells are merely variations in his own condition. "That anything answering to our impressions exists out of ourselves is not a fact, but an inference, to which all validity would be denied by an Idealist like Berkeley, or by a skeptic like Hume;" and, Tyndall says, "it is by no means easy to combat such notions."

But while Tyndall cannot deny that this is the extent of his consciousness, he has the conviction that his states of consciousness are caused by external objects, and Mill, and others, wish merely to insist on the limits of what is really knowable. Tyndall says that "Spencer takes another line. With him, as with the uneducated man, there is no question or doubt as to the existence of an external world. But he differs from the uneducated, who think that the world really is what consciousness represents it to be. [Spencer says.] Our states of consciousness are mere symbols of an outside entity, which produces them, and determines their order of succession, but the real nature of which we can never know." Abbot calls this "unmeaning jargon," and says that Tyndall is confusing the public mind with it.

Abbot rejects the doctrine of the Hypothetical Realists, who are divided by Hamilton into two classes, one of which held that the immediate object of perception is a representative entity present to the mind, and not a mere mental modification; among them are Democritus, Epicurus, Malebranche, Berkeley, Clark, and Newton. The other class held that the immediate object of perception is a representative modification of the mind itself; which means the same as Mill means in explaining his idea of the Relativity of Knowledge, "that our knowledge of objects, and even our fancies about objects, consist of nothing but the sensations which they excite, or which we imagine them exciting in us. The mind forms a representation of the object, but the representation formed is obviously unlike the object. This has been said by Platonists, by Leibnitz, Arnauld, Descartes, (probably) Locke, Kant, and Brown; but according to Abbot all these thinkers, as well as Tyndall and Spencer, have run their heads into a mudbank, and so cannot see, as he does, that things external are knowable as they are in themselves.

Abbot says that the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge, has been borrowed from Kant by Hamilton, by Mansell from Hamilton, and by Spencer from Mansell, and that the method of illustrating it has degenerated at each remove. It is certain that Hamilton introduced perplexity into the subject, for now—he clearly asserted it, and then argued against it; but Spencer has restored the doctrine in accordance with the original purpose of Kant, which was to define the limitations of knowledge, and to prove the relativity of all conceptions. Mill says “that the doctrine for which Hamilton has been so often praised, and nearly as often attacked, was only verbally held by him,” and that it was not “the matured conviction of a scientific mind.” “In metaphysics he was too often a polemic, rather than a connected thinker,” who would snatch up any doctrine as a weapon to strike a hard blow at an opponent, though it shook the foundation of his own philosophy. If he once held the doctrine of the Relativity of all Knowledge, viz: that, “Of things absolutely, or in themselves, be they external or internal, we know nothing;” that, “as substances, we know not what Matter is, and are ignorant of what is Mind;” he afterwards, as Mill says, when it had served his purpose, abandoned it, and “did hold, as one of the main elements of his philosophic creed, the opposite doctrine, of an immediate knowledge of external things, in certain of their aspects as they are in themselves, absolutely.”

Abbot resembles Hamilton, in some of his modes, more than Spencer does. Abbot denies “absolutely the doctrine of the Relativity of all Knowledge,” but says to “absolute certitude we make no pretence;” he admits that from the imperfections of our faculties, our knowledge of objects must necessarily be incomplete; but incomplete knowledge is knowledge; “and that the philosophy that resolves it into ignorance is a mockery of intelligence.” If Abbot does not, as Hamilton did, regard Belief as superior to Knowledge, he uses them as equivalent terms. Hamilton says, “We know the external world.” If asked how do we know that our perception of an external and extended object is numerically different from us? or how do we know that it is not a mere mode of mind (or modification of the nervous system) illusively presented to us as a mode of matter? Hamilton says we do not know that the object, we are compelled to perceive as not-self, is not a perception of self; but on reflection, from an original necessity of our nature, we believe that the object is external. (All the advocates of the Relativity of Knowledge admit, with Hume, that we have “beliefs as to external objects,” and frame all our actions upon our beliefs, but they make the distinction that belief is not knowledge.) Mill says, “With Hamilton, Belief is ultimate, is a higher source of evidence than Knowledge,” which is derivative and rests on Beliefs. How can knowledge rest on mere belief? Mill says, that in common language Knowledge means complete conviction. Belief incomplete conviction; and that a philosophy, which, in opposition to common usage, bestows upon a less certain conviction the appellation of knowledge, is an example how mere forms of logic and metaphysics can blind mankind to the total absence of their substance. This is what Abbot appears to do on this subject.

Abbot says, Science “means that the human mind is in a directly cognitive relation to the realities of nature,” but how to explain this direct knowledge “is a question too profound to be raised here; but the general position, at least, it is quite time to state when such able and ingenious writers as Youmans and Fiske” undertake to defend the feeble and valueless part of Spencer's system which deals with the Unknowable, I think that it is quite time that Abbot expressed his “new views of ‘Noumena and Phenomena’” in relation to the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge, to help the philosophers to get their heads out of the mudbank into which they have run them.

Buechner is one of the thinkers who has avoided this. He says that Modern Science has taken the first step in the doctrine of a Philosophical Realism, of “the true essence of things”; and that it is incomprehensible how so acute a thinker as Lange can oppose Materialism, and support Kant's distinction of noumena (things in themselves) and phenomena (their appearances in our various states of consciousness). Now what is Modern Science? Abbot says, “Science is a fact of more importance than the mere co-ordination of seriated states of consciousness.” But even Lewes, who is an apostate on this question, shows that science is but a colligation of a series of states of consciousness. Buechner says that “Philosophical Materialism has driven Philosophical Spiritualism out of the field, and that is now skulking alone in the hope of regaining lost territory.” Buechner would call Abbot's doctrine Philosophical Spiritualism.

Lewes, in his “Problems of Life and Mind,” rejects inconsistently, I think, Kant's distinction of noumena and phenomena, except as a convenient artifice in classification, but he does not deny the Relativity of Knowledge. He says that those who yearn for knowledge not relative, and affirm that the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge is a cheat and a sham, as Abbot says it is, “cheat themselves with phrases.” Relative Knowledge, he says, is all we need, and that a science or co-ordination of appearances is sufficient for all our wants; and it is all we have. Lewes does not see that Philosophy gains any refuge from difficulties by invoking the Unknowable, though it may admit its existence. He agrees with those who reject Spiritualism, and with those who reject Materialism, but does not agree with them in their conclusion that we know nothing of Mind or Matter; he believes, as Tyndall does, that Mind is a function of Matter; and he says that we know a good deal of both. Abbot says that Matter and Mind may prove to be one—to be but the manifestations of an Omnipresent Energy, or “the Executive side” of a God of reason and of goodness. Do you understand that?

Yours, respectfully, JOHN CHAPPELLSMITH.
New Harmony, Ind., March 10th, 1875.

The Christianity of Poland.

Poland is perhaps the most benighted, be-clouded, be-priested, be-crossed and be-crucified country I know of. The people are better provided with crucifixes and images than with food. Bread used to be, and still is a luxury with most of the working class and peasants. Their principal food consists of the roughest kind, such as soups, called baszaz, with potatoes and cabbage. But often they have not even that, although food is what we should consider very cheap; potatoes, for instance, are not quite half a shilling per bushel. The people are moneyless, except among the aristocracy. It is enough for them to have religion, and it is not surprising that they are physically starving.

You cannot walk a distance of twenty rods without seeing some rough piece of besmeared wood, with a bit of muslin or rag over it perhaps, before which old and young prostrate themselves, and worship it as the Virgin Mary. On the road corners you will find three crosses, representing Jesus and his two dishonest companions. On the cross of Jesus you find a hammer, pinchers, dagger and other instruments of torture; also, thirty pieces of silver, showing, I suppose, what a fool Judas was for selling Jesus so very cheap. But the priests now make Jesus pretty dear to their adherents. In towns of five or six thousand inhabitants, there may be found ten or twelve churches, each of a different order. You see monks coming out of their convents on market days, to get a few farthings from the peasants. You see beggars, blind, lame and dumb, in the market, some playing fiddles and singing the praises of the Virgin. Most of the time the priest is engaged in praying for the souls of the departed friends of those who drop him a farthing. But the approach of a new comer causes him, even in the midst of a prayer, to leave it unfinished for the fresh comer. The Polishman, having to pass a church, takes his hat off a considerable distance before reaching it, and sometimes crosses himself. The Jew, equally superstitious, stops his ears as he passes the church lest he should hear the blasphemous Christian organ.

In this country almost all the Catholics go once or twice on a pilgrimage to a city called Czestachow, it being to the Virgin what Jerusalem was to Jehovah. In that city the priests play tricks upon the people, which they call miracles. These pilgrims are of the poorest class, and sometimes go hundreds of miles on foot. The sick, the blind and the afflicted are among the number. Some die by the way—these are supposed to have been unworthy of entering the sacred city. Some die after entering, and go to heaven. Some come back uncured, and remain to be converted and cured by miracles.

The shops must be closed on holy days and while funerals pass. No Jew dare show himself on the days when processions pass the streets. Many a time have I seen a Jew caught in some corner by these pious savages and killed or terribly maimed, but they were never called to account for it. This state of things lasted till after the Polish Revolution in 1864.

Although these people are so pious, they know little about what the book of holy absurdities contains. They are not acquainted with the following stories: About the Lord coming down to have a cup of tea and a piece of veal at Abraham's house, and disputing with his wife about the wonderful pickling of Mrs. Lot; the indecent angels entering into Lot's daughters; Jehovah curing the world by a cold bath; Noah's celebrated menagerie; Jacob wrestling with God, and God getting exhausted, asking Jacob to let him go home, but Jacob having the Jewish instinct for bargaining, and perceiving at the same time that Jehovah had no breeches on, and could consequently have no money about him, asked for a blessing; Moses' excellent little boat on the River Nile; the holy ass perceiving an angel and questioning Balaam; the species of clumsy foxes that could so easily be caught by an old Nazarite—a species that even Mr. Darwin has failed to discover, for he only knows of swift ones; a son being only ten years younger than his father; the Lord's wholesale lying into Ahab; Elisha's greedy bears; Isaiah's wonderful wench, after having a child, was yet a virgin; Ezekiel's distasteful dinner; Jonah taking up his quarters in a whale; Solomon, the great debauchee, that puts Brigham Young to blush.

But most of the Polish Catholics are acquainted with the stories of Jesus being far from a drug store, and obliged to make his own drugs, such as the ointment of spittle and dust to cure eyes; about Peter cursing and swearing in order to fulfil a prophecy; Jesus chasing the devils into about two thousand pigs, and others of the same character.

Napanee, Ont.

MAXIMILIAN FOX.

True Reform.

The triumph of science and reason over ignorance and superstition is certain, but is it certain that under the new order of things, virtue will triumph over vice, and honesty over cunning and deceit? Is it certain that, in proportion as men become wise, they will become good? At first thought there would seem to be reason for answering these questions in the affirmative, for the light of reason alone is sufficient to teach us that wisdom and goodness are allied, and that only in their complete union and development can man attain to his highest estate and secure his truest happiness.

The problem of human destiny is, however, one that can hardly be solved by abstract reasoning. What men will do under given circumstances, can only be inferred from what they have done under other and similar circumstances, and judging thus, it is not safe either to assert that the destruction of superstitious forms of religion will assuredly lead to higher forms, or that increased intelligence will be accompanied by anything like a corresponding increase of moral perception or of virtuous living.

Man is a being in process of development from a very low condition, and his conduct at each successive stage depends upon his physical organization at that time. The brain is the organ of the mind. A man of low moral organization, however intelligent or well educated he may be, will be dishonest. You may convince him intellectually that “honesty is the best policy,” but the tendencies of his undeveloped nature will assert themselves in every moment of temptation, just as the appetite of an old toper asserts itself in spite of all his good resolutions, whenever the intoxicating cup is presented to him.

The true work of reform is that of careful and scientific culture, the culture which the parent bestows upon the child, including all pre-natal influences, and the voluntary self-culture of maturity. With persons not thus developed, the rejection of an ancient superstition only gives room for some modern one, or leads to that deplorable negative condition in which “liberalism” is but another word for indifference. Science is positive. Its true sphere is that of discovering and applying truth. It sets to work upon its own ground, erects its own structures, plants its own vineyard and enjoys the fruit of its labor. If attacked, it knows how to defend itself in short and decisive encounters, quickly returning to its appropriate work. Its boast is not that it has laid waste the fields of its neighbors, but that it has diligently cultivated its own, and its converts are not simply those who have been convinced of the unfruitfulness of their own soil, but rather those who, though measurably contented with their old homes, have looked upon the still more abundant products of a higher and more practical culture, and have thus been won over to it in the spirit of love and by the all-conquering power of reason. Laboring thus mainly to promote the good, and to exhibit its results rather than to destroy the evil, we may feel assured that when decaying forms have accomplished their full mission, and passed away, their places will be filled with something better, and that the advent of modern science shall prove in the end to have been the most glorious of all the revelations that have been made to man.

B.

Anniversary.

On Thursday, March 25th, the Land Reform Association of New York, held in the parlors of Dr. C. S. Weeks, 26th street, their 31st Anniversary of the birth of George Henry Evans, and of his conception of every human being's natural right to a share of the soil for an equal, inalienable and individual homestead, subject to no liability to become alienated by any debt, sale, tax, mortgage, etc., but only to be exchanged for each other, so as to keep every family on earth in the ownership of a home. William Rowe, President, in the chair, with J. K. Ingalls Secretary; H. Beeny, Treasurer, proceeded to business, when L. Masquerier read an address upon the merits of Evans and of the principles of Land Reform. Thomas Ainge Devry, who conceived the idea also of a man's natural right to a share of soil, (in seeing the curse of the landlอร์ดry and tenure system in his native Ireland,) at the same time with Evans, was present and gave his views on the subject. Resolutions were passed that the Land Reform measures be passed upon and discussed in the anniversary meetings as usual, and that exertions be continued to erect a monumental bust to Evans in one of our parks. Thus, while the clergy endeavor to get homes for all in heaven, we, Land Reformers, endeavor to get inalienable ones on earth, instead of alms-houses, poor-houses, prisons and soup-houses for the destitute.

L.M.

(Continued from Fifth Page.)

we shall eat, the quality of dry-doods we shall wear, and the songs we shall sing when our bodies, like old John Brown's, "lie mouldering in the grave."

We have reason and intellect to guide us; let us depend on these rather than on the spirits of our grandfathers and uncles. It is a mistake to suppose spirits know better how to manage the affairs of this world than those who are living here, or that they are more competent to give advice as to worldly affairs.

We would not prohibit any one from consulting spirits who wish to do so, but we think we know some people who run after spirits and mediums about the most common affairs of life quite too much, throwing away their own judgment and setting aside their own reason. We consider this extremely unwise, and while it dwarfs the mind and sinks the individuality, it is productive of no possible good. We have noticed that those who consult the spirits on every occasion, succeed no better in business, and manage their affairs with no more discretion than those who depend solely upon their own resources.

It has been the bane of the world that its inhabitants have lived too much for another existence, while they have neglected the immediate affairs of this. The future life is all very well, if kind nature vouchsafes such a boon to us, but by all means let us defer the duties of that state until we get there, and attend instead, to the urgent demands upon us here. We repeat, in no way can we so well prepare for an after life as by doing all in our power to make this a happy one.

In ancient feticism, when extreme ignorance ruled the world, it was thought good or bad spirits presided over and controlled the affairs of life. The fears and superstitions of men were of the most degrading character. It is to be regretted if, in this advanced age, any of this miserable superstition is to be retained by those who otherwise are intelligent and enlightened.

Nay, friends, Spiritualists and Materialists alike, let us keep our minds upon the things of this life, let us find out all we can about this world and every thing that pertains to it, let us store our minds with the truths of science and all the facts of our existence. Let us aim to make life pleasant, continuous and happy, deferring the possibilities of that "shadowy land" until we can no longer remain here, and are compelled to go there on a voyage of discovery or to seek our eternal fortunes.

B. F. Underwood's Appointments.

Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, April 13th, 14th and 15; Oskaloosa, Iowa, April 17th and 18th; Toledo, Iowa, Apr. 19th, 20th and 21st.

He will speak next at Osceola, Red Oak and Sidney, Iowa, Lincoln, Neb., St. Joseph, Mo., and Paola and Columbus, Kan.

WE CALL THE ATTENTION of our readers to the lecture of PROF. ELSBERG in the Liberal Club Department, upon the "Plastidule Theory and Hereditary Transmission of Matter and Force." It is a very able paper, and throws new light upon a most interesting subject. Its length crowds out some articles we would have been glad to present to our friends, but we trust it will be found very interesting to our thoughtful readers, and will fully compensate for its displacement of other articles. Let none fail to read it.

WE ARE RECEIVING LETTERS from our friends condemning the unjust law passed by the late Congress, by which an embargo is laid upon the circulation of literary matter, to pander to the purse-proud monopolies called Express Companies. Outside of these companies, we doubt if there are one hundred persons in the United States in favor of the law. It is a discriminating tax upon the circulation and interchange of general intelligence wholly in conflict with the spirit of the age. It is an outrage upon the people, filching money from their pockets for the purpose of making rich corporations still richer. If members of Congress can do nothing better than pass laws against the best interests of the people, we think it would be far better for them to remain at home and save the nation the enormous sum they cost

WE publish the following as a specimen of the satisfaction felt by those who order goods from our friends, G. L. Henderson & Co.:

NORMAL, McLEAN Co., ILL.

G. L. HENDERSON & Co.: The goods I ordered were received. They are just the quality and fit I ordered, and fifty per cent cheaper than I could purchase them in the West. Sirs, I thank you for your "Supply Agency." It is a noble and grand idea. It is an answer to humanity's prayers. I do not doubt that it will soon culminate in blessings to tens of thousands.

W. FERGUSON, M.D.

ILLUSTRATIVE of the active demand there is for Liberal-Scientific publications, we would state that the first edition of Prof. SCHMIDT'S DESCENT AND DARWINISM, recently issued from the press of D. Appleton & Co., was exhausted within a month after its appearance. The second edition will be out in a few days. Those who have ordered from us will be served as soon as the books are to be had. It is the kind of mental pabulum that the progressive minds of the day require. It is a good book to make Infidels. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cents.

WE THANK THOSE FRIENDS who have taken an interest in sending in the names of new subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is cheering these hard times, when money is so scarce, to find new names coming in freely. They atone for those who have been falling away through timidity, apathy or the objection they entertain to spending the heavy sum of $1.75 per year to assist in sustaining a struggling Liberal sheet. Friends, you can in no way advance the cause of progress and mental liberty more effectually than in contributing to the life and sustenance of such fearless publications as are aiming to unmask the crimes and absurdities of superstition and priestcraft. Let THE TRUTH SEEKER'S list grow apace.

WE at length have completed our printed list for mailing purposes. Our regular patrons will notice hereafter their papers will be addressed with printed tabs, giving also the date when their subscription expires. Those who notice they are in arrears, will much oblige us by remitting the little balance due us, so we can change the figures attached to their names to the close of the volume, or to the end of the year.

This is not intended as a dun for those residing in the "grasshopper region," upon whom we have agreed to wait till they can conveniently pay, but to those who are able to pay now.

If errors in name, location, or date are noticed, we will thank our friends to inform us of the same.

What is Music?

BY PROF. ISAAC L. RICE.

Among recent scientific and literary acquisitions we would place this new work that lies before us, fresh from the press of Appletons'. The author's answer to a question of ever increasing importance is full of new and pregnant ideas that must commend themselves to every lover of music, scientific or otherwise, being full of beautiful and grand thoughts expressed in language so plain, and clear, and free from technicalities that the most unlearned can follow them from the first inception to the conclusion.

The first portion of the work consists of ancient myths, and takes us into the history of the development of music in China, Persia, Hindoostan, Egypt and Greece. This relation is replete with interest, and carries the reader with the ease and charm of a fairy tale across the wide gulf of centuries that separates the past from the present. From these early myths, the author descends to the Middle Ages, from them to those years rich in the masters of harmony, and down to the theorists of the present day. Among these, prominence is given to Prof. Helmholtz and Herbert Spencer. The views of the latter is criticised somewhat severely, as they come in conflict with the author's own opinions.

Part second of the book is devoted to the writer's original theory concerning the mission of music and developing what it is. From the high and beautiful elevation which he looks from to answer the question, it is easy to see that he loves music with the passion of an enthusiast for an ideal mistress. It is this enthusiasm, born of love, making all labor possible, that gives us at intervals truths wrested from the secret hiding-places of the arts.

We should like to insert some extracts from the work for the benefit of our readers, but find it in the short space we can give, an almost impossible task, the parts all being fitted together with such nice proportions that, disturbing one, the symmetry of the whole is lost. We hope this work will meet with the success its literary excellence deserves from our music-loving population. Apart from its own merits, it is brought out in the fine style that always characterizes the press-work of the Appletons.

We will be glad to send it, post-paid, to any friend who may wish it. Price, in cloth, $1; in paper, 50 cents.

Sustaining Elder Shelton.

I noticed the late article by that Alabama parson, Elder Shelton, and agree with all thinking persons, that error will never fall beneath such blows, nor truth gain a friend. No! If argument, although it may be erroneous, cannot be met by argument, and by quiet, yet forcible reasoning—not by sledge hammer pounding—a style that throws out the hissing red hot sparks, driving away friend and foe, and leaving the "smith" alone in his glory, then we had better try and close all discussions. To my mind, Mr. Editor, your argument about the flood, the ark, its animals, etc., can be met in but one way, i. e., that if it be once admitted that there is a Supreme Power—call it God or not—that if that power is intelligent and beyond all human conceptions on the extent of its forces, creative, adaptive, preservative, etc., especially if that Power created all natural laws, then all efforts to prove that the force of that Supreme Power cannot do the acts named in the Bible, must fall to the ground. The greater includes the less. If any power could create this world, could fix its planets, and also produce myriads of life evolutions, or non-animate things, then that Power could make the flood, could place and preserve the animal creation, in the ark; in fact, could do anything he desired. Why fly off to problematics, saying, that according to natural law, this or that could not be done? Why, when the Creator of the objects or things could modify, suspend, or set aside any one or more of his laws to accomplish a given result, doubt the Power or the story of its exercise? I am not compelled to say how this or that was done. The Power to do, if once admitted, absolves me from any further argument. Why, even take that "chance," which some philosophers claim as the creative or motive Power of the universe? We will find that if "chance" could create a world, chance could create a flood and do the very things that Noah did. If you say that laws of Nature, once established, are final, and the Supreme Power subject to them, I reply, where doth it so appear, who of earth's created intelligences has a right to say that the Creator is subject immovably to the created?

The very arguments you adduce to prove the falsity of the whole story, or the ground-work for your reasoning, affects my mind variously from your own. Why would it so be written, an idle tale, a false, flimsy, self-contradicting, amusing and absurd story, if it were the production of man? Well did the authors know, if it is false, that they were writing a pretended supernatural work, claiming to be from the mouth of the Supreme Power; and would men have written such a story in the expectation of its being received as true? No sir. They would have adapted it to human reason—have made it plausible and natural—to bear the severest human criticism, and not the (as you claim) self-evident, idle, nonsensical tale. It suggests to my mind its internal supernatural truth. But I have exceeded all reasonable limits. I would like to point out, in many forms, and in a general way, the truth of the Old and New Testament, but I must now close.

Cincinnati, Ohio, March 26, 1865.

CREDO.

REPLY. The ground our friend occupies appears to us unsound and untenable; neither does he seem to comprehend our position. By the "Supreme Power of the Universe" we do not mean an Individual, a Person, or a Being, but the unchangeable, irrevocable forces and laws, which were never made, never invented, never inaugurated, but are eternal and ever-existent, and hence cannot be revoked, superseded, or set aside by any power in existence. How absurd to talk about a Deity or a Supreme Power acting against himself or setting himself aside.

We think our friend entitled to a patent for his discovery how to tell when a narrative or story is of divine origin. If "false, flimsy, and contradictory," he holds it to be a proof that it is not a human production, and, per necessity, a divine one. In this way he probably sees divine beauty and truthfulness in the stories of the creation of the Universe out of nothing, in six days; of trees and plants of all kinds growing and bringing forth seeds and fruits before there was any sun; that a snake could talk with a woman, and induce her to eat some fruit, which God caused to grow, and by which his whole plans were prostrated, and the entire world doomed to destruction and war; that God was irascible, changeable, malicious, and unjust, sometimes giving to a portion of his children the possessions that belonged to others, and, at other times, slaying them in lots of twenty thousand, fifty thousand, and seventy thousand, for the most trivial offenses; that he delighted in wars, carnage, and bloodshed; that he was filled with hatred towards the entire human family, and finally would not be appeased until his own innocent son was executed; that a man once caused the sun and moon to stand still nearly a day; that at one time no rain fell upon the earth for three years and six months; that Elijah was taken up into heaven bodily in a chariot of fire; that Jonah was swallowed whole by a fish and retained for three days—was then thrown up safe and sound; that three men were cast into a fiery furnace made seven times hotter than ever before, but they were not burned at all, and not even a thread of their garments scorched, though the men who bound them and threw them in were utterly burned up. These, and many similar extravagant statements, according to our friend's reason, must possess divine beauty and truth, for they certainly have none that is human.

By this mode of reasoning, the more improbable, monstrous, and unnatural a story is, the more likely it is to be divine and true. In this way, the adventures of Baron Munchausen, Gulliver, and Don Quixote, must be supposed to be the truest of the true and the divinest of the divine.—[Ed. T. S.]

Beauty of God's Love,

AS PORTRAYED BY CHRISTIANS.

The Rev. Mr. Wells, the well-known Secretary of the Ohio State Young Men's Christian Association, in a sermon delivered not long ago at Milan, O., used this wonderfully beautiful (?) language.

"The time is coming when Christians will love God so intensely that they will put to death even their own children who may be found holding heretical opinions."

A writer who sympathizes with the Reverend gentleman and his delectable views, makes the following remarks in the Sandusky Register:

"We not only endorse every word Mr. Wells has said, but accept the issue which they will inevitably produce. We hold he has not spoken one word we would have him recall. He has not made his speech sufficiently strong. This is the true theory of salvation founded on the Bible: 'All men are born the subjects of sin on account of Adam's transgression, and hence liable to the penalty of eternal torments.' This is God's will 'towards the finally impenitent' and the will of God's children should be so absorbed in God's will that the true Christian can say hallelujah over even the damnation of his own children."

Though it may be said that God is love, yet that love can never transcend or overbalance the justice of God, and eternal justice legitimately requires the endless punishment of the sinner. To this end John, the revelator said: "The smoke of their torment shall ascend up forever and ever."

When Christianity has had its perfect work in the human soul, it completely obliterates all affections toward our own children, and Christians become so Christly that they can say: "Thy will Oh! God be done." Which will is, that the Saints be redeemed, and the wicked eternally damned. From this logic there is no escape. Infidelity has never been able to gainsay it.

Consequently the soundness of Mr. Wells' position is clearly discernible to every clear-minded and discriminating person.

The terms heresy and unbelief are synonymous as used in the Bible, and God's Holy Book recognizes no sin as equally heinous as unbelief. To this end Christ says in the sixteenth chapter of Mark: "He that believeth not shall be damned." And if God, who is infinitely perfect, sees fit in the divine economy of his grace to damn heretics and unbelievers, we as his imitators may be justifiable in putting to death our own children, as brother Wells teaches, if they obstinately refuse the "overtures of mercy," going on in wicked ways, and leading others to that perdition "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." ONE WHO ACCEPTS HIS REDEEMER.

REMARKS—How these Christian people do malign the character of the Great Power which pervades the Universe, in asserting that its love or influence could lead to slaughter and bloodshed! Could they have their way, our fair land would be deluged with innocent blood, and every unbeliever, and every independent spirit that would not bow down to their bloodthirsty god of vengeance would be put to death in the most relentless manner.

If the "love of God" is to produce such a state of things in this world, our prayer is, that there may be just as little of it as possible.—[Ed. T. S.]

Letters to a Preacher.

NO. V.

FRIEND B:—I must here notice one point in thy letter that I think entirely untenable. Thee says "Jesus Christ never blunder. One of his lowest promises was, 'that if we seek first the kingdom of heaven and its righteousness, all temporal things shall be added unto us'; while millions of the followers of Zoroaster, Confucius, and Mahomet perish by famine, the creation of their vice, when did you know a Quaker, true to his faith, starve to death?" It really does seem to me that a person must be sadly blinded by superstition or something else, when he can fancy that a belief and practice of Christianity will keep any one from starving. Were there no Christians or Quakers "true to their faith" in Chicago during the great fire and its after period of want and suffering? Were there none at the Mill River disaster? Are there none now starving in the by-ways of our large cities? Are there none throughout all the regions devastated by grasshoppers and chinch-bugs? Really the day has gone by when people believed that God tempered the wind to the shorn lamb or his angels held up the feet of the righteous to keep them from stumbling.

The man who lives most hygienically and is most industrious in accumulating this world's goods, will be most apt to have the largest share of temporal things, both in health and wealth.

An Atheist who lives a moral and industrious life will be no more liable to starve than would a Quaker in his position.

I have never been able to see that Christians were more highly favored by the "Powers that be" than than are Infidels, Atheists, Pagans, or Heathens. Cast a dozen of each adrift in mid ocean and you will find that all the prayers of the Christians will not save them from drowning or "starving" any sooner than will the prayers of the Pagans, or Heathens, or the non-praying qualities of the Atheist; and, indeed, if there be any advantage it is the latter who have it, for, depending upon no imaginary all-powerful being they trust to their own philosophy and common sense and use the best means in their power to help themselves.

"Man knows but little here below.

Nor knows that little long;

But oft he knows before he goes,

That half he knows is wrong."

ELMINA D. SLEEKER.

Snowville, Pulaski County, Va., March 11th, 1875.

Letter From G. L. Henderson.

OSSIAN, IOWA, March 28th, 1875.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I enclose you to-day eleven names from this point for your paper.

Yesterday forenoon I addressed the people of Washington Prairie, on "the worthlessness of our churches and the wickedness of our clergymen," and in the evening on the "value of science and its teachers." The audience was much larger than was expected, as the roads were nearly impassable from snow-drifts and mud. Those who came, came mostly on horseback. We had some lively National songs by a choir consisting of Miss Lucy Daniels, Miss Annie Oxley, Mrs. Daniels (the lady who once furnished the candles to continue a debate against superstition). They were assisted by Albert Rosa and A. C. Henderson.

We had a good old-fashioned revival of Rationalism, such as would have gladdened the heart of Elder Zebedee Harkins.

At the close of the evening lecture, the people lingered, though I had spoken an hour and a half, and we commenced an interesting conversation on the subject of "organization." This magic key will unlock both the heart and the purse of over one million of Liberal men and women in the United States. Suppose every lover of "positive truth" were to subscribe five dollars a year toward a fund in New York City, the proceeds of which be applied to the erection of a temple of Rationalism on the grandest scale, with elegant stores underneath, the rents to be applied to the erection of similar temples all over the United States, and for the training and support of lecturers, to propagate and spread the truths of science everywhere. How long could a decayed and worthless superstition resist the pressure of such a combination sustained by an accumulating capital, the product of one million small five dollar contributions? Many larger bequests from men and women holding their wealth as a sacred trust to be used for the benefit of their race might also be looked for. Several good and noble men have already intimated to me their willingness to leave all their property to such a cause. This is in harmony with the spirit of the age. Stephen Gerard, George Peabody, James Lick and Peter Cooper have all been animated by this holy impulse. This same spirit is felt in Ossian and on Washington Prairie.

When such an organization is effected in New York for such a purpose, I am assured by the positive thinkers of this place, that many will respond to the call.

Mr. James Daniels and his family, and all the members of the Rosa family are anxious to see this ball set in motion, and every one of them, with many others, will help to roll it until it becomes a mighty avalanche that will fall upon the old superstitions with irresistible force, and bury them out of sight. It will be a bloodless revolution. It will be the millennium of which the Church has so long dreamed. It will be the final restoration of man, who will then be crowned king of kings and lord of lords.

There is now no doubt but that man is the god which nature has been evolving for countless ages. This god will assert, and does exhibit, his power to control earth, air and water. Wind, steam and lightning are but his slaves. Land, water and sky are plowed by his engines for his support and pleasure. His ambition has no limit; his battering rams pierce the mountains; his telescope penetrates the abyss of heaven; his crucibles melt the diamond; he roasts millions of sheep and oxen for his food; he will ultimately make this earth the grave of every animal that will not serve him. There is but one blasphemy possible for him, and that is to deny the existence of man capable of infinite progress. He can commit but one crime, and that is to attempt the extinction of the human race. There is but one only living and true god. This god is male and female. It is man. The dog worships him, the horse serves him, the winds and the lightnings obey him. He is a changeable god; therefore he becomes wiser and better. He is a merciful god; he can be moved by tears and be diverted from his purpose by prayers. He is a jealous god, for he demands the service and worship of all men, so much so, that if his ear offends him he will cut it off, or if his eye offends him he will pluck it out and cast it away. He is a proud god, so much so that he soon demands that the gods of other worlds come to be insulted and spit upon and marked with a crown of thorns for his special benefit and pleasure.

Such is man, the god of this world. And still I love him with all my heart, and mind, and strength.

Your, for the service and honor of man,

G. L. HENDERSON.

Metaphysics.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. Bland very decidedly objected to a remark I made in your office recently—"That the science of this day will compel an entire re-modeling of our metaphysics." I have just been reading "Mill's Essays on Religion," and I am more than pleased when I find that he attacks the metaphysics of the day, and says that they must evidently fall with the system they have so long supported. "The whole of the prevalent metaphysics of the present century is one tissue of suborned evidence in favor of religion," often of Deism only, but in any case involving a misapplication of noble impulses and speculative capacities, among the most deplorable of those wretched wastes of human faculties which make us wonder that enough is left to keep mankind progressive, at however slow a pace. It is time to consider more impartially, and therefore more deliberately than is usually done, whether all this straining to prop up beliefs which require so great an expense of intellectual toil and ingenuity to keep them standing, yields any sufficient return in human well-being, and whether that end would not be better served by a frank recognition that certain subjects are inaccessible to our faculties, and by the application of the same mental powers to the strengthening and enlargement of those sources of virtue and happiness which stand in no need of the support or sanction of supernatural beliefs and inducements.

WM. WILLICOTT.

It is skeptical and infidel science that has lessened the hours of toil, given men better food, better clothing and better homes, diminished the ravages of famine and pestilence, acquainted man with many of the processes of nature, and enabled him to make her forces servants of his will and ministers to his enjoyment. In whatever direction we look we can not fail to see our indebtedness to science. The real injury done mankind by the Christian superstition in keeping back the discoveries, and preventing the diffusion of its spirit and influence among the people can never be estimated. Science, more than any other agency, has been a great civilizer and savior of men. The mariner's compass, the art of printing, the science of chemistry, the steam engine and the electric telegraph, what have they not done for man; and yet the clergy say science cannot make men better; the religion of Jesus Christ can alone reach their case." It is gratifying to know that Christianity is destined soon to take its place among the worn out religions of the world. It has surrendered bastion after bastion, fort after fort and field after field. Free thought is making new conquests every day. The present is full of encouragement and the future is full of promise.—B. F. Underwood

New-York Liberal Club.

The Plastidule Theory

AND

HEREDITARY TRANSMISSION OF MATTER AND FORCE.

BY PROF. LOUIS ELSBERG, M.D.

In the whole domain of science there is probably no more interesting subject than generation and inheritance. It forms the chief theme of the literary fragments which have come down to us from the oldest times, as, for instance, those of Orpheus, Pythagoras, and Anaxagoras, and a vast number of philosophical and medical works from their time to the present. Even in the Dark Ages, when cloister-scholastics seemed to have destroyed all zest for investigating Natural Science, this subject inspired several holy fathers, who published works that we to-day cannot but call obscure; some of which still exist, as those of Pope John XX, the Bishop Albertus, the author of "De Secretis Mulierum," and that of Michael Scotus; and which, as Blumenbach justly observes, prove that these holy men were much interested, if not in the practice, certainly in the theory of generation.

The phenomena of inheritance interest not only the naturalist, but also the theologian, the novelist, the teacher and the physician. While the naturalist uses such types as are inherited as bases of classification for animals and plants into classes, orders, families, species, and so on; those engaged in educational endeavor to lessen or advance the effect of hereditary transmissions, by mental and physical training; the novelist allows his hero or heroine, no matter how amiable personally, to meet an unavoidable fate on account of some action of their ancestors; the physician aims to free his patients of inherited tendencies to disease, and to preserve future generations from similar predispositions; and the theologian still passes judgment upon the unborn child, on account of the inheritance of original sin.

I may take for granted that most of you are familiar with instances of inheritance of bodily and mental traits. Not only prominent but seemingly insignificant peculiarities are sometimes transmitted, and if I were to recite to you the recorded cases, selecting none but absolutely authenticated ones, I could, nevertheless, with their mere mentioning, fill up more than the whole evening.

A very remarkable phenomenon, and one that has much bearing upon my special theme this evening, is the so-called atavism, that is, the fact that sometimes an anomaly or peculiarity existing in an animal is lost, for one or more generations and reappears in a following one; that, for instance, sometimes children do not resemble their parents, but are very much like their grandparents or some ancestor even further removed. There are well authenticated cases in which characteristic features or qualities of a particular family, after being absent for several generations, reappear. One of the most remarkable examples of atavism well known to the breeders of horses is the fact that sometimes very characteristic dark stripes appear in a colt, similar to those of the zebra, the quagga and other wild species of horses of Africa. Horses of various breeds and of all colors have these dark stripes sometimes, which can only be explained as a reappearance of the long-buried ancestral form of all horses, which doubtless had stripes like the zebra, quagga, etc. In other domestic animals, there sometimes appear certain peculiarities which distinguished their ancestors in the wild condition. In the vegetable kingdom, also, atavism is frequently observed. You all know the common snap-dragon—the yellow toadflax (Linaria vulgaris)—which grows by the edges of fields, roadsides, etc. Its corolla has two long and two short stamens, but occasionally a corolla (Peloria) appears which is funnel-shaped and is regularly five-cleft and five spurred. This peloria occurs as an atavism to the old ancestral forms of linaria which had a five-spurred corolla, the stamens having gradually become different.

I shall pass over other phenomena of inheritance among animals and plants, which, however, alone make cattle breeding and plant culture possible, and bring to your notice a few examples relating to human inheritances. Of these, I shall, with few exceptions, select only such as may be found in the work of Prof. Seidlitz on Hereditary Transmission, published in St. Petersburg, in 1865, where detailed authentications and authorities are given:

1. That the proportions in the size of the bones which determine stature are inheritable is seen in families, nations and races. One of the best known cases is that of one of the richest families of Kentucky of whom the father when seventy years old measured six feet four inches and weighed two hundred pounds, and the mother measured six feet four inches and weighed two hundred and eighty-six pounds. Their six sons and three daughters measured from six feet two inches to six feet eleven inches and weighed from one hundred and ninety-seven to two hundred and ninety-six pounds. There are a number of grandchildren, and most of them measure six feet and over. Very early or delayed development of teeth, the first set as well as the second, and their early or late decay is sometimes peculiar to families for several generations, and causes the same suffering to children that parents and grandparents have experienced. A greater or less number of fingers than five, or of toes than five, is hereditary; Carlisle observed the occurrence of six fingers on each hand and of six toes on each foot through four generations. The great-grandmother had been born with this anomaly. She had three daughters, and two had the same number of fingers and toes that she had. In the third generation of five children four had the same formation, and in the fourth generation of eight children, four.

2. In the muscles of voluntary motion we do not fail to see the occurrences of hereditary transmission of peculiarities: thus thick calves, strong muscles of the neck and chest, or the opposite conditions, are family peculiarities. In the face the forms of muscles together with that of bones present themselves as family resemblances in expression, features and peculiarities, often extending to the smallest details. The voice, the walk, peculiar movements of arms or hands, the peculiarity of wearing the heel of the boot or shoe over or off on one side, mode of laughter and abnormal conditions, such as squinting, stammering, tendency to hernia, etc., are frequently noticeable in particular families.

3. Inheritances of peculiarities of the integument, the skin and hair, and of the mucous membrane, are frequently met with. The color of the skin has long been used to discriminate between races, as white, red, black, etc., and anomalies of the general coloration are observed in particular families through several generations. Catlin reports finding among the Missouri Indians, who are copper-colored and have black hair soft as silk, a family of twelve persons, with light, brittle hair, almost white skin, and brown or blue eyes. In negroes white spots, and in white people dark, yellow or other colored spots are sometimes inherited in a particular part of the body. Arthaud describes a case in which the son of a European and a negress had the usual color of the mulatto, but on his forehead, arms and legs, places where the grandmother, the father and the uncle of the boy had abnormal white spots of a peculiar shape, he had white and brownish spots of the same peculiar shape. The texture of the skin and anomalies in different parts of the body pass from parents to children. Flabby or tense, thin or thick skin, red or pale cheeks, nose and lips, are met with as family peculiarities generation after generation. The same is true of the tendency to the deposit of fat on particular parts, as under the chin, on the hands, or posteriorly, as in the case of the Hottentot women. As to the hair, its color, elasticity, curling, thickness and extent over the body, indeed, even the forms of the nails, are inheritable. Mr. W. B. Tegemeier, a well-known English naturalist, has recently published a description, with portraits, of three members of a Burmese family, who through three generations, have exhibited the peculiarity of a remarkable development of hair over their entire faces, every part of the skin of the face and neck, even eyelids, nose and ears, being covered with a thick, silky hair of a brown color, and from four to ten inches long. The article was republished in this country in the Scientific American for February 20th, 1875. A peculiar odor from the skin is met with in particular races and families. Diseased conditions of the skin frequently pass from parent to child. The well-known case of Edward Lambert, frequently examined by physicians, who had a crust an inch thick over the whole of his body, may be mentioned here. He had six children, each of whom became affected at the same period of life as he, with the same disease. Five of these children died childless. The sixth had six daughters and two sons, John and Richard. Of the daughters nothing is known. The sons were examined by Tilesius, who reported that they were affected by the same disease as the grandfather. As to the mucous membrane, different persons have different inherited weak spots. One gets a catarrh in the head, another a throat or bronchial catarrh, a third a catarrh of the bowels or bladder, etc., when equally exposed.

4. The transmission of the peculiarities of the digestive apparatus is noticeable, not only in families but in whole nations. The ability to eat great amounts of food at one time is inheritable. Kalmucks can eat a whole sheep at once, and in four or five hours digest it. Hindoos would not be able to eat the twentieth part. The peculiar form of tongue, the position of the teeth, the inclination or disinclination to particular kinds of food, the mode of digestion; all these are repeated from one generation to another. The inheritance of malformations of the stomach, the liver, and other portions of the alimentary canal, is recorded in medical works. The intimate connection between the integrity of the digestive apparatus and certain psychical states are known to everybody. Bad digestion sours the temper and disposition, and when frequent or continuous, may lead to hypochondriasis, or even suicide. Corresponding psychical inheritances, therefore, go hand in hand with those of the digestory apparatus.

5. We now come to the blood and blood-vessels. There are examples of inheritance of the amount of blood, of the proportions and relations of its constituent parts, of the form and functions of the large and smaller vessels extending through a number of generations—of the tendency to plethora, to anemia, to inflammations of the heart, and to all sorts of dyscrasias. Peculiarities of the circulatory system are so intimately connected with mental and moral conditions, that even in common parlance we term a violent, thoughtless, or passionate individual "hot-blooded," and a quiet, calculating or immovable one "cold-blooded." We speak of persons of "noble blood" and of "bad blood;" and of "large-hearted," "small-hearted," "hard-hearted" people and families.

6. In the respiratory organs we find proofs of hereditary transmission. Comparative measurements have disclosed national and race differences in the periphery of the chest, in the length of the breast-bone, in the capacity of the lungs. There can be no doubt that the condition of the lungs themselves is inheritable; at all events tendencies to their diseased or abnormal conditions; not only to pulmonary consumption, hemorrhage, apoplexy, but also to emphysema, asthma and catarrh. Just as joyful and sad emotions tend to stimulate or to depress breathing, so do strong or diseased respiratory organs react upon the mind, and with the material inheritance there goes along the corresponding psychical.

The peculiarities of that sense, which sentinel-like stands at the entrance gate of the respiratory apparatus, the sense of smell, and which has a special relation in animals, at least, to the sexual function, are certainly inheritable. In relation to the organ of speech, which distinguishes man from all other inhabitants of the globe, we may say that its inheritances are less observable in the forms of the palate or throat than in words and vocal sounds. Nevertheless all changes, abbreviations, inflections and variations of vowels and consonants, are much more the consequence of anatomical and physiological conditions than philologists generally suppose. In all languages certain vowels easily change into each other. For instance a and o, e and i, ai and oi, etc. Certain consonants easily take the place of others; for instance, l the place of r, and vice versa; t the place of s, and vice versa. The labials, b and p, f and v, easily change places. Some people cannot distinguish t from d, p from b, and make a soft sound instead of a hard, or the hard sound, when they should make the soft. The Swedes pronounce the hard s where other nations have a soft z. Russians and Italians, and even the French, can hardly produce the spiritus asper h. The Chinese have no r sound, and in attempting to pronounce it say l instead. The Esths have no f. The Tuscans change the soft l after consonants into a still softer i; people of Southern Italy into an r. Altogether, in language are shown the inheritances of the organs of speech.

7. As to the genital apparatus, here all inheritance is commenced. The first living plastid would have remained without progeny if it had had no power of generation and hereditary transmission, and had not been able to transmit this power to its descendants. Only because every newly acquired individual form of life was transmitted, the simple has become the infinitely complex, which, however, in the time of reproductive maturity again produces germ plastids, which, simple in form, have the power slowly to develop the whole sum of the gradually accumulated parental qualities. What my conception is of the manner in which this is done, is the main theme of this lecture, and this will occupy us in detail after I have communicated a few more facts of heredity.

In the human germ the power of transmission exists sometimes unabated and sometimes lessened, constituting either strong or weak generative force; in the first case leading to vigorous propagation of the species, in the other case, producing its gradual or sudden extinction. Families, tribes, peoples and races, apparently perfectly well organized, die out, the two individuals coming together for procreative purposes having only one, or perhaps no offspring. On the other hand, other tribes and races increase in number and vitality. Negresses easily conceive, are very prolific, frequently bear twins, have much milk and have much love for offspring. French women, on the other hand, especially those of the upper ranks of society, are frequently wanting in milk, take no pleasure in bringing up their children, in fact, frequently putting them away—baby farming being a flourishing institution in France. The statistics of France since the Franco-Prussian war show that the birthrate is less than the deathrate. Among the peasantry in Russia there occur every year a number of cases of triple and quadruple births. There are on record several occurrences of even quintuple births. Among the Turks, Persians and Arabs, twins are very rare. Sometimes the peculiarity of bearing many or few children runs in families. Thus Osiander mentions a woman who in eleven births bore thirty-two children. She was one of four born at the same time of a mother who had thirty-eight children. The wife of a gentleman well known in this city became the mother of thirty-six children, twenty-eight of whom were living twenty years ago. Many of these children were twins and triplets, and several of her daughters also gave birth to twins and triplets.

Early or late maturity, the forms of the pelvis, the functions of the uterus and mammary glands, present inherited characteristics of the female sex, which too often appear as pathological conditions in this country; and we cannot doubt that peculiar conditions of the sexual apparatus are connected with peculiar conditions of mind and are together inheritable.

8. Proofs of the hereditary transmission of peculiarities of the nervous system are found mainly in the form of the skull, in the texture and structure of the brain, leading to certain diseases, and in mental and moral activity and innervation, the cause and origin of which are to be sought in the brain and spinal marrow. The forms of the skull are regarded to-day as the most important means of distinguishing races. Its forms must therefore have been transmitted largely and with great persistency. But within the general types there frequently occur peculiar formations and deformations of particular portions of the cranium which constitute family characteristics. Broad, small, high, low or sloping forehead; flat or arched vertex; sloping, straight, or drawn out occiput; elevations and depressions; all these are transmissible. There is no doubt that they correspond to the form of the brain; and the same is true of the size of the skull in proportion to the whole body. That the texture and structure of the brain and spinal cord are transmitted we know from family tendencies to apoplexy, epilepsy, paralysis, etc. Seidlitz observed forty-two cases of apoplexy, of which twenty-one occurred in the children of persons who had died from the same disease; and in a number of cases he traced it through four or five generations and frequently on the same side as in the ancestors.

It is not so easy to prove directly the inheritance of mental and moral peculiarities as of physical ones. They have neither so distinct marks, nor are they so certainly recognized as large noses, blue eyes, etc. Nevertheless they are traceable; sometimes insignificant peculiarities, even, of the conduct of parents are seen in children in cases where education, association and such influences are excluded. Seidlitz relates that a gentleman had had his son educated from earliest infancy in a foreign land. When twelve years old the son for the first time came back to his father, and upon going to bed the father was not a little astonished to observe that before retiring the son stamped down with his feet the bed-clothes, in just the same peculiar manner that he himself had done when a boy. Frequently, unfortunately, a genial but original and eccentric spirit of an ancestor degenerates into extravagant and violent character, jealousy and hallucination in children, and in later generations produces epilepsy, paralysis or insanity. Examples of the inheritance of mental aberration are too well known to need any mention.

In connection with the function of the brain I may speak of the senses of sight and hearing. The organs of both of these senses show a great number of examples of transmission. In, by far, the majority of cases the children of blue or dark-eyed parents have eyes of the same color. Germans and Finlanders frequently have blue eyes. The Romanic nations blue or dark. The form and size of the eyeball, the arch of the eyebrows, the shape of the lids, the power of accommodation and vision are very frequently inherited from generation to generation, and the number of examples of transmission of anomalies of the organs of sight is also very great. As to the organ of hearing, with a little attention we can see even in the form of the external ear peculiarities of race and family. The acuteness of hearing, the appreciation of melody and harmony and musical talent distinguish whole nations as well as families. In the one family, Bach, there have been not less than twenty-two eminent musicians. Hardness of hearing and total deafness, often only on one side, are hereditary; and there are striking examples of hereditary deafness.

9. Lastly, let us consider hereditary transmission as to the manner of dying. As individuals we die but once, but daily and hourly small particles of our bodies decay and die. With every beat of our pulse, every motion, every thought, every second of existence, and of activity of our organs, we use up a corresponding portion of our frame, which is carried into the general circulation, and thence through a thousand sieves and canals partly removed from the body and in part transformed into again available material. The whole machinery of secretion and excretion, with all its organs and vessels, and glands, is concerned in this never-ceasing death; and it removes the slag by way of intestine and lungs, kidney and skin. In all these workshops there are peculiarities, and all these peculiarities are hereditarily transmissible. Well for those in whose ancestors the constant decay and death has taken place normally and properly! When, however, it has often been perturbed, when the slags have been retained again and again, improper modes of tissue metamorphosis are repeated in the descendants, producing tendencies to disease, and leading to premature death of the whole body.

As to this last total death, it is a matter of course that if the forms and qualities and peculiarities of all organs and systems of the body are transmissible, longevity or its opposite is also transmissible. In point of fact there are examples in which father and son and grandson have attained an age of more than one hundred years. Thomas Parr is said to have been one hundred and fifty-two years and nine months old; his great-grandson died at the age of one hundred and three. Staff-Surgeon Christian Wurger died in St. Petersburg in 1772, at the age of one hundred and two years. His father had become one hundred and eleven, and his mother ninety-nine years old. Joseph Surrington, a Norwegian peasant, was one hundred and fifty years old and left an oldest son of one hundred and three and a youngest of nine years. Johann Friederich Hirsch, a shoemaker at Uffenheim, died on the 23d of September, 1861, one hundred and seven years and seven days old. He had always enjoyed good health, and had, on the day before his death, gathered a fagot of dry wood in the forest and carried it home on his shoulders. His father had attained the age of one hundred and ten years.

Such, Mr. President and members of the Liberal Club, are a few of the facts of hereditary transmission.

Over the process itself there has hitherto been spread a thick veil.

The celebrated physician, Drelingcourt, the teacher of Boerhave, two hundred years ago, collected no less than two hundred and sixty-two different hypotheses on the subject from the writings of earlier authors, to which he added his own. Since his time this number has been largely increased; yet none have been found satisfactory, the mystery remained impenetrable. The wonder expressed by Montaigne in 1580, is reiterated by Louis Agassiz and Haeckel in 1873 and 1874. In the "Essays de Michel de Montaigne" we read, "Quel monstre est ce, que cette goutte de semence, de quoy nous sommes produits, porte en soy les impressions, non de la forme corporelle seulement, mais des pensemens et des inclinations de nos peres? cette goutte d'eau, ou loge elle ce nombre infiny de formes? et comme porte elle ses ressemblances, d'un progres si temeraire et si desregle, que l'arriere-fils respondra a son bisayeul le neveu a l'oncle?" In a lecture before the Museum of Comparative Zoology of Cambridge, on the 23d of March, 1873, Louis Agassiz said: "All these intricacies of inheritance so frequently interrupted, and seemingly so capriciously reproduced, must be connected with the egg through which all such influences pass to the new being. Suppose, for instance, that any features or traits, physical, moral or intellectual, are handed down from a male grandparent through the paternal side. In such an instance the egg, which produces the new individual, does not receive the direct transmission of inherited qualities; for, as I have said, that egg arises in the maternal organism, and has a life and growth of its own before the act of fecundation takes place. Through that act of fecundation the impression must be made by which these inherited qualities are received and transmitted to the new individual! Where the new individual reproduces the maternal features only, or features characteristic of the maternal line of descent, the case may seem at first sight more simple; but when we analyze it in all its bearings, we shall see that there is matter enough for wonder, and that we as yet know almost nothing about the mysterious problem of life. What can there be of a material nature transmitted through these bodies called eggs, themselves composed of the simplest material elements, and arising in the female organism without co-operation of the male; what influence can there be, I repeat, by which all peculiarities of ancestry belonging to either sex are brought down from generation to generation?"

And in his "Naturliche Schoepfungsgeschichte," Haeckel says, "Ueber die rein mechanische, materielle Natur dieses Vorgangs kann kein Zweifel sein. Aber staunend und bewundernd muessen wir hier vor der unendlichen, fuer uns unfassbaren Feinheit der elweisartigen Materie still stehen. Staunen muessen wir ueber die unleugbare Thatsache, dass die einfache Eizelle der Mutter, der einzige Samenfaden des Vaters, die individuelle Lebensbewegung dieser beiden Individuen so genau auf das Kind uebertraegt, dass nachher die feinsten koerperlichen und geistigen Eigenthuemlichkeiten der beiden Eltern an diesem wieder zum Vorschein kommen."

The point that we must consider particularly is, that the fecundated ovum or egg is the means by which all possible inheritance must be transmitted. Man and every vertebrate animal begins his existence in the form of a fecundated egg. The unimpregnated egg originates in the female body, and fecundation consists in the mixture of the male semen—the so-called sperm—with the female egg. The manner of this mixture is now so well known and admitted, that I can make it very clear to you by means of drawings.

(The Professor at this and other points in his discourse illustrated his lecture by means of numerous charts and drawings hanging upon the wall.)

Size of spermatozoid: head, 1-5000 of an inch long; 1-8000 of an inch broad; 1-25000 of an inch thick; tail, 1-500 of an inch long; size of human ovum: 1-125 of an inch; external or vitelline membrane, 1-2500 of an inch in thickness; germinal vesicle, 1-550 of an inch in diameter; germinal spot, 1-3600 of an inch in diameter; micropyle has been seen in eggs of fishes and mollusks only.

When you bring an egg into contact with the spermatic particles, you will see these particles crowding with their quick, sudden movements around the egg and covering its surface. At particular seasons of the year, in some of the hermaphrodite mollusks, these particles may be seen in numbers around the eggs. It would seem at such times that nothing could be easier than to trace their functions. But the great movability of the particles, and the difficulty of keeping any one of them in the focus of the microscope, makes the operation an exceedingly delicate one. The crowding of the particles about the egg of a variety of animals is now easily seen; in fishes, in the mollusks before mentioned, and also in the sea-urchins and star fishes, and even in jelly fishes. It is more difficult to observe in the higher animals and among insects and crustacea.

Although the introduction of the spermatic particles into the yolk is so difficult of observation, there are investigators who have seen this phenomenon repeatedly. Siebold, a master among masters, and an observer who never exaggerates his facts, has seen the spermatic particles within the yolk membrane of the bee's eggs more than twenty times, and has been able to show this to others.

In the ova of the nephelis, a small species of leech, Robin has seen spermatozooids to the number of several hundred, penetrate the vitelline membrane, always at one point, continuing their movements upon the surface of the vitellus. Almost always when the penetration has ceased, a bundle of spermatozooids are arrested in the micropyle.

I have never succeeded in seeing the penetration myself, but that does not diminish my confidence in the reports of those who have. Prof. Austin Flint, Jr., of Bellevue Hospital Medical College, says in his last volume on Physiology, published by Appletons, a few months ago, that he "had an opportunity of witnessing a demonstration of these phenomena by Prof. Robin, in 1861, in the ova of the Limnæus stagnalis, and actually saw a spermatozoid half-way through the vitelline membrane." Coste and many other observers whom it is unnecessary to quote, have seen the spermatozoid in the ovum of the rabbit, etc. "All direct observations on the lower orders of animals have shown that several spermatozooids are necessary for the fecundation of a single ovum; but we have no definite idea of the number required in mammals, much less in the human subject."

Of the changes in the egg that soon follow the mixture of the ovum and spermatozoid, I may take an opportunity to say a few words before the close of the lecture. What I now desire to impress upon you particularly, is the fact that whatever there is transmitted, must be contained in either of these two generative elements. Now, since not only the peculiarities of the immediate parents, but also those of anterior ancestors, whether these peculiarities have appeared in the parents or not, may be transmitted, it is certain that the two constituents of the germ, the ovum and spermatic particles, are composed of molecules, to which are attached all these peculiarities. I assume, and this assumption constitutes the hypothesis or theory which I have desired to make you acquainted with, that the germ of each derivative living being consists of plastidules of its whole ancestry.

The term "plastid" is synonymous with the older and better known word "cell," which word, however, is not sufficiently comprehensive. A plastid is living matter in its most elementary form, as it composes all organic bodies, plants as well as animals, the highest as well as the lowest. Our knowledge of the structure of plastid, its phases of life, its relation to the so-called "basis-substance" in the animal body, etc., we owe to the distinguished Vienna investigator, who has recently made his home in New York, and has on several occasions lectured before the Liberal Club, Dr. Carl Heitzmann. I have given the name plastidule to the smallest conceivable particles, of which plastid, as such, consists, viz.: to the plastid-molecules.

Every one must admit that the germ, or fecundated ovum, from which the child proceeds, consists of matter wholly derived from the bodies of its parents. In the same manner the germs from which these parents sprung existed in the bodies of their parents. Now, if we assume that some of the particles of matter from the grandparents have remained in the parental bodies until the procreation of the child, then there may be contained in the germ of the grandchild actual plastidules of the grandparents. For those who can more readily conceive the idea of force being transmitted than matter, I may add that the term plastidule refers quite as much to a center or bundle of force, as to matter. Against the idea that plastidules of the grandparents would be present in the developed body of the parent, or that they would be preserved until the procreative act, the objection might be urged that the constant change of tissue in the body, to which I have referred, the decay and death and excretion, would make the preservation of these particles of matter impossible. To such an objection the reply is, that the material of the body breaks down and is eliminated only through use, and that the use through which the special particles under consideration are removed from the body is only the generative act, so that they may well be conserved until used for generation. Besides, it suffices to assume that the transmitted plastidules are not the identical ones of the grandparents, but molecules that have, by assimilative nutrition and growth, become, in all properties and capacities like them, and for our argument may be, therefore, considered as such. Not only plastidules of the grandparents are assumed to be contained in the germ of the child, but also plastidules of the great-grandparents, and a long line of ancestors; and the difference between the germs of children of different parents consists in the very fact that each contains the plastidules (molecules or bundles of force) of its own individual line of ancestors. The further back we can trace the genealogy of a child, the more complicated becomes the representation of the genetic constitution of its germ. How many generations there may have been and passed away between the birth of the child of to-day and the time of its ancestors in the far past, or since the existence of the first human parents! Let us suppose a primitive pair—Adam and Eve. Their children came from germs which were wholly derived from their bodies. The germs of the children of these children contained, mixed with the modified plastidules of their immediate progenitors, some of the plastidules of the first parental pair; and so on for succeeding generations. The further removed from the first ancestor, the smaller, of course, the quantity of the share in the constitution of the germ of the progeny. To express the idea arithmetically: in each succeeding generation the numerator remaining the same, the denominator of the fraction of the set of plastidules from a particular ancestor increases.

Plastidules, though inconceivably small, nevertheless have actual dimensions, and it may well be conceived that after a certain vast number of generations the plastidules of a particular ancestor may exist very sparsely, or even not all, in the germ of the progeny. This does not prevent, however, that the influence of these ancestral plastidules persists for a long time, since the plastidules of the succeeding ancestors still contain them more or less mixed or modified. There may be circumstances, however, of which we are as yet ignorant, which may cause the exhaustion or diminution, or lessen the influence, of any particular plastidules, and these possibilities become a kind of qualification of the proposition that the germ of every derivative living being contains plastidules of all its ancestors. I have named this explanation of the phenomena of inheritance, the hypothesis of regeneration, because, according to it, the ancestors are, to a certain extent, bodily, mentally and in every other respect, born again in their progeny. It may be called also, the hypothesis of the preservation of organic force, or of preservation of organic molecules, because, according to it, certain plastidules are, though not forever, for a long time, preserved and transmitted from generation to generation. To designate the idea more simply I use the term Plastidule Theory. It seems to me that the occurrences of hereditary transmission which I have brought before you this evening are brought a step nearer to our understanding by the acceptance of the plastidule theory. And you also see that there is a material basis for the notions of the novelist, theologian, etc., of which I spoke in the beginning of this discourse.

In the presentation of the subject of hereditary transmission, and my explanation of the same, I have purposely not referred to Darwinism, or to the doctrine of development. Persons who have not made themselves sufficiently familiar with the subject to be able to form an opinion upon it, and even those who, for any reason whatsoever, are opponents of the transmutation theory, may accept my views of regeneration to a certain extent. While I have desired to prevent the mixing up of the discussion of the plastidule theory, before the Club this evening, with the discussion of Darwinism or of the evolution theory, I do not hesitate to admit that so far as I am personally concerned I am as much convinced of the correctness of the development doctrine as I am of my own existence, but it is not necessary for my present purpose to enter into the discussion of this doctrine.

In conclusion, I desire to draw your attention to a point which has much exercised both the contending parties, the adherents as well as the opponents of the theory of descent, and which, it seems to me, my hypothesis fully meets. The point relates to embryology and geology.

In this case I will proceed just as I did in the presentation of inheritance. I will first place the facts before you and then the explanation. As I have already informed you, man with every vertebrate animal (with some exceptions, even every living being) begins its individual existence in the form of an ovum or egg. In their original condition almost all eggs are of the same form and constitution. Afterward the eggs of some animals may be distinguished from those of others by differences in size, shape, in their covering; etc.; but the human ovum cannot be distinguished from that of the other mammals in either the immature or the developed condition. In the fully developed condition its diameter is on an average one-tenth of a line or about a fifth of a millimeter. When a mammalian egg is properly isolated, placed upon a plate of glass and held against the light, it can but just be seen with the naked eye as a fine speck. But even if we use the best microscope with the greatest magnifying power, it is impossible to discover any essential difference between the ovum of man and that of the ape, of the dog, rabbit, etc. There are, however, striking peculiarities by which we can distinguish very easily the mature mammalian egg from the mature bird egg, or that of other vertebrates. But the eggs of all vertebrate animals begin their development in an essentially similar manner.

The first consequence of fecundation, or of the mixture of the female and male semen, is the resulting homogeneity of the contents of the egg. Between the yolk and the vitelline membrane a clear liquid accumulates, on account of which the yolk becomes condensed and contracted; and after the spermatic particles have been completely dissolved in the mass of yolk, and probably uniformly distributed therein, the germinal vesicle disappears together with the germinal spot. In this condition the germ is called "Monerula."

In this homogeneous globule there is formed, after a short time, a new nucleus. In the darkly granulated substance there appears a light spot, which becomes of globular shape, and soon appears so much like the previous nucleus or germinal vesicle, that for a long time naturalists had confounded it with the old one, and believed that the disappearance of the germinal vesicle was only apparent, not real. Then begins the process of increase of the egg-cell by repeated self-division, the so-called segmentation. It commences by the division of the new nucleus into two. The nucleus at its middle at first becomes constricted. Signs of a plane of separation between the two halves appear. They go apart, and the other egg-substance accumulates around the two nuclei, so that here also a division takes place and the original egg has become two daughter eggs, which are similar to each other, and are contained within the original egg membrane. This process is repeated in the case of each of the two daughter eggs. At first the nucleus of each of these divides into two nuclei, the two nuclei separate from each other, and each accumulates around itself its share of protoplasm, so that each becomes divided into two complete bodies. We then have four granddaughter eggs contained in the membrane of the original egg—the grandmother egg. In the same manner the process is repeated many, many times, each of the four eggs dividing into two, so that we get eight, the eight change into sixteen, then into thirty-two, then into sixty-four, one hundred and twenty-eight, two hundred and fifty-six, etc., all the globules lying close to each other, and finally when the whole process of division is ended they constitute together one large globule which looks like a blackberry or mulberry. In this stage of development the germ is called "Morula." No matter whether we have before us the egg of a fish, of a bird, or a mammal, in every vertebrate animal the segmentation occurs in essentially the same manner. Even in most lower animals segmentation occurs in a similar though sometimes slightly different way. This segmentation is shown in this drawing.

It would take too much time to describe the further stages of development in detail and at length. It must suffice that I tell you that at a later stage, when the embryonic body consists of an oblong disk somewhat of the form of the sole of a shoe, which disk is itself composed of two layers, the endoderm and exoderm, and afterward of three or four layers when further developed, even then all vertebrate animals, that is, mammals, birds, reptiles, amphibians and fishes, resemble each other so much that it is either impossible to distinguish them from each other, or that this can only be done by their size or by very insignificant differences in form and external contour. This stage of development I have also had drawn, and it is impossible to tell whether this embryonal trace is that of a mammal or some other vertebrate.

The more development progresses, the more plainly differences appear between the embryos of the different classes. In a little while, when the higher classes are still alike, they separate themselves more and more from the lower.

In a further stage, the fiddle form, which is shown on the same chart, although the embryos of mammals, birds and reptiles cannot be distinguished from each other, they can be distinguished from the embryos of the two lower classes—amphibians and fishes. In a still further, but nevertheless still early period of development, (which is seen in the next chart,) small differences may already be noted between the embryos of the three higher vertebrate classes. The individual embryos of each class are, however, still alike, and great similarity still exists between the embryos of all vertebrate animals in this stage. If, however, you compare the embryos upon this large chart, you can, in the upper row, recognize differences of development. There are here represented a reptile (turtle) four weeks old, measuring in reality four lines, but here much magnified; a bird (domestic fowl) of the fourth day, also about four lines long; and two mammals (dog and human) of the fourth week, about five lines long. They have been drawn to the same scale, and it is plain to see that there are differences. For instance, in the brains of the two mammals, compared with those of the bird and reptile. In the two latter the mid-brain, in the two former the front-brain already shows preponderance. But in this stage the brain of the bird can hardly be distinguished from that of the turtle, and the brain of the dog is still very similar to the human. If now we compare the embryos of the lower row—turtle of the sixth week, measuring about seven lines; chicken, eighth day, about seven and a half lines; dog, sixth week, eight and a half lines; man, eighth week, eight and a half lines—we may easily perceive not only differences between the mammals and the two lower classes more and more marked, but the differences between the dog and man, (for instance, as to the brain, as to the tail, etc.) cannot be mistaken.

I have had another chart prepared, in which the same embryos are presented in their developed condition at the time of birth, and then again in their adult condition, in order to show you more plainly the differences of the final development from quite similar eggs.

These are well-ascertained facts of Embryology, the so-called ontogeny or individual development. Every animal passes, in its development, through stages like those which remain permanent in lower animals. For instance, the reptile is like a fish before it assumes the reptilian character; birds and mammals are like fishes and reptiles before they acquire the peculiarities of their classes; and the human embryo, also, passes through the stages of these lower animals. Man possesses the same structure as all other mammals, and his germ is developed in the same manner. In later periods of development, the human germ cannot be distinguished from that of the higher mammals; in earlier periods not even from that of any higher vertebrate. In the first month the human embryo is exactly like that of other mammals. The differences appear only in the second month. At first the human embryo resembles the embryo of all, afterwards only that of the higher mammals. It is only after the fourth or fifth month that the human embryo can be distinguished with certainty from that of other mammals.

The facts of geology, namely, the palaeontological development of organisms, the so-called phylogeny, are: that, at first, of vertebrate animals, there existed only fishes, that amphibians appeared later, and that only at a much later period birds and mammals came upon the earth. Again, that at first, more imperfect, simple, lower orders, and later, more complicated and higher orders of the mammals, as well as of the fishes appeared. The paleontic development, therefore, has been parallel to the embryonic, and also to the systematic series, that is to the series of rank which we see every-where in the differences of lower and higher classes, orders, etc.

I do not mean by this to say that there has ever been found a fossil animal which, in all its details, has the structural relations of an embryo, but it cannot be denied that the series of growth, that is the successive changes in the egg, and the series of time, that is the successive introduction of animals in geological ages, are remarkably similar.

Now the explanation: The transmutationists, that is, those who accept the development doctrine as true, claim that the parallelism between the series of embryonic growth and geological succession most strongly supports that doctrine. They say that this correspondence and its cause can be understood only through the doctrine of descent, and that without this doctrine it is entirely inexplicable. According to them, in the progress of a lower form to a higher one, the permanent condition of the lower must become a temporary development-state of the higher; and they assert that the individual development, that is the ontogeny, is the short and rapid repetition or recapitulation of the paleontological development, or the phylogeny, and that this recapitulation is necessarily caused by the laws of heredity and adaptation.

The expression of the relationship between individual development and the evolution of species is the fundamental biontogenetical law, that is the law according to which every derivative individual organism is developed.

The opponents of the doctrine of descent reply by urging that if the parallelism between embryonic growth and geological succession can be held to prove the development of the one out of the other, then, also, (since the embryonic conditions of the higher vertebrates correspond to adult forms of lower vertebrates, now living, their own contemporaries, just as much and in the same way as do the fossil forms) as, for example, a chicken, or a dog, in our day, in a certain phase of its development, resembles a full-grown skate; then, therefore, chickens and dogs now-a-days can grow out of fish eggs. Now we know that this is not so! But, say they, the evidence that it must be so is exactly the same as that which the transmutationists use to support their theory; therefore embryological facts cannot be held to be evidence of descent, because they prove too much, for the parallelism between the successive embryonic conditions and fossil remains, which, according to the evolutionists, proves descent, exists also between these embryonic conditions and living animals, where it can have nothing to do with descent. "Why does the germ of a turtle always produce a turtle, the germ of a snake always a snake, the germ of a dog always a dog, the germ of a man always a human being?"

I have quoted the claims of the transmutationists, as well as those of their opponents, from the published lectures of the chief representatives of both parties, Ernst Haeckel, and Louis Agassiz. It seems to me that the Plastidule Theory satisfactorily explains the biontogenetical law and completely overthrows the arguments of the anti-evolutionists. It may, therefore, well be considered a not unimportant contribution to the doctrine of evolution.

According to the fundamental biontogenetical law, the individual development is a short recapitulation of the development of the species. The opponents of the development theory deny, not the correctness of the observed facts, but the admissibility of the interpretation, because, as they say, otherwise chickens and dogs must, at the present day, be developed from fish eggs. Now, the plastidule theory says that the germ of every derivative living being contains the plastidules of its own ancestry. These plastidules, of course, exert their influence in the development of the germ, and this is the reason why the series of forms through which the individual organism passes in its development from egg to completed condition, is a short repetition of the extended series of forms through which the ancestors of the same organism have passed from the oldest times to the present day. Furthermore, the reason why a fish, and not a chicken or a dog, grows out of the germ of a fish, is that the germs of the different living beings existing at the present day, which have passed through stages of development that are different, are, in their constitution or mixture of plastidules, so completely dissimilar (just because each contains those of its own ancestry), that one organism can never be developed from the germ of another.

This completely answers the question which Agassiz propounded with so much self-satisfaction, and which has been held by so many of his followers to be an unanswerable refutation of the evolution doctrine.

PROF. T. LAMBERT made a few friendly criticisms upon the lecture. He doubted the great ages said to be attained by persons a century ago. He might be induced to admit that old Methuselah lived to be nearly a thousand years old, but he doubted whether Parr lived to be a hundred and fifty. He believed there was an error in most cases where such extreme age is claimed. He at all events held himself in readiness to pay $1,000 for every well-authenticated case of persons living to be 110 years old and $500 for every well-authenticated case of 105 years being reached. The oldest person now known in the United States is not 104 years old.

He insisted that the eggs or ovums of different animals are not alike, but really as different as the individualities themselves, each possessing a potentiality or life principle, and different from every other. The trouble is they are so minute the differences cannot be appreciated with our powers of vision even with the aid of the microscope. He mentioned as a remarkable phenomenon in photography, what appears to the unaided eye a mere speck, barely discernible which when duly magnified was found to be the Lord's Prayer in full.

DR. ATKINSON thought the lecture a very interesting one, though he made a few slight criticisms as to a point or two. The gist of his remarks was that back of the germs, the ovums or egg, back of the plastids there is an intelligent force which he termed "ghost."

MR. MORAN followed, in which he had much to say about the "first cause" of all that exists.

DR. HALLOCK recognized a "spirit" in the union—the source of matter, and superior to it. The moving life principle or force.

S. P. ANDREWS made a few remarks upon longevity. Life he said had been compared to a furnace, with grate bars and everything in working order; as the fuel is consumed the slag falls into the ash-pit. If the slag is allowed to remain until the fire is choked it must go out and cannot burn; but if the slag is duly removed, and the fuel from time to time properly applied, in suitable quantity and quality, the fire would continue to burn almost indefinitely. So with the human frame. If the slag-waste is properly removed, the fuel correctly applied, and the entire apparatus kept in the right condition, it occurred to him the fire of life ought to continue to burn, not only for one hundred years, but one hundred and twenty five or one hundred and fifty or even a greater number of years.

PROF. ELSBERG closed the discussion in which he took occasion to reply to each of the gentlemen who had answered him. He recognized Prof. Lambert's "Potentiality," his term for it is "Plastidules." What Dr. Atkinson termed "Ghost" he called "Plastidules," what Mr. Moran meant by "First Cause" he meant by "Plastidules" what Dr. Hallock recognized as "Spirit," he denominated "Plastidules."

MARCH 26TH.

[TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SIXTH MEETING.]

REV. DR. E. G. HOLLAND lecturer of the evening. Subject, The Hebrew Race.

He began by saying different races had different missions or were adapted to a special line of pursuit. The Hebrews were emphatically a religious people. The Greeks excelled in art and literature. The Romans in government, science and jurisprudence.

It has not been the province of Europe to produce a permanent religion. With Asia it has been different. Brahmanism, Buddhism, Christianity, and Moslemism, the four great religions of the world, originated there. Asia may be said to be the center-brain of the world, Europe the cerebrum of front brain, and Africa the cerebellum or back brain, Europe was the old west, America the new west.

The Hebrews were the principal of the Semetic races, while the Arabs probably came next, then the Assyrians and others. They have existed about four thousand years, and have evinced much hardihood, healthfulness and self-preservation. As a race they had not been remarkable in science and learning. Palestine had closed its gates to the learning of Greece, while India was the seat and source and the literature of the world.

The most intellectual man in ancient Jerusalem was Solomon, but he was not equal to Aristotle or Bacon.

The Semetic race has given to the world the three great religions of the earth, Judaism Christianity, and Moslemism. The last two are an outgrowth of the first. The Hebrew, though living in an age of the world when Polytheism was every-where prevalent, was the nation to introduce Monotheism into the world.

The lecture, alluded to the characteristic sharpness of the Hebrews in trade, and styled them "the Yankees of the East." He regarded them of Egyptian origin, and spoke of their early home in the mountain regions of Mesopotamia, and sketched their pastoral life under the patriarchal system, followed by the rule of Moses, who may be said to have established a nation for the first time in the world upon the principle of Monotheism, followed by a rule of the judges which lasted four hundred years, succeeded by a line of kings for many centuries. Illustrative of their tenacity and endurance, notwithstanding their captivity, subjection, dispersions and persecutions, they now number over seven millions of people, five millions of which were in Europe. He classed them as free traders and generally opposed to tariff and revenue laws, and they had always shown themselves willing to evade them.

He made a remark that the gods of different nations possessed the leading characteristics of the different nationalities. Thus Brahm, the leading deity of India was a god of repose, possessing limited activity, his followers possessing the same characteristics, while Jehovah possessed great activity, rejoicing in battles, conflicts, and movements of large magnitude.

He called attention to the great persecutions the Jews had been subjected to by different nations among whom they had sojourned, and called particular attention to the hardships they endured in Spain; the exactions that were placed upon them; the levies that were made upon them, and the cruelty with which they were driven from the country, at short notice, by the Christian powers in rule there. He said no people in the world had been persecuted equal to them—over two thousand of them were burned in one province in Spain, and ten thousand others cruelly punished. They were allowed but a few days to leave the kingdom, and were compelled to dispose of their property at great sacrifice, and were allowed to take neither gold or silver in payment. The air was filled with shrieks and groans of the suffering Hebrews as they left the country. Some of the number fled to France, some to England, while large numbers went to Africa; great numbers perishing from the destitution and hardship thus sustained.

He alluded to the lack of the general belief in immortality among the Jews, and the fact that they had bequeathed to the world Monotheism and the Sabbath. Among the brightest philosophers, the Hebrew race had produced, he named, Spinoza, as a great philosopher and a great thinker.

He believed the Jewish race would never simultaneously come to the decision to return to Palestine. They were now scattered over the earth among so many nations, among which they are a factor and a positive element of activity and practical character, that they would never disengage themselves and return to the small country of Palestine, which was only about the size of the State of New Jersey, and whose soil was so unproductive and worn out that it has been said of it "if it is tickled with the hoe it will not laugh in the harvest."

He said much also of the Hebrews, which we are, for want of room, compelled to omit.

A spirited discussion followed, participated in by Messrs. Nash, Rice, Dr. Hallock, Dr. Hoerber, and Dr. Lambert, and others, in which the cause of the long continuance of the Jewish race and other points were argued, but we must pass them by.

APRIL 2D, 1875.

[TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-SEVENTH MEETING.]

By MR. WILLIAM S. FLIPPEN, Esq., formerly Cuba correspondent of The N. Y. Tribune. Subject: The Spanish Rule in Cuba.

This was a most interesting lecture by a gentleman who had many years been a resident of Cuba, and was painfully familiar with the great wrongs which are imposed upon the Cubans by the Spaniards. He portrayed the great injustice of the laws enacted in Spain for the government of the island without any regard for the wishes or interests of the Cubans; how the main object was to extort money from the islanders in every possible manner, by the imposition of taxes and special levies. He gave us an inside view of the injustice of the rule of the Captain-Generals, who are sent out from the parent government to reign with a rod of iron, and who are responsible to nobody, except to the home government, and to which no appeal can practically be made. He gave the amount of annual revenue by taxation and imports raised on the Island, usually about thirty-one million dollars, but some years, by special imposition, had been raised to fifty-seven millions, and how a large share of this is diverted to the Captain-General, his subordinates and to members of the home government.

He gave us a glimpse of the African Slave trade; that as many as twenty thousand negroes were annually brought over from Africa and sold into slavery, and how, when a slave vessel is captured, or rescued in case of shipwreck, these unfortunate negroes are nominally considered free, and are called Emancipados, but are sold into bondage for a term of years, which is often renewed and very frequently they are reported as dead, and the names of slaves who really have died are transferred to them, so that they rarely escape from their cruel servitude. The condition of the Chinese coolies is little better, they lead the most abject lives, and when their time is expired, by a series of wrongs and oppressions they are compelled to again sell themselves into servitude, which is not unfrequently terminated by death. Of all the wretched creatures in the world, he believed the Chinese in Cuba the most wretched.

He alluded to the workings of the Royal Lottery, and informed us how all classes, merchants, lawyers, priests, and common people, patronize it. Gaming of other kinds is also extensively patronized. He gave us a clear idea of the great fertility of the soil, and of the immense crops of fruits and products of all kinds that so freely grow, and also of the great need of roads and railroads over which to send produce to market and inter-communication generally. The climate of the Island is not surpassed in the world. The sun, though warm in the middle of the day, the nights are cool and agreeable. Cuba has no free schools; no free religious thought, and no religious dissension from the Holy Catholic Church. The power of their priesthood is great and exacting. Every individual is compelled to pay his church taxes, and to contribute to the support of the recognized religion.

Much was said by the lecturer we would be glad to lay before our readers, but want of space prevents.

An animated discussion was held upon the subject by Mr. Wilcox, T. B. Wakeman, Dr. Hallock, Dr. Lambert, Dr. Wickoff, and Messrs. Evans and Gardner, and closed by Mr. Flippen. Among other points the subject of annexing Cuba to the United States was discussed, and the proper remedies for the future of the Island were ably handled and variously viewed. Some were in favor of our government extending aid to the Cubans, and some were opposed to it. Upon the whole the lecture and the discussion were very interesting.

FORTY-TWO SCHOOL CHILDREN DESTROYED BY TWO BEARS!—A certain semi-occasional preacher of the Methodist stripe, recently declared from behind the "sacred desk"—"Our people have not now to go to Boston and New York for Infidel filth, for it is here under our very noses; and it is an act of mercy (!) in our citizens to submit to the stings which this paper inflicts upon them." His Reverence did not more particularly describe the object of his animadversion, but presuming he had reference to our organ, we will remark that he is nearly as irascible as that crusty old cock of a prophet named Elisha. The dear, charming story may be found in II Kings, ii: 23-24: "And he went up from thence into Beth-el; and as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city, and mocked him, and said unto him, 'Go up, thou bald head; go up, thou bald head.' And he turned back and looked on them, and cursed them in the name of the Lord. And there came forth two she-bears out of the wood, and tare forty and two children of them."

Now why does n't this indignant divine curse us "in the name of the Lord," and cause two she-bears to claw us up? The God that could ferociously butcher forty-two little innocents for playfully crying, "Go up bald head," would not hesitate, if called upon by one of his admiring servants, to go for us, red-eyed. What a sweet little duck of a story this is. How it intensifies the soul with delight, and fills the mind with divine admiration for this child-murdering Deity! But seriously, is it any wonder that human beings who believe in and worship at the shrine of such a diabolical and degrading fetish should cry out against Common Sense, and arrogate to themselves the quality of mercy because they refrained from mobbing the man and destroying his office, who dares to spend money and brains to aid in crushing out of the minds and hearts of the people such besotted superstition? And, what pray you, was this unfeeling monster, Elisha, doing while the two she-bears were crunching the forty-two girls and boys? Why, he was standing in fair view with his hands in his pockets, contemplating the scene with the sang-froid of a Camanche Indian! And where were God, and Christ, and the Holy Ghost? There too, listening with ecstatic raptures to each little girl and boy, as it stood transfixed with terror, screaming at the top of its voice, "Ma! ma!" until its turn came to be devoured by the godly brutes! Of course, the heavenly quartette stayed on the ground until the parents of the unfortunate children got news of the massacre, and flew to the spot to weep and wail over the scattered remains of the bloody and mutilated corpses of their babies! How God, and Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, and Elisha chuckled in their sleeves at the cries of anguish from each mother's bosom! and the yells of impotent rage from each father's heart! It was a divine tragedy and worthy of the Christian's God and his two she-bears! And establishes, beyond the cavil of Infidels—God's existence, his attributes, the authenticity of the Scriptures, and the prophetic character of Saint Elisha!—Common Sense, a monthly paper whose motto is: "One world at a time!" Published at Paris, Texas, at 75 cents per annum, by R. Peterson, Sinner; if you are already a patron take an extra copy or two for the dying souls around you.

THE gallus Milwaukee girl says no more, when asked how she feels: "Oh I'm all hunk," but she gushes a little and observes, "So, so, dear father."

CATALOGUE

FOR SALE BY D. M. BENNETT, Editor
"TRUTH SEEKER," 335 B'DWAY. NEW YORK.

~~32~~ All orders, with the price of books desired, and the additional amount mentioned for postage, will meet with prompt attention. Postage is free where no postage is mentioned.

 Ancient Symbol Worship..... $2.00 15 Antiquity of Man, by Lyell..... 3.00 20 Autobiography of J. S. Mill..... 2.50 20 Ancient Faiths, by Inman..... 27.00 16 Alice Vale, by Lois Waisbrooker..... 1.25 16 American Crisis, by Warren Chase..... .25 4 Answers to Questions, Practical and Spiritual, by A. J. Davis..... 1.50 20 Apocryphal New Testament..... 1.25 14 A Peep into Sacred Tradition, by Orrin Abbot..... .50 Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine..... .50 8 Age of Reason, by Thomas Paine, Paper..... .25 6 Arcana of Nature, by Hudson Tuttle, Vols. I and II..... 1.25 16 A B C of Life, by A. B. Child..... .25 4 Arabula; or, The Divine Guest, by A. J. Davis..... 1.50 16 Approaching Crisis, by A. J. Davis..... 1.00 14 Apostles (translated from the French), by Renan..... 1.75 20 Astronomy and Worship of the Ancients, by G. Vale..... .20 4 A Stellar Key to the Summer Land, by A. J. Davis. Paper Covers..... .30 8 Astro-Theological Lectures, by Rev. Robert Taylor..... 2.00 26 A Kiss for a Blow, a book for children, by H. C. Wright. Small Edition..... .60 12 Large Edition..... 1.50 16 An Eye-opener, by Zepa. Paper Covers..... .50 8 Bible in the Balance, by J. G. Fish..... 1.50 16 Blakeman's 200 Riddles..... .20 Bible in India..... 2.00 20 Beliefs of the Unbelievers, by Frothingham..... .20 4 Better Views of Living, by A. B. Child..... 1.00 12 Brotherhood of Man, and what Follows from It..... .25 5 Book on the Microscope..... .75 5 Book of Religions, by J. Hayward..... 2.00 15 Bible Chronology, by M. B. Craven..... .10 2 Bailey's Festus..... 1.25 Buechner's Man. English Edition..... 4.00 20 Boccaccio's Decameron..... 1.50 15 Buddha! Is there a God?..... .05 Buddhist Nihilism, by Max Muller..... .10 Buechner's Materialism..... .25 By-and-By, by E. Maitland..... 1.75 15 Buechner's Force and Matter..... 3.00 20 Bastian's Modes of Origin..... 1.25 15 Beginnings of Life, by Bastian..... 5.00 25 Buckle's History of Civilization..... 6.00 40 Birds and Beeples, by Figuier..... 4.00 25 Body and Mind, by Maudsley..... 2.00 20 Babbitt's Health Guide..... 1.00 10 Burroughs' Notes on Walt Whitman..... 1.00 Correlation of Forces, by Youmans..... 2.00 20 Cooper on the Soul..... .90 10 Clodd's Childhood of the World..... .50 5 Cranial Affinities of Man and the Ape, by Professor R. Virchow, of Berlin..... .25 3 Comte's Philosophy of the Sciences..... 2.00 15 Confucius and Chinese Classics..... 2.00 15 Confucius' Life and Teachings, by Legge..... 4.00 15 Child's Book of Religion, by Frothingham..... 1.00 10 Confessions of an Inquirer, by J. J. Jarves. Very interesting..... 1.50 15 Curious Myths of the Middle Ages, by S. B. Gould..... 2.50 20 Clergy a Source of Danger, by Jamison..... 1.75 15 Christianity before Christ, by M. B. Craven..... .25 4 Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life in all Ages and Nations, by Wm. R. Alger..... 3.50 40 Contrast, Evangelism and Spiritualism Compared, by Moses Hull..... 1.50 16 Criticism on the Apostle Paul, in Defence of Woman's Rights, etc., by M. B. Craven..... .25 4 Conjugal Sins against the Laws of Life and Health, by A. K. Gardner, A.M., M.D..... 1.50 16 Constitution of Man, by George Combe..... 1.75 16 Common-sense Thoughts on the Bible, by Wm. Denton..... .10 4 Common Sense, by Thomas Paine..... .20 4 'Christ Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle..... Christ and the People, by A. B. Child, M.D..... 1.00 24 Christianity and Materialism Contrasted, by B. F. Underwood..... .15 4 Christian Amendment, by Abbot..... .10 Christianity no Finality; or, Spiritualism Superior to Christianity, by Wm. Denton..... .05 2 Criticism on the Theological Idea of Deity, by B. M. Craven..... 1.00 16 Chapters from the Bible of the Ages, by G. B. Stebbins, Detroit, Mich., 400 pages, tinted paper..... 1.50 24 Christian Propagandism, by Abbot..... .10 2 Claims of Spiritualism, embracing the Experience of an Investigator, by a Medical Man..... .25 4 Compulsory Education, by Abbot..... .5 2 Christianity, by S. B. Gould..... 2.00 Dictionary (Webster's unabridged) Pocket, flexible cover..... 12.00 60 Descent of Man, by Darwin, 2 vols. ($2 per vol.)..... 4.00 48 Descent and Darwinism. Oscar Schmitt..... 1.50 15 Devil's Pulpit, by Robert Taylor, Deluge, by Wm. Denton..... 2.00 20 .10 4 	 English Life of Jesus, by Scott..... 2.00 15 Enigmas of Life, by Gregg..... 2.00 15 Exeter Hall, a Theological Romance, paper..... .60 10 Empire of the Mother over the Character and Destiny of the Race, by H. C. Wright..... .50 8 Elective Affinities, by Goethe..... 1.25 16 Electrical Psychology, by Dodds..... 1.50 16 Epidemic Delusions, Dr. Marvin..... .25 Fear of the Living God, by Frothingham..... .05 2 Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World, by Robert Dale Owen..... 1.75 24 Free Thoughts concerning Religion; or Nature vs. Theology, by A. J. Davis, paper..... .50 4 Faithful Guardian, an Inspirational Story, by J. Wm. Van Namee..... 1.50 16 Fountain, by A. J. Davis..... 1.00 12 Fugitive Wife, by Warren Chase..... .35 8 God in the Constitution, by Bradford..... .10 2 Good Sense, by Baron D'Holbach..... 1.00 Gates Ajar, by Miss E. S. Phelps..... 1.50 16 Gates Wide Open, by Geo. Wood..... 1.50 20 Gist of Spiritualism, by Warren Chase..... .50 8 Gospel of Good and Evil, by Silver..... 1.50 20 Great Harmonia, by A. J. Davis, 6 vols., viz., Vol. I, The Physician; Vol. II, The Teacher; Vol. III, The Seer; Vol. IV, The Reformer; Vol. V, The Thinker, each..... 1.50 18 God Idea in History, by Hudson Tuttle..... 1.25 16 Gibbon's History of Rome, 6 vols., sheep..... 10.00 ex Geology of the Stars, by Winchell..... .15 Genesis and Ethics of Conjugal Love, by A. J. Davis. 142 pp..... .50 5 Gregg's Creed of Christendom..... 2.50 15 Harbinger of Health, by Andrew J. Davis..... 1.50 20 Harmonical Man; or Thoughts for the Age..... .50 8 History and Philosophy of Evil, paper..... .50 6 Hayward's Book of all Religions..... 1.75 24 Helen Harlow's Vow, by Lois Waisbrooker..... 1.50 20 How to Bathe, by E. P. Miller, M.D., paper..... .30 8 Hedged in, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps..... 1.50 16 History of the Intellectual Development of Europe, by J. W. Draper, M.D., LL.D..... 5.00 60 History of the Conflict between Science and Religion. Draper..... 1.75 15 Human Physiology, Statistical and Dynamical; or, The Conditions and Course of Life of Man, by J. W. Draper, M.D., LL.D. 650 pp., cloth..... 5.00 60 Hobbes' Works, 16 Vols., Royal 8vo..... 25.00 History of European Morals, by Lecky..... 6.00 40 History of Rationalism in Europe, by Lecky..... 4.00 30 Higher Law, by Maitland..... 1.75 15 Hegel's Philosophy of History..... 2.00 15 Half-hours with Modern Scientists, cloth, 12mo., reduced to..... 1.00 15 History of American Socialism, by J. H. Noyes..... 3.00 20 Historic Americans, by Parker..... 1.50 15 His Marriage Vow, by Mrs. Corbin..... 1.50 15 Injurious Influences of Schools..... .25 2 Influence of Christianity on Civilization by B. F. Underwood..... .25 Is Romanism Real Christianity? Two Essays, by Francis W. Newman and F. E. Abbot..... .10 Is the Bible Divine? by S. J. Phinney, paper..... .35 4 Is there a Devil? The argument pro and con..... .25 4 Incidents in my Life, first series, by Cooper..... 1.00 16 Is it the Despair of Science? by W. D. Gunning..... .15 4 Impressible Conflict and the Unity of God, by Emma Hardinge and T. G. Forster..... .25 4 Ingersoll's Gods and other lectures, neatly bound..... 2.00 30 Is Spiritualism True? by William Denton..... .15 4 Irreconcilable Records of Genesis and Genealogy, by Wm. Denton, paper..... .25 8 Incidents of Life, second series. Home..... 1.50 15 Junius Unmasked; or, Thomas Paine the author of the Letters of Junius and the Declaration of Independence..... 1.50 16 Jehovah Unveiled; or, the Character of the Jewish Deity Delineated..... .35 8 Joan of Arc, a biography..... 1.00 12 Kant's Critique of Pure Reason..... 2.00 King David and his Times..... 1.50 20 Key to Political Science, by John Senff..... 1.25 Koran, with explanatory notes, by George Sale, 8vo., 670 pp. Best edition yet published..... 2.75 40 Law of Marriage, by C. L. James..... .25 4 Looking Beyond, by Barrett..... .75 12 Life Line of the Lone One, by Warren Chase..... 1.00 2 	 Library of Mesmerism, by Wells..... 4.00 25 Love, from Michelet..... 1.50 15 Life of Fourier, by Shaw..... 1.50 15 Life of Parker, by Weiss, 2 Vols..... 6.00 30 Lessons for Children about Themselves, by A. E. Newton, cloth..... .50 5 Lectures on the Bible, by Voysey..... .10 4 Modern Thinker, Nos. 1 and 2, each..... 1.00 Mental Medicine, by Evans..... 1.25 14 Ministry of Angels Realized, by A. E. Newton..... .20 4 Manual for Children (for Lyceums), by A. J. Davis, cloth..... .70 16 My Affinity, and other Stories, by Lizzie Doten..... 1.50 20 Mediumship, its Laws and Conditions, with brief instructions for the formation of Spirit Circles, by J. H. Powell..... .25 2 Moravia, Eleven Days at, by T. R. Hazard..... .10 Married Woman; Biographies of Good Wives, by L. Maria Child..... 1.25 16 Modern American Spiritualism, 1848-1868, by Emma Hardinge..... 2.75 32 Moral Physiology, by R. D. Owen..... .65 Myths and Myth-makers, by John Fiske..... 2.00 20 Mystery of Matter, by Picton..... 3.50 25 Morning Lectures (twenty discourses), by A. J. Davis..... 1.50 18 Mediums and Mediumship, by T. R. Hazard..... .10 2 Mental Cure..... 1.50 18 Martyrdom of Man, by Reade..... 3.00 Man in the Past, Present, and Future, by Dr. L. Buechner, elegant English Edition..... 4.00 20 Masculine Cross, or Sex Worship, illustrated, paper, 50c., cloth..... 1.00 New Physiognomy, by Wells, gilt..... 6.00 25 Nebulae, Meteoric Showers and Comets..... .25 2 Nature's Laws in Human Life; an Exposition of Spiritualism..... 1.50 20 New Testament Miracles and Modern Miracles..... .60 8 Nature's Divine Revelations, by A.
---	--	--

Scottish Western Loan Co.,G. L. HENDERSON & CO.,*Bankers,*Le Roy, Minnesota,*GEN'L SUPPLY AGENCY,

BRANCH OFFICE, 335 Broadway, N. Y.

H. B. BROWN Sec'y.

MONEY INVESTED

IN FIRST MORTGAGES

On Improved Farms in Minnesota and Iowa,

Running 3 to 5 years, with Coupon Interest Notes, drawing 9 per cent. annually in advance, or 10 per cent. paid semi-annually in advance, free of expense to the Loaner. Interest collected and paid annually at Gilman, Son & Co's Bank, 47 Exchange Pl. New York. No expense to loaner. Title and security guaranteed in every loan made by us. We pay 9 per cent. until money is invested.

The Agency will purchase and forward goods in any quantity to any part of the United States, and transact any business whatever for parties living at a distance, thereby SAVING to the purchasers from 20 TO 50 PER CENT.

The Agency is also prepared to transact any business that may be entrusted to them, such as effecting Insurance on Life and Property, renting property and collecting rents, searching records and examining titles, procuring legal advice, negotiating the sale or exchange of real estate, investing money for capitalists, obtaining desired information, and imparting advice other than legal; in short, we will undertake the execution of any legitimate business which persons in the country may require to have done in New York City.

SPECIAL ATTENTION GIVEN TOLIFE INSURANCEOn the most SAFE and reliable plan.PRICE LIST OF CLOTHING.

Grey Union Sack Overcoats,	$5 50 to $6 50
Black Wool Sack Overcoats,	8 00 to 10 00
Blue Chinchilla ditto,	9 00 to 11 00
Mixed Fur Beaver Overcoat,	14 00 to 16 00
Grey Reefing Jackets,	3 50 to 4 75
Black All Wool Sack Coats,	8 00 to 9 50
Black Cloth Frock Coats,	6 50 to 8 50
Black All Wool ditto,	8 50 to 15 50
Black Union Cloth Vests,	2 00 to 2 50
Black All Wool ditto,	2 50 to 4 00
Union Cassimere Sack Coats,	4 00 to 5 50
All Wool ditto,	6 00 to 8 00
All Wool Cassimere Suits,	13 00 to 17 00
Cassimere Pants and Vest,	7 00 to 9 00

Spring and Summer Clothing.

Cottonade Suits cut in Sacks and Walking Coats, from Light Weight, all wool, Fancy Cassimere, Suits cut in sacks and walking coats, Cottonade Pants lined and unlined,	6 50 to 8 00
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants,	1 50 to 2 50
Light Weight fancy Cassimere Pants and Vests,	2 50 to 7 50
Spring Overcoats in Cassimeres,	4 00 to 8 00
Light worsted Coats and Vests, all designs,	9 00 to 20 00
Black cloth Frock Coats,	7 00 to 20 00
Black cloth Sack Coats,	6 00 to 16 00
Union and all wool Black-Doeskin Pants,	4 50 to 6 50
Union and all wool Black Cloth Vests,	2 50 to 9 00
Linen Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Linen Pants,	1 00 to 2 00
Linen Vests,	1 00 to 2 00
White Duck and Marseilles Vests, all designs,	2 00 to 5 00
Alpaca Sack Coats,	2 00 to 5 00
Blue Flannel Sack Coats,	4 00 to 7 50
Heavy Satinet Suits, various styles,	7 00 to 8 50

The above articles of clothing are all of Superior Quality, good material, and well made, and are not surpassed by any in this city.

Measurements for clothing should include length of limbs, circumference of body over chest and stomach.

Dry Goods!

Cassimeres, all colors, per yard,	75 to 2 00
Black Doeskins,	1 00 to 2 00
Broadcloth (double width)	2 00 to 5 01
Calicoes (by piece)	07 to 12
Ginghams	10 to 10
Dress Goods	25 to 30
Alpacas	21 to 32
Brown Sheetting,	8 to 16
Bleached Sheetting,	7 to 10
Hosiery (all colors) per dozen,	1 25 to 4 00

Millinery and Dress Goods.

Fine French Silk, per yard,	.50 to 2 00
Toquay Silk,	.60 to 1 00
Turquoise Silk,	.40 to 1 00
Fancy Satin and Silk, (remnants)	1 00
Cotton and Silk, (mixed)	.50
White English Crape,	.50 to 1 50
Ribbons,	.30 to 40
Gross Grain Sash Ribbons,	.20 to 40
Velvet, any color,	.20 to 40
Bridal Net, 1/2 wide,	.50
Bonnet Frame Lace, per dozen,	.80 to 3 00
Kid Gloves, per pair,	.90 to 1 40
Ostrich Feathers, each,	1.00 to 4 00

Miss Nellie Henderson will give her personal attention to the Millinery Department, and will fill all orders for articles of whatever kind, not mentioned above, at as low a price as can be bought of any one or any-where.

ORDERS FOR GROCERIES

Of not less than 5 lbs.

Will be promptly filled at wholesale prices, adding 5 per cent. On sums over $20 and 10 per cent. On sums less than $20.

COFFEE.

Green,	No. 1, 35 cts., No. 2, 30 cts.
Roasted,	No. 1, 37 cts., No. 2, 33 cts.

TEAS.

Oolong,	25 to 60 cents per pound.
Japan,	45 to 95
Young Hyson,	35 to 1.15
Imperial,	40 to 90
Twa Kay,	25 to 40
Eng. Breakfast,	40 to 90

ORDERS FORHATS, CAPS and FURS.

Wool Hats	from .45 to 60 cts. apiece.
Fur Hats	.80 to $4.00
Silk Hats	$2.00 to $8.00
Cloth Caps	.75 to $1.50

Furs from $2.50 to $60.00 per Set.

BOOTS AND SHOES.

Boots, Calf, (pegged)	$2.75 to $6.00 per pr.
(sewed)	2.00 to 7.00
" coarse, (pegged)	2.25 to 4.50
Shoes,	1.00 to 5.00

Families and neighbors by ordering not less than a dozen can obtain "bottom" prices, while cost of freight will be correspondingly reduced.

SPECIAL ATTENTION

Given to purchasing

Sewing Machines, Jewelryand Musical Instruments,

We can furnish most of the older Sewing Machines at 20 to 40 per cent. less than retail price.

We can send a superior two-thread hand machine for $13.
Also a superior Shuttle Machine complete for $20.

We will also make selections for

Public and Private Libraries,

Or procure any single book that may be ordered.

We can supply Agents with fast selling and profitable Novelties and Notions, and Merchants with Job Lots from Auction.

MERCANTILE COLLECTIONS.

On collections less than $50, twenty per cent.

On collections exceeding $50, ten per cent.

OBTAINING PATENTS.

From $25 to $100.

Negotiating the Sale or Exchange of Real Estate, from 2 to 5 per cent.

The commission for procuring Legal Advice, and for investing Capital, will be fixed by correspondence.

Confidential letters requiring labor and research, should include a fee adequate to the service required, but all letters of simple enquiry, enclosing stamp, will receive prompt attention.

RULES AND CONDITIONS OF THE AGENCY.

All orders for the purchase of Goods must be accompanied with the funds in the form of Postal Order, Check, or Draft on New York City, or money in Registered Letter.

All orders and directions for shipping or mailing articles must be written plainly and fully, to prevent loss, delay and trouble.

Collections, balances and remittances promptly remitted at the risk of the Agency.

Care must be taken in ordering goods to avoid mistakes, as it will be impracticable to return articles shipped.

All goods guaranteed as represented.

RATES OF TRANSPORTATION:

By mail, 4 lb. packages, or less, 8 cents per lb.

By Fast Freight, about 2 cents per lb.

By Express when great dispatch is of more account than cost.

For their respectability, integrity, and ability, the Agency are permitted to refer to the following well-known gentleman:

W. I. GILCHRIST, McGregor, Iowa.

FRANK LARRABEE, "

MORRIS ALTMAN, New York.

GILMAN, SON & CO, 47 Ex. Place, N. Y.

L. MANZ, Lyons, Iowa.

D. M. BENNETT, Ed. TRUTH SEEKER.

D. R. BURT, Dunleith, Ill.

THE Boston Investigator!THE OLDEST REFORM JOURNAL IN THE UNITED STATES

Will commence its 45th year April 18, 1875.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

at 84 Washington street, Boston, Mass., by JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

HORACE SEAVER, Editor.

PRICE: $3.50 per annum. Single copies, 7 cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a Two-Cent Stamp to pay the postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or, in other words, to Universal Mental Liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who have entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interest of this world, it confines itself to things of this life entirely. It will soon commence its forty-fifth year and asks for support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful Family Journal. Reader, please send your subscriptions for six months or one year; and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer. Now is the time to subscribe.

BEST AND CHEAPESTSEEDS

In America or Money Refunded.

Buy direct from GROWER cheaper than dirt. Can beat the world on prices, quality, reliable, fresh genuine seeds, true to name. A nice Floral and Garden Guide free. Wholesale list for Seedsmen free.

till Apl. 15.

R. H. SHUMWAY,
Rockford, Ill.A NEW BOOK.

THE

Doctrine of Descent AND DARWINISM.

By PROF. OSCAR SCHMIDT, of the University of Strasburgh.

This is No. 13 of Appleton's International Scientific Series, and is not excelled by any one of its fellows, and is richly worthy the perusal of every enquiring mind. It is a work of 334 pages, 12 mo., and contains twenty-six illustrations. It is an elaborate review and survey of the whole subject of Evolution and Darwin's special philosophy, giving in clear language a comprehensive view of the subject.

It is eminently a whole library in one volume, and we recommend it in the highest terms. Sent by mail. Price, $1.50; postage, 15 cts. Address,

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

D.M. FERRY & CO'S
NEW ILLUSTRATED,
AND DESCRIPTIVE PRICED
SEED ANNUAL
1875

Will be mailed Free to all applicants. This is one of the largest and most complete Catalogues published. It is printed on beautifully tinted paper, contains 216 pages, two elegant colored plates, over 300 fine engravings, and gives full descriptions, prices, and directions for planting about 1200 varieties of Vegetable and Flower Seeds, Bedding Plants, Roses, &c., and is invaluable to Farmer, Gardener and Florist.

Address, D. M. FERRY & CO.
Seedsmen and Florists, DETROIT, Mich.

Eating For Strength.A NEW HEALTH COOKERY BOOK.

By M. L. HOLBROOK, M.D.

Which should be in the hands of every person who would eat to retain and regain health, strength and beauty. It contains, besides the science of eating and one hundred answers to questions which most people are anxious to know, nearly one hundred pages devoted to the best healthful recipes for foods and drinks, how to feed one's self, feeble babes and delicate children so as to get the best bodily development. Mothers who cannot nurse their children will find full directions for feeding them, and so will mothers who have delicate children, and invalids who wish to know the best foods.

Price, $1.00, postage free.

For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

THE GODS,AND OTHER LECTURES.

BY COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

A new edition, containing "The Gods," "Humboldt," "Thomas Paine," "Individuality," and "Heretics and Heresies," all newly revised and corrected by the author. The volume is handsomely printed on tinted paper, and elegantly bound.

Among all the works from the Liberal press, in force, clearness and incisiveness, none equal these admirable lectures. The work ought to be in the library of every Liberal, every skeptic, and every enquirer. Price, $2; postage 20 cents. For sale wholesale and retail by

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, N. Y.

THE

Colorado Horticulturist and Gardener's Companion.

Issued Quarterly. Sixteen Pages. J. H. FOSTER, Editor.

A selection of 350, worth of useful seeds Green House plants, etc., given gratis to each subscriber. On our list of Premiums is to be found that delicious wild, hardy Raspberry (found growing at an altitude of 6000 feet above the sea level,) known as the "Rocky Mountain Red," also the Colorado "Wild Cucumber Vine," exceedingly ornamental and vigorous.

If you want to learn how we of the "New West," cultivate Fruits, Flowers, and Garden Vegetables, subscribe for the Colorado Horticulturist. If you want to learn how we irrigate gardens, subscribe for the Colorado Horticulturist. It will please you; it will pay you.

"Rocky Mountain Raspberry" Plants, 35 cts each; 3 for $1; $3 per doz, post-paid by mail. "Colorado Wild Cucumber Vine" seeds, 10 cts. per packet. Send 50 cts. for HORTICULTURIST and get both these as a premium. Sent without premiums one year for 25 cents. Send 5 cents for specimen copy.

FOSTER & CO., Publishers,

P. O. Box 350.

Greeley, Col.

Odds and Ends.

THAT was a funny indictment which arraigned a woman in Milwaukee, the other day, for disturbing a religious meeting by "riotously eating nuts and noisily championing the same with her teeth." The woman was acquitted.

A YOUNG LADY who prided herself in geography, seeing a candle aslant, remarked that it reminded her of the "leaning tower of Pisa." "Yes," remarked a wag, "with this difference—that is a tower in Italy, while this is a tower in grease."

"Ir," advertised a philosophical victim, "the person who took my overcoat was influenced by the weather, then it is all serene; but if he did so from commercial considerations, I am ready to enter into financial negotiations for its return."

A SETTING HEN.

WHAT IT COST TO ATTEMPT BREAKING UP HER BROODING.

"Timothy, that air yaller hen's setting agin," said Mrs. Hayes to her son one morning at breakfast.

"Well, let her set," remarked Timothy, helping himself to a huge piece of cheese. "I reckon I can stand it as long as she can."

"I do wish you would try to be a little more equinomial of cheese, Timothy; I've out the very last of my every-day lot, and it's only the 1st of May. And now, as soon as you've done eating, I want you to go out and break up that hen. She's settin' on an old axe and two bricks now."

"I hope she'll hatch 'em," returned Timothy.

"If she was set now, she'd hatch the fourth week in May. It's a bad sign; something allers happens after it. Stop giggling, Helen Maria, by the time you get to be as old as yer ma, ye'll see further than you do now. There was Jenkins' folks, their gray top-knot hatched the last week in May, and Miss Jenkins, she had the conjunction on the lungs, and would have died if they hadn't killed a lamb and wrapped her in the hide while it was warm. That was all that saved her."

With such a startling proof of the truth of the omen before him, Timothy finished his breakfast in haste, and departed for the barn, from which he returned bearing the squalling biddy by the legs.

"What shall I do with her, mother? She'll get on again, and she's as cross as bedlam—she skinned my hands, and would be the death of me if she could get loose."

"I've heer'n it said that it was a good plan to throw 'em up in the air," said Mrs. Hayes. "Aunt Peggy broke one of setting only three times trying. Spose'n you try it."

"Up she goes—head or tail?" cried Tim, as he tossed the volcano skyward.

"Lord-a-massy!" exclaimed Mrs. Hayes, "she's coming down into the pan of bread that I set out on the great rock to rise. Tim, 'tis strange you can't do nothing without overdoing it."

"Down with the traitors, up with the stars," sung out Tim, elevating biddy again with something less than a pint of batter sticking to her feet.

"Good gracious me! wuss and wuss," cried Mrs. Hayes, and Tim agreed with her; for the hen had come down on the well-polished tile of 'Squire Bennett, who happened to be passing, and the dignified old gentleman was the father of Cynthia Bennett, the young lady with whom Tim was seriously enamoured.

The 'Squire looked daggers, brushed on the dough with his handkerchief, and strode on in silence.

"Yes, but it's going up again," said Tim, spitefully, seizing the clucking biddy and tossing her at random into the air. Biddy thought it time to manifest her individuality, and with a loud scream she darted against the parlor window, broke through, knocked down the canary cage and landed plump into the silken lap of Mrs. Gray, who was boarding at the farm-house.

Mrs. Gray screamed with horror, and, starting up, dislodged biddy, who flew at her reflection in the looking-glass with an angry hiss. The glass was shattered, and down came the hen astonished above measure against a vase of flowers, which upset, and, in falling, knocked over the stand dish and deluged with ink and water a pair of slippers which Helen Maria was embroidering for her lover, Mr. James Henshaw.

Helen entered the room just as the mischief had been done, and, viewing the ruins, she at once laid it to her brother Timothy. She heard his step behind her, and the unfortunate hen she flung full in his face.

There was a smothered oath, and then the hen came back with the force of a twelve pound shot.

Helen was mad. Her eyes were nearly put out with the feathery dust and dough, and she went at Timothy with true feminine zeal. She broke his watch guard into a dozen pieces, crushed his dickey and began to pull his whiskers out by the roots, when she suddenly remembered that Timothy had no whiskers to pull out by the roots.

But when she came to look closer, she perceived that the man she had nearly annihilated was not Timothy, but James Henshaw.

Poor Helen burst into tears and fled into her chamber, the usual refuge for heroines, and James, after washing his face at the kitchen sink, went home, sternly resolved never to marry a woman with such a temper as Helen Hayes had.

The hen, meanwhile, who is our heroine, returned to the barn to establish herself on the ruins of her nest, sullenly determined to set if the heavens fell.

Mrs. Hayes soon discovered her, and having heard that dipping in water would cure "broodiness," she set forth for the brook with the fowl in her apron.

Mrs. Weaver, an old lady of very quarrelsome temperament, who resided near, and was at sword's point with Mrs. Hayes, was just coming to the brook for a pail of water, and spied the yellow head of the bird peeping out from Mrs. Hayes' apron.

"There," she exclaimed, "now I've found out what has puzzled me to death nigh about a week. I've found out where that yellow pullet has gone to. Mrs. Hayes, I allers know'd you was a wicked, desateful woman, but I didn't think you'd steal."

"Steal? me steal? Who are you talkin' to?" said Mrs. Hayes, on her dignity.

"I'm talking to you, madam; that's who I'm talking to! You've stole my hen that I got over to Uncle Gillies' and paid for in sassegers. She's a real Dorking. Give her to me right here, or I'll use force!"

"She's my hen, and you touch her if you dare!"

"I'll show you what I dare," yelled Mrs. Weaver, growing purple, and, seizing the fowl by the tail, she gave a wrench and the tail came out in her hand.

The sudden cessation of resistance upset Mrs. Weaver's balance, and she fell backward in the brook, spluttering the mud and astonishing pollywogs in every direction.

She was a spry woman, and was soon on her feet, ready to renew the assault.

"Give me my hen!" she cried, thrusting her fist into Mrs. Hayes' face, "you old hag and hypocrite, you!" and she made a second dive at the bird.

The hen thought it proper to show her colors, and uttering an unearthly yell, she flew out of the covert square into the face of Mrs. Weaver, which she raked down with her nails until it resembled red ink.

Mrs. Hayes caught a stick of brush-wood from the fence—Mrs. Weaver did the same—and a regular duel would probably have been fought if the bank of the creek had not suddenly given way and precipitated both the indignant women into the water.

They scrambled out on opposite sides, and the hen sat perched on an apple tree, and cackled in triumph.

The ladies shook themselves, and by common consent went home. They have not spoken since.

The hen disappeared, and was not seen until three weeks afterward, when she made her appearance with eleven nice, yellow chickens. She found out some other fowl's nest, and had set in spite of fate.

But, although not "broken up" herself, she broke up two matches, for Cynthia Bennett was not at home the next time Timothy called, and Mr. Henshaw never forgave Helen for having such a temper.

10 Will make you an ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER to four numbers of

EHRICH'S' QUARTERLY,

Containing prices, descriptions and Fashion-Plates of Ladies' and Children's Suits, Ladies' Underwear, Infant's Wear, Real Laces and Dress Trimmings, Hat Feathers, Flowers, Ribbon's, etc., together with the choicest selections of Literature, wit and wisdom.

Our quarterly will place within your reach the best goods at the lowest prices. Only 10 cents for a year's subscription. First issue now ready. Subscribe at once.

EHRICH & CO.,
287 and 289 Eighth Ave., N. Y.

Please state in what paper you saw this advertisement.

TO LOVERS OF MUSIC, "What is Music?"

By PROF. ISAAC L. RICE

PART I.—An examination of Ancient Music among the Chinese, Hindoos, Persians, Egyptians and Grecians, down to the present age. The views of Prof. Helmholtz and Herbert Spencer upon Music are freely criticized.

PART II contains the Author's Original Theory concerning the Mission of Music, investigating what it is.

It is a work that cannot fail to interest and instruct every lover of the "Divine Art." Price, post-paid, in cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Address

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway, N. Y.

Positively

$50.00 Worth of Information

given for 60 cents, concerning Fowls, Eggs and Chickens.

BY A CLOSE OBSERVER.

How to keep hen-roosts and nests free from lice. How to feed to get an abundance of eggs, even in winter. How to prevent hens from ever wanting to set, and how to make them set. How to preserve eggs good one year. An easy plan to do it. Enclose 60 cents with order for full directions. Address,

E. D. BLAKEMAN,
Circleville, O.

[Mr. Blakeman is a school-boy friend of ours. We know him well; he is entirely reliable, and the information he has to impart upon the poultry subject valuable.—Ed. T. S.]

Every Person

Of a liberal, enquiring, studious, thinking turn of mind should read a copy of

PROFESSOR DRAPER'S
HISTORY OF THE CONFLICT BETWEEN
Religion and Science.

Prof. Draper stands in the front rank of American Scientists and Liberals. His works have done and are doing a great amount of good in dispelling error and superstition. Let this new work be widely read.

Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price, $1.75. Address

D. M. BENNETT,
335 Broadway.

For Children and Youth.

Amusement and Instruction.

BLAKEMAN'S
TWO HUNDRED
Poetical Riddles,
ON A GREAT VARIETY OF SUBJECTS.

INTERESTING AND NEW!

PUBLISHED BY

D. M. BENNETT,

335 Broadway, New York.

Sent postpaid on receipt of Price—20 cents.

DR. WM. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS.

THE GREAT AMERICAN CONSUMPTIVE REMEDY.

It breaks up the NIGHT SWEATS, relieves the OPPRESSIVE TIGHTNESS ACROSS THE LUNGS, and heals the lacerated and excoriated surfaces which the venom of the disease produces.

HALL'S BALSAM

is also a Sure Remedy for

COUGHS,
COLDS,
PNEUMONIA,
BRONCHITIS,
ASTHMA,
SPITTING OF BLOOD,
CROUP,
WHOOPIING COUGH.

And all other diseases of the respiratory organs.

HALL'S BALSAM is sold everywhere. Price $1 per bottle.

Henry's Carbolic Salve

THE MOST POWERFUL HEALING AGENT EVER DISCOVERED.

CARBOLIC SALVE positively cures the worst sores.

CARBOLIC SALVE instantly allays the pains of burns.

CARBOLIC SALVE cures all cutaneous eruptions.

CARBOLIC SALVE removes pimples and blotches.

CARBOLIC SALVE will cure cuts and bruises.

Sold everywhere. Price 25 cents.

GREENE'S OXYGENATED BITTERS.

The OXYGENATED BITTERS have been the most popular remedy for Dyspepsia, Heartburn, Indigestion, and other like disorders of the stomach, for the last THIRTY YEARS, and still maintain their unrivalled popularity. Price $1 per bottle.

DR. TOWNSLEY'S

Toothache Anodyne

Subdues the most Agonizing Toothache in One Minute.

Price 25 cents per Bottle. Sold everywhere.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN, & Co.,
Proprietors,
8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

REV R. B. LOCKWOOD'S CATARRH CURE.

What is Catarrh? It is an affection of the head, which may end in Deafness, partial or total Blindness, diseases of the throat and vocal organs, and even in Consumption.

In nine cases out of ten, when people fancy they have only a "cold in the head," they have CATARRH!

It is a terrible disease and should not be trifled with. The Best Remedy known for it is that prepared by the Rev. R. B. Lockwood, which has the endorsement of such eminent physicians as Dr. Geo. N. Tibbles of Hudson City, N. J.; Dr. W. H. Newell, Jersey City Heights; Dr. A. B. Laidlaw, Hudson City, N. J.; and of such distinguished ministers as Rev. W. H. Dikeman, New York, Rev. W. H. McCormack, Mt. Hermon, N. J., and very many others.

This medicine is prepared in good faith and may be relied on in every case to effect a permanent and speedy cure.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's NASAL DOUCHE is indispensable to insure the cure of obstinate chronic cases and will be found valuable in all stages of the disease.

Rev. R. B. Lockwood's LIVER AND STOMACH PILLS, for the cure of DYSPEPSIA and all disorders of the Stomach and Digestive Organs, have the highest recommendation from the thousands who have used them.

Read carefully the pamphlet that accompanies the medicine.

JOHN F. HENRY, CURRAN & CO

SOLE AGENTS,

8 and 9 College Place, N. Y.

For sale by all Druggists. Price 50 cents each.

The Truth Seeker.

DEVOTED TO
SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT, FREE DISCUSSION, LIBERALISM, SEXUAL EQUALITY, LABOR REFORM, PROGRESSION,
FREE EDUCATION, AND WHAT EVER TENDS TO EMANCIPATE AND ELEVATE THE HUMAN RACE.

OPPOSED TO
Priestcraft, Ecclesiasticism, Dogmas, Creeds, False Theology, Superstition, Bigotry, Ignorance, Monopolies, Aristocracies,
Privileged Classes, Tyranny, Oppression and Everything that Degrades or Burdens Mankind Mentally or Physically.

"Come now and let us reason together;" Let us hear all sides; Let us divest ourselves of prejudice and the effects of early education; Let us "prove all things and hold fast to that which is good."

Vol. 2. No. 17. { D. M. BENNETT,
EDITOR & PROPRIETOR. }

NEW YORK, MAY 1, 1875.

{ 335 BROADWAY,
SINGLE COPIES, 8 CTS. } $1.75 per Year.

The Truth Seeker.

PUBLISHED SEMI-MONTHLY.

TERMS:

One Copy, one Year.....$1.75
" " Six Months.....1.00
" " each Month, making a Monthly.....1.00

One Copy sent extra for every ten Subscribers to one address.

Canadian Subscribers will please send fifty cents additional for extra postage, which has to be prepaid.

RATES OF ADVERTISING.

One Dollar per inch, first insertion; 75 cents per inch for subsequent insertions.

Notes and Clippings.

THREE hundred thousand immigrants have moved into Texas since last October.

GOETHE said: "The excellent woman is she, who, when her husband dies, can be a father to their children."

MRS. BEECHER SURE OF HIS INNOCENCE.—She says: "If this trial convinces me of my husband's guilt, I will part with him on the steps of this Court House. But I have no fear of such a result."

BEECHER's chivalry for women is shown in having Mrs. Moulton asked if she did not kiss him—this great, oily lubber, who has kissed all the animal creation and put his mouth on everything but the Bible and Mrs. Beecher.

MR. BEECHER's cross-examination is fixing the impression made by his direct examination. One fact is very striking: during the latter he appeared as a gushing sort of person, frequently crying over the pictures he drew; during the cross he is keen, alert, suspicious, often remarkably forgetful, and under great self-control. What is the meaning of this difference?

VERY NEAR A PIOUS FRAUD.—If it is true, as the papers say, that during his trip around the world, the Rev. Dr. Newman's salary was $10,500, while his wife received $3,000 more as his private secretary, the "inspection of consulates" came very near being a pious fraud. It reflects no credit upon the Washington divine or his Presidential parishioners.—Christian Register.

GOOD BYE, VARLEY.—This eminent divine has finished his labors here and taken himself to Boston. If he is as successful in that portion of the moral vineyard as here, our sister city may count herself peculiarly fortunate. With the exception of a few little children he induced to "Stand up for Jesus," we have not heard of any conversions he made here. Some of his brethren of the cloth even pronounced him a failure, if not a fraud. "Good riddance," dear Mr. Varley.

THE question is often asked: "Is Mr. Beecher really losing any of his popularity over the country in consequence of the scandal?" It looks as though he was. His paper, the Christian Union, at one time had a circulation of 125,000. In January last the number was reduced to 45,000. A week ago, this number was still further reduced to 24,000. This information is from reliable sources. The "Life of Christ" is not selling nearly as rapidly as "Sam" and the rest of the partners would like it to. If it has not gone "as high as a kite," it is pretty well elevated. Drop a tear here for Christ.

A MUSCULAR CLERGYMAN.—The Troy Times says: "For a year or two past matters have not been very harmonious in the Baptist (stone) Church Society of Malta, Saratoga county, and some weeks since the pastor, Rev. Mr. Humpstone, tendered his resignation. On Sunday the Rev. Mr. Cook, who was to officiate, did not appear, and Dr. P. Bellinger, who has led the opposition to the old pastor, took upon himself to lead the services. A brother suggested that, as Brother Humpstone was present, he should lead the services. Immediately Dr. Bellinger rebuked the brother, and Mr. Humpstone arising to speak, Dr. Bellinger ordered him to sit down. But the ex-pastor would not sit down at the bidding of his old antagonist, and then Dr. Bellinger clinched him and tried to force him out of the church. A general tumult followed, and the congregation was dismissed without the usual benediction. The next day the Rev. Mr. Humpstone apologized for his conduct."

STEPS DOWN AND OUT.—The Rev. A. B. Burdick of West-erly, R. I., having failed to relieve himself of the charge of adultery which was brought against him by his church or to make an humble confession of his crime, and the church having received positive proof by eight witnesses of his guilt, he was, on April 18th, by a unanimous vote, expelled from the church. It is said he has moved to this city to engage in the insurance business. If he could only insure the public in the future against any more clergymen committing adultery, he would perform far more valuable service than he ever did by preaching.

THE OCEAN TELEGRAPH a few days ago informed us that many of the English papers had pronounced against the blatant pretenders, Moody and Sankey, who have been trying to bring London to the foot of the cross by preaching in the streets and other public places, and claim they are doing more harm than good. The authorities were also about to move upon their works. If they would confine them for six months in the Home of Industry, providing them with some useful employment, it would probably be better for the community, and quite as well for the loud-mouthed gentlemen aforesaid.

ONE of the most fervent of the praying temperance women in Dubuque, Iowa, has a drunken husband. It is related that she found him a few nights ago intoxicated in a saloon. She cuffed him soundly, and then said to the proprietor: "See here, sir, you darned miserable skunk, this has gone far enough. During the crusade I prayed for you, and since then have come to you with tears in my eyes, but it seems to have done no good, and now if you ever sell him another drop of whiskey, I'll come down here and snatch you bald-headed quicker than hell can singe a cat. You hear my gentle voice?" Then she took her old man and left.

IMPROPER BEHAVIOR.—The way "Old Winter" is dallying in the lap of Spring this season, is causing a great deal of talk, and the familiarity is strongly condemned. Old Winter is justly censurable for continued liberties with such a shy little maiden, and we are absolutely ashamed of him. Go north, old chap. Visit the pole. Get away from the little damsel, and let her attend to her business; she has much to do, and it will look much better for to busy herself about it. Begone; we have seen quite enough of you. This dallying business is quite too common "all around the board," and we set our face like a flint against it.

A MISSOURI farmer, after a long calculation, presents the following facts concerning dogs: In thirty-two counties 10,602 sheep have been killed by dogs. He estimates the number of dogs in these thirty-two counties to be 472,000; that a hog will thrive on the food necessary to support an able-bodied dog, and at the end of a year weigh 200 pounds; therefore, if the food for these 472,000 dogs went to the hogs it would make 92,000,000 pounds of pork, worth at six cents a pound $4,520,000—nearly twice the value of all the school-houses in the State, and more than twice the amount used by the State for school purposes.

THE REV. I. S. KALLOCK is again in trouble. It will be remembered, several years ago he fell into sad disrepute in Massachusetts, by being found out in holding very improper relations with another man's wife. It becoming unpleasantly warm for him there, he removed to Kansas, and tried for a few years to become a politician. Not, however, succeeding just to his mind in that field, he felt strong incentives to again enter his Master's service and give to dying sinners the "bread of life." But, alas, while the spirit is willing, the flesh is weak. Female charms are too much for him. His ardent nature is too impulsive; he cannot withstand the influence of the sisters' paroxysmal kisses, and he has again been walking in by and forbidden paths. Thus he has for some time been on the ragged edge, and he even wished he was dead. He ought to have more grace of the sisters' fewer charms. He has temporarily, at least, stepped down and out. But despair not, Brother Isaac, time cures many sorrows and many ills. When you are seventy, it will probably be safe for you once more to lead the faintly sisters home to Jesus.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—If one should, by any possibility forget that these are Beecher times, he would soon be reminded of it by walking about our streets. In one place he will see a new style of collar called "Tilton's Favorites," also "Elizabeth's Ruffles," and "Bessie's Neckties." Among the restaurants he will see its cards hanging out announcing, "Beecher Pot-pies," "Beecher Bean-soup," "Tilton Outlets," "Mrs. Morse Dumplings," and "Paroxysmal Stews." Among the medicines he may see, "Bowen's Bitters," "Sherman's Stimulant," "Wilkinson's Tonic," and "Halliday's Cough-drops." If he wants a hat, he can find "Moulton's Favorite" or "Theodore's Latest." When will we hear the last of all this?

REV. J. R. STILLWELL, of Logansport, Ind., was arraigned by his church upon the prevalent infirmity of making improper advances towards several of the opposite sex. It being a clear case, he did not further cover himself with obloquy and shame by lying and perjury, but honestly "acknowledged the corn," and at once resigned his charge and left the place. The local papers regret the circumstance, more especially as it came in the midst of a revival which was in successful operation, and which was sensibly checked by this publicity. What a pity it will be if any precious souls are finally lost in consequence of this frail shepherd's yielding to animal desires.

CONFERRING THE BERRETTA.—The twenty-seventh of April is the day appointed for the grand ceremonial of conferring the Cardinal's Berretta upon his Eminence, Archbishop McCloskey. Great arrangements are being made to insure its being a most recherche affair. Tickets in purple and carmine have been printed, which will cost the eager purchaser fifty cents each. Forty Archbishops and Bishops and about twelve hundred priests are expected to be in attendance. The grandest music will peal from the immense organ of St. Patrick's Cathedral where the show will come off, and no pains will be spared to render the performance most attractive. The Papal Convoys, Count Marefasci, Mgr. Roncetti, Dr. Ubaldi, and several very reverend gentlemen, will be on hand to conduct the ceremonies. When will the world get enough of such priestly tomfoolery, and learn to give their attention to something higher and grander than making such an ado over presenting the bauble of a red cap to a priest? Let the day of a higher intelligence speed on.

AN EGYPTIAN MUMMY REGAINING THE APPEARANCE OF LIFE.—A gentleman of Halifax, England, being in Egypt, brought back several headstaken from human mummies. These heads were brought in separate small boxes, and one of them in some way got soaked in salt water on the voyage. When it was opened by Mr. Leyland, in the presence of a number of other gentlemen, they were startled—even astounded—to find that the flesh on the face had recovered its outline, the cheeks and chin were plump and rounded, the open eyes looked upon them, and even seemed to move. The gentleman hastened to call others from all parts of the museum to observe this wonderful phenomenon. For a few minutes they beheld an unmistakably Egyptian countenance, with pleasant, composed expression—the face of a man who lived at least three thousand years ago. They could only conclude that the powerful aromatic gums which had been used had arrested the decay which the salt water had now rendered possible, and which speedily set in after the head was taken from its box and wrappings. But several gentlemen who saw it have assured me that they can never forget the life-likeness of the face before the swift decay of flesh which followed.

[Written expressly for THE TRUTH SEEKER.]

The Witch of the Wine-Mark.

A Tale of the Royal Colony of Massachusetts.

BY LOTHAIR LOGOS.

CHAPTER XVI.

Since Science, like a skye terrier, has taken the creed of Christendom by the nape of the neck and shaken it like a rat, we meet with strange gymnastics on the part of its champions—that is to say, those who generously undertake our spiritual guidance and the manipulation of no inconsiderable portion of our finances.

Time was when every Christian pulpit throughout the globe was only another name for intolerance and the bitterest denunciation of those who failed to recognize its authority as divine, or who dared to entertain, among other liberal ideas, the fact, that China and India were in the full light of their peculiar civilization, mighty, religious and philosophical centuries, ages before that hackneyed, little drama was, for the last time, enacted among men in the out-of-the-way little cabbage garden of Judea, whose inhabitants had never done anything for literature, art or science, and who are believed never to have turned an honest penny in their lives. Time was we say, and not very long since, when the gates of the Four Gospels were the only mode of egress or ingress permitted to those who would inquire beyond the boundaries set by priestcraft to the human mind, and when nothing would be allowed to enter the citadel of our Faith, that could not be dragged in some way through these illogical and unphilosophic entrances. No matter how low, narrow and tortuous the passage, the longest, the straightest and the stiffest fact won from the most unerring sources, had to yield to its thousand sinuosities and sharp turns, if it were necessary to make it harmonize with "The Word." So that when viewed in its new shape it only served to show how human judgment could be perverted to its own destruction and to the uses of a superstition that gave the benign Creator of the Universe hell for a stomach, and made him a worse cannibal than Saturn, who simply devoured his children, and that was the end of them.

Within the last few years, however, the tide has set in from a different quarter. Archaeological research and the testimony of the rocks have knocked the bottom out of hell, and proved that all the institutions and religious ideas of the Jews were borrowed from other nations and peoples. Not an arrow head found in the valley of the Somme but makes a cock-shot of the first chapter of Genesis, while the human remains discovered under a cypress tree below the fourth forest level at New Orleans, prove, according to Dr. Dowler, that man has been an inhabitant of this globe for nearly fifty-eight thousand years. These, and countless similar "left-handers," have knocked orthodoxy so out of time, that it has been obliged to renew the struggle against human progress with one feather less in its cap; sneaking out of its position of eighteen hundred years in relation to the period of the creation of the world, by asserting, that the words "In the beginning" in the chapter alluded to, met all the requirements of geology and of the Christian belief in this direction.

Every Christian sect outside the despotism of the Papacy is crumbling into dust, because the masses who refuse to recognize the authority of the Holy See are permitted to think. Therefore, because of the iron shackles it imposes upon its votaries, the Papacy will be the last to yield; although its power is gradually passing away. Like Christianity it is at a discount in the place of its nativity; and although it may seek to fortify itself upon these free American shores with a Cardinal's hat, if our common school system is kept intact and strictly non-sectarian—if we keep it free of "white chokers" and musty superstitions, we will chew up this ancient error in a single century, beyond the hope of redemption, as we shall chew up every other destructive theory of the sort. Down with them, one and all, we say, when they attempt to lay even a single finger upon the finances of the nation or the progressive tendencies of the age. They are all tared with the same stick; with this difference, that a Protestant, without violating his creed or conscience, can, with full heart and soul, truly perform the duties of an American citizen, while, in reality, the Pope is the sovereign or chief magistrate, as the case may be, of every sound and consistent Roman Catholic in the land of the living.

Although at the time of which we write there was no such broad basis in this country to sustain our argument as there is to-day, yet the terrible and tyrannous exactions and excesses of the dominant religious sect on our shore, had at last become so frightful that even some of those who countenanced them began to note them with horror, and among these latter was Sir William Phipps himself. And hence a single hour before Francis Ellencourt left the villa to call on his Excellency and lady, both these latter personages had been discoursing upon the dreadful condition of the colony, and the devastation that such persons as Sloucher and the witchfinder were spreading in every direction, as agents of a secret, fanatical tribunal, that was obviously aiming at the exercise of all political as well as religious power. There was something alarming in the situation, and the Governor was about to make some further remarks upon the subject, when Francis was announced.

"Welcome! welcome! and most opportunely arrived," said her ladyship and Sir William in one breath. "It is long since we have met, good cousin," continued her ladyship, "so you may kiss me if you will; and then as we know you have excellent judgment, we shall ask your opinion on a very important subject, which we have just had on the carpet."

"Your ladyship is very generous," said Francis, after kissing her fair cheek, and while turning to shake the proffered hand of the Governor, "and I need hardly say, that in whatever you may condescend to honor my poor judgment, I trust most sincerely that it may not play either you or me false."

"It is this, Ellencourt," said his Excellency when they were seated. "These brandings, and whippings, and hangings that are taking place so constantly, are beginning to alarm us. We can't see exactly where they are going to end. And the worst of it is, I have called a Court into existence which is so linked with the Church in these denunciations, that I feel myself scarcely able to curb its growing power."

"The case is rather serious, indeed, your Excellency," returned Francis. "But it lies obviously in your own hands to remedy it. The power that created this special Court for the trial and punishment of alleged dealers in witchcraft can dissolve the body, and thereby arrest this persecution, which I regard as a disgrace to the age."

"What! Ellencourt?" retorted Sir William, "don't you believe that there are such things as witches and evil spirits going about and bringing destruction upon us? although I can't suppose that all who have been arrested are guilty; while, at times, a terrible suspicion steals upon me, that possibly some who were innocent may have been consigned to death!"

"There is, I fear, little but superstition and fanaticism at the bottom of this persecution," returned Francis. "And that some who are innocent have suffered, and are still suffering, there cannot be a shadow of doubt. Nay, more, I think I can make it apparent to your Excellency, that this knot of gloomy fanatics who are aiming at the usurpation of all power in the colony, are carrying their diabolical aims to an extent that is calculated to arouse your alarm and hostility to a greater degree than you might be willing to suppose."

"What do you mean?" quickly rejoined Sir William. "Have you made any discovery of a more extraordinary nature than usual?"

"Your Excellency is aware," continued Francis, "that amongst the recent denunciations for witchcraft made at the instance of this terrible league, have been that of Miss Alice Ravenswood and that of the daughter of Giles, the ferryman, both of whom are now hapless fugitives from their homes and families, with the scoundrels Sloucher and Huskins on their track."

"Pon my life! Ellencourt," exclaimed Sir William, "I have not heard a word of it until the present moment; but I suppose the case of Miss Ravenswood was purposely kept from my ears."

"Yes," said Lady Phipps, "and rely upon it, Sir William, other cases of a similar character have been kept a secret from you also until too late, for I surmise this Court condemns to death with frightful rapidity, and then causes executions to take place upon the semblance of your authority only."

"Impossible! impossible!" ejaculated the Governor, in alarm. "The latter at least could never take place. They dare not do it!"

"They dare do a great deal that your Excellency little dreams of," returned Francis, producing the slip of paper which had been taken from the head of Sloucher's staff, and presenting it to Sir William.

The Governor ran his eye hastily over the document, but before he had perused more than a few words, a deadly pallor overspread his countenance, which was quickly succeeded by a crimsoned brow and a terrible fire that began to burn in his eyes.

Lady Phipps, whom Francis had purposely engaged in conversation at this moment, did not observe the emotion of her husband; and as he, with a strenuous effort, immediately regained his usual composure, and perused with seeming calmness the paper to its close, she presumed that it was simply a note of some aggravated grievance such as was borne to her ears almost daily.

On perusing the paper, Sir William arose, and assuring Lady Phipps, on a request made by her in relation to the case of Alice, that he would at once look into the matter, and see that there should be more caution used in future touching such affairs, he begged Francis to accompany him to the library, where they could talk over some matters in regard to the failure and unexpected return of the recent expedition—although in reality not altogether for that purpose.

It was evening before Francis left the vice-regal mansion, and as he bent his steps towards the villa, there might have been noticed about him that which savored of hope and confidence, for he felt satisfied that he had aroused in the Governor a spirit of hostility against the fanatical crew that were now devastating the land and paralyzing every energy that could be brought to bear upon human progress, either mentally or physically.

But then the difficulty was, that so powerful the Church, and so accustomed were all civic affairs to bow to it, even the Governor himself had to be cautious in evincing the slightest opposition to it, or in attempting to combat, to any extent, the fearful superstition which had for so far taken no very slight hold even on himself. He was not sure of the loyalty of those of his own household, and as he had entrusted power to hands which might not be so willing to relinquish it at a moment's notice, and as even the soldiery were deeply imbued with the belief in witchcraft, he found that he must move slowly and with the nicest judgment. For the first time since the outbreak or the accursed mania, he began to suspect that it might, after all, be simply what it was designated by Ellencourt—a vile superstition—and now that he had been put in possession of proofs the most indisputable, that this clique was not only unjust in some cases at least, but dangerous to his own happiness and government, he determined to undermine its power, and secure its total overthrow. Before this could be accomplished, however, he felt half inclined to believe that more lives might fall a victim to it, as to stretch forth his hand and pluck them from destruction at once, would be to arouse a religious hurricane about his ears that might doom himself to certain destruction; for what might not a fanatical soldiery and clerical crew attempt and accomplish? That there were many sterling men upon whom he could rely, was true, but most of them had kept aloof from him since these denunciations and executions had become rife, but now he should quietly gather them about him, and gradually sap the foundations of the terrible superstition which was already overshadowing his authority.

When Francis arrived at the villa, it was dusk. He had been anxiously expected, and when he entered the apartment in which the invalid and his friends had been long awaiting his appearance his cheerful aspect raised the spirits of all about him. Whatever the contents of the paper drawn from the head of the Fanatic's staff, it appeared to have furthered the object of his mission to the Governor's house; for although Lady Phipps was not aware of the nature of the document, Sir William was, and that served every purpose.

He had, of course, recounted to her ladyship, in the clearest possible terms, the sufferings of the poor fugitives, and the dangers that encompassed them, and had received from her the fullest assurance of her sympathy and active interference in their behalf. But, clear of intellect she saw, like his Excellency, that the utmost caution would have to be used before their restoration to their families and homes could be effected with any degree of security.

When the hour had nearly arrived for Red Wing to return to the ravine, the two Indians were on the watch for him, when descrying him some distance from his wigwam, hastened to tell him and the hunters, whom he had overtaken, returning with game, of what had occurred. The chief was silent, and only indulged in an exclamation of relief when he heard of the safety of Firefly. When informed of the perfidy of Lightfoot, and his fate, and that of the Noose, he shrugged his shoulders with a silent laugh, and humorously remarked, that the wolves had pick and choice of dainties—a whole white, and a half red man; observing bitterly, that half-breeds for the most part, disgrace the only pure drops of blood they possess.

As it was verging towards night, he thought, with the two lookouts, that they could all return to the ravine with safety, as the authorities would never suppose that now one of them was to be found even in any place in its vicinity.

It was about an hour after dark that Robert, while cautiously examining the fastenings of the windows that were nearly on a level with the terrace, thought he perceived the figure of a man glide along an angle of the building. Brave as a lion, he was instantly on its track, and had just reached the point where the figure had disappeared when a light from within fell full across his path, and revealed his own form for an instant. Scarcely, however, had the ray been withdrawn, when Red Wing stood before him. The recognition was instantaneous and mutual, and without waiting to exchange more than a single word, they both entered the villa, where the chief soon found himself in the presence of his wife, and Martha, as well as that of the whole household who now, that night had set in, gathered round the invalid with words of encouragement which, intensified by Francis and Florence, reached her sorely oppressed heart, as well as that of Maurice, who, with Titmouse, had been about the ravine all the afternoon endeavoring, but in vain, to trace the direction taken by the horse which they supposed had borne off Alice.

The appearance of the chief gave additional confidence; and now the whole party sat down in solemn conclave as it were, in which, ere they had well disposed of themselves, they were joined by old Giles the ferryman, who had not seen Martha since her visit to the cave, and had now stolen forth to meet her.

After Firefly had rapidly recounted to the chief the incidents of the previous night, he sought to glean some information in relation to the light and the kind of dress worn by the ruffian who had borne off

Miss Ravenswood. On this point neither she nor Martha could form any idea whatever, as they really had not seen the person alluded to; or if they had seen him, they were so confused and alarmed at the moment as to have taken no note of him. The fact of Sloucher having visited the scene of the abduction early in the morning, or come upon it accidentally, would seem to argue that he was not of the party who had perpetrated the outrage. But then, as the Noose and the half-breed were known to be in his confidence, why not some other agent also, who might, under his instructions, have seized upon Miss Ravenswood and carried her off to some secluded point beyond the reach of the emissaries of the law, whose operations, through the influence of some of the friends of Alice, might be embarrassed to the ultimate frustration of his own evil designs.

This sort of reasoning almost settled down into a conviction, and although they felt that the situation of Alice was, under even the most favorable view of the case, perilous in the extreme, they found some consolation in the fact that so severely wounded was the Fanatic, it must be some considerable period before he could again make a descent upon whatever point she had been conveyed to—that is, presuming her to have fallen into his power.

When Madge Gordon turned away from the wounded Fanatic, and entered the room where Alice was seated, she recounted briefly what had occurred to the wretch, and intimated that, for the time being at least, there was no danger to be apprehended from him, as it must be some days before he could possibly appear abroad, or perhaps leave his mock bed of humility.

The intelligence was most grateful to the poor girl. But although the arrows should prove to have been poisoned, and the villain should die of his wounds, yet she would be no nearer to relief from the burden of the denunciations of the witch-finder or the fearful doom that the law seemed to have in store for her. Circumstanced as Madge was, she could not venture to leave the house to apprise them at the villa of the safety of Alice for the present; as, during her absence, the Fanatic might, in a fit of rage, or fired with suspicion, forget his wounds and break open the door of the apartment. It was, therefore, decided to let things take their course, as it seemed to be clearly understood that, no matter who should happen to call, Sloucher would never divulge the fact of Miss Ravenswood being concealed beneath his roof.

About an hour after the departure of the witch-finder, the leech, or doctor, made his appearance and examined the condition of the wounded man. He was admitted by Madge, who stood by to hear what might be his opinion regarding the sufferer. The laceration of the tongue was considered dangerous, although not necessarily fatal, and the arrows were declared not to have been poisoned. This latter disclosure appeared to afford the patient infinite relief; for, when he heard it, he closed his eyes with a long-drawn sigh.

His wrist and cheeks were now dressed, and ere the physician left the house he seemed easier. Madge, who accompanied him beyond the threshold, ventured to ask him if he really thought there was but little actual danger to his patient, when a whisper dropped in her ear made it quite apparent that the opinion given in the hearing of the Fanatic, was not altogether in keeping with that privately entertained by him. Be this as it may, it had a most soothing effect upon the wretch, who seemed to rest easier and to moan infinitely less since it had been delivered. So that when Madge returned to Alice a second time, she gave her further assurance that the persecutions and denunciations of the Fanatic were assuredly interrupted for some time at least.

Days had passed away and the occupants of the villa were still in doubt and agony as to the fate of poor Alice. Maurice had been arraigned regarding the failure of the expedition, but so explained matters, that not the slightest censure attached to him or to the other officer in charge. In fact, through the judicious and truthful guidance of Francis, he stood for bravery and patriotism even higher in the estimation of the Governor than he had previous to his departure from the town.

In addition, some important changes were now being gradually made in the Governor's household, and among those near his person as advisers. At first these changes attracted but little notice, but as they became more marked and continuous after a day or two, the clerical wolves who had, either through rank, superstition, or the lust of gold and power, been preying upon the energies of the masses, began to howl and menace, but their jaws had already been paralyzed, and some of their most dangerous fangs quietly drawn.

Maurice, Francis, and all those who were free to move about the villa, were, of course, hourly engaged in endeavoring to discover some clue to the fate of Alice, but all without avail. The doctor who had attended the Fanatic was visited, and such information elicited from him, led to the enquiries as to the conclusion that they were possibly in error in supposing that Sloucher was a party to the abduction. When it was perceived that Maurice stood high in favor with the Governor, and that the State, under the recent manipulation of his Excellency, was getting the better of the Church, Peter Huskins shrank from preferring any charges against the lover of Alice for the assault on the Fanatic, and contented himself with looking to the speedy conviction of those already in prison on his denunciation, lest they should escape the rope, rather than to the augmentation of their numbers. In truth, he began to discover that the powers that had so long controlled affairs in both Church and State were on the wane, and that it was more than probable the ungodly should triumph for a season. But even here, he appeared to be thwarted, for the most violent and fanatical members of the Court, constituted by his Excellency, for the trial and punishment of those accused and convicted of witchcraft had been removed, and persons of something like humane tendencies appointed in their place. In fact, it was felt on all sides, that a crisis was at hand, and that the power had passed away from the servants of the Lord—some asserting that the day of His wrath was nigh, while others rejoiced secretly at the prospect of the overthrow of the blindest and most unnatural superstition that ever darkened the human soul.

Still there was death and danger on the very highway; for notwithstanding that the Governor had fortified himself to a great extent, the darkness had not yet fully passed away from his own mind, and there was yet sufficient power outside him to shackle his action in relation to those already in prison or under the ban for witchcraft, so that no matter how strong his desire to cut short at once the persecution that had so long devastated homes and hearthstones, he found himself scarcely in a position to gratify it. Yet he determined to interfere in the case of Miss Ravenswood, in a manner the most emphatic, should she happen to fall into the hands of the Court; although he felt half satisfied, that the late appointments would save him all trouble in relation to her, as his ideas were pretty well understood on the subject. There was, however, a degree of uncertainty connected with the whole affair, which might after all prove fatal to her; for the Court, even as it was now constituted, would not fail to convict her on what its members regarded sufficient evidence, for one and all of them though in various degrees believed in the vile superstition.

Nor was this the only direction taken by the good tendencies of his Excellency in relation to the peace and prosperity of the colony; for now he had begun to perceive that a wrong and dangerous policy had been pursued against the Indians, and that some of the tribes who showed an inclination to be friendly ought to be met in sincerity and more than half-way. The injustice that had been done two years previously to Red Wing, and those of his immediate followers, had already been pointed out by Francis, and the consequence was a proclamation had been issued which relieved the chief and those he led from the ban that had been placed upon them; so that now both he and they were free to come and go, as they thought proper, while Firefly was no longer constrained to lie perdu at the villa.

This unexpected edict was issued on the second morning after the return of the chief and the hunters to the ravine, where they now might occupy their wigwams in perfect security.

The great central trouble, however, was still unabated, notwithstanding that larger facilities for terminating it had begun to obtain. No tidings whatever could be gained of Miss Ravenswood, although both white and red man were continually in search of her. Maurice and Florence had returned to The Heights only once for an hour or so since her flight; John Langton, crossing and recrossing the river continually, to keep the household in trim, and to apprise his master and mistress of how their domestic affairs stood. Florence and Francis would have been supremely happy were it not for the absence of poor Alice, and the dire uncertainty that surrounded her fate. Robert and Emily shared sincerely the anguish of the invalid and Maurice, as did John and Martha, although the latter had still enough connected with her own case to excite dire forebodings; for should the witchfinder even now lay hands upon her, her doom was fearfully uncertain. Titmouse, however, appeared to be the only one who entertained, without wavering, the idea that Alice was, after all, in the clutches of Sloucher. Somehow the little fellow, ever since he witnessed the scene between Maurice and the Fanatic near the ravine, drifted into the conviction that his young mistress had been borne off on the horse he had discovered loose when leading the others to the place from which they had been stolen; and upon this idea he tacked another, to the effect that the animal had been used in the abduction by the Fanatic himself.

And now, as he pondered the case in his own astute but silent manner, after another day's search in the hope of obtaining some traces of the poor fugitive, the thought struck him—"May she not have been borne to the lonely abode of the Fanatic, and be now a prisoner there? Ha!"

[CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

WE need free bodies and free minds—free labor and free thought—chainless hands and fetterless brains. Free labor will give us wealth. Free thought will give us truth.—Ingersoll.

After Death—What?

A correspondent asks—will you not call out some of your very able contributors on this subject? Now I do not consider myself among the number of "very able," and yet without any egotism I profess to know as much about this subject as any one, and that is simply nothing. The fact is, all humanity stand on a level here. We have each the same opportunity to investigate, or to accept on faith. But as neither investigation nor faith are satisfactory, I fear we shall never settle the question until we reach "that bourn from whence no traveler returns." I could never quite understand why there was so much speculation on the subject. The enjoyment of a good dinner is never impaired for me by conjectures as to the possibility of no dinner to-morrow. With a world full of mysteries that present an uninterrupted field for investigation, why peer into the unseen and absolutely unknowable future? A few presuming people assert their positive knowledge of a future life. But the reports they bring from the other side, purporting to come from some of the grandest souls that ever lived, are so silly, stupid, and frivolous, that we who cannot conceive of a future without progression and improvement, are forced to reject them wholly, or to look forward to an existence which impairs and weakens the grandest part of our physical being—our intellects. The greatest scholars, the most masterly intellects of all ages, make no positive assertions on this subject. The possibility is often admitted. Burns, writing an epitaph on an honest friend, says:

"If there's another world, he lives in bliss;
If there is none, he made the best of this."

Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Hamlet, in his famous soliloquy, these words:

"To die,—to sleep,—
No more;—and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ach, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to,—'tis a consummation
Devoutly to be wished. To die;—to sleep;—
To sleep! perchance to dream;—ay, there's the rub,
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause: there's the respect,
That makes calamity of so long a life;
...
the dread of something after death,—
The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
No traveler returns,—puzzles the will;
And makes us rather bear those ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of."

Setting aside the positive position of the Church, which is founded solely on faith, and not on knowledge, we have no great thinker, no masterly mind, no scientific researcher in all the ages who asserts any positive knowledge on the subject. Spiritualists alone do this. But as the power of understanding the question, as presented by them, depends on so many fine "conditions," and in one respect is much like the "Gospel plan," given only unto a few chosen souls, we cannot accept it. They have the future all nicely mapped out for us, or rather, I should say, rapped out. But to us there isn't anything very convincing in a rap; if there is, we have only to recall our childhood days to believe—most families are rich in rapping mediums.

Assuming for one moment a future life, what reason have we for supposing that it will be better than this; or that we, who have found so little joy and sweetness here, shall become suddenly possessed of acute powers for the acceptance and appreciation of these higher delights?

Placing too much stress on this idea of a future existence is, it seems to me, injurious, and makes us oftentimes careless and neglectful of the duties and needs of the present hour. To revel in imaginary glories is to overlook the joys of to-day. It is this eternally exalting the spiritual above the material that has done so much mischief. This trying to prove that another world is going to compensate for any ills suffered here, is like a man saying: "O! never mind if you do burn yourself, I have a salve that will cure." The kindest friend is the one who shows you how to shun the fire. To know how to live is our great need. Tyndall has the idea in a nut-shell, when he says, "whatever be the fate of theory, the practical monitions are clear enough, which declare, that on our dealings with matter depend our weal or woe, physical and moral."

We have no knowledge of the existence of mind outside of matter. These combinations of atoms go to make up our individual beings; from these bodies our minds derive their force and strength, or weakness and imbecility. Who can say that they do not resolve into the great negative life-principle of the Universe on the dissolution of these physical bodies?

The wisest have failed to solve the mystery, and ever will fail. The visionary will go on dreaming; the presumptuous will continue to assert, but the sensible man will waive such questions, and seek only the means to wisely enjoy and improve this life, carrying, with honest purpose, joy, peace and wisdom with him to brighten the earthly pathway of those less fortunate than himself.

DR VERNON.

The Truth Seeker,

A JOURNAL
OF REFORM AND FREE THOUGHT.

D. M. BENNETT, Editor and Prop'r.

No. 333 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

The Other Side.

The following we have received from a respected legal friend, and cheerfully give it room.

OREGON, HOLT Co, Mo., April 5th, 1875.

MR. BENNETT—Will you be pleased to admit a hearing a little on the other side in the Beecher-Tilton matter? As a Liberal you cannot refuse, as so much is published by you against Mr. Beecher. Who is the attacked in the case? Who has been the attacked from the beginning? From the first whisper of the slander through the pages of Woodhull and Claflin, down to the present trial? A great name and a splendid fame, have been assailed. Money has been received from him and used by the assailant; money is the claim now, more money. The offense complained of was condoned; the pretended offender embraced and associated with her a long time after its discovery by the assailant! The only evidence worth a bauble to prove the case against defendant is the woman's written confession to her husband, and Beecher's letters read in the light of that confession. The woman says that confession was got from her when she was sick, depressed terribly, and ignorant of its contents. This destroys that confession at once in the esteem of every sensible man who has been married to a loving wife and transacted business requiring her signature. In a business of over twenty-five years, during which the writer of this has known of thousands of women signing papers in his presence, at the request of their husbands, he has not known half a dozen instances wherein the woman paid the slightest attention to the instruments unless the matter was pressed upon their attention. Even women of uncommon business shrewdness daily in every part of the country sign instruments of writing, at the husbands' request, without inquiring as to their contents and with total ignorance thereof. If any man doubts this, let him try this experiment, and he will soon say Mrs. Tilton's confession is utterly void, since her denial and explanation. Then Beecher's letters stand alone for construction, seeing every hint or innuendo of the offense is based on that confession. Now, Mr. Bennett, I must say my experience compels me to darkly suspect every combination charging a man of high standing and reputed wealth of an offense; and the longer a great useful life has stood unsullied, the deeper my suspicions of the motives of the assailants. Bright and shining clean must their hands be who lay them aggressively on such a life as Beecher's. Are they so? I need not answer! Remember they are the attacking party.

And now with Beecher's letters alone, as you must admit, remember that years ago, on an occasion when charged with some trivial offense, he wrote just such letters in just such desponding, self-reproaching, semi-suicidal tones and words—were he otherwise he would not be Henry Ward Beecher, the man to whom liberal thought owes so much; foremost in every good cause; abounding in every extreme charity for all men and creeds (his catholic charity is not late and 'tis cruelly false to say so,) whose warfare against slavery, ignorance, intemperance, etc., has made for him countless enemies ready to tear him down (the extremely orthodox among the number,) and where bold advanced position on theology and noble brave words must make to him a friend of every true Liberal.

C. I.

REPLY.—With due respect to our friend's legal knowledge—a line to which we can lay no claim—we are necessarily compelled to view this case in a different light from himself. We are not disposed to shield Mr. Beecher from any crime of which he may be guilty, because of his "great name and splendid fame." If he is guilty of the crime charged against him we think his offense greater than the same act would be in an obscure, inferior man. A more perfect life is due from a superior man than from a low, base one.

That our friend is quite correct in the matter of women signing deeds, mortgages, and executing other legal documents at their husbands' request, without examination, we readily admit. In such cases they know from previous information from their husbands what they desired, and they seldom deem it necessary to read over the document. Mrs. Tilton's is not one of this kind. It is a very different affair for a lady to sign a deed or mortgage, and writing a confession of committing the crime of adultery. It is a very improbable thing to suppose a lady of Mrs. Tilton's intelligence would sign a confession of her great guilt, even though her husband should ask it, with the same indifference a lady would sign a deed. Nor can we conceive how any virtuous lady of intelligence and spirit could, by any persuasion, solicitation or threat, be induced to write herself down an adulteress unless it was true. She would sooner part with her life. Mrs. Tilton did this in the confession she wrote and signed. She virtually confessed Beecher's aim to accomplish the crime when she wrote to the Rev. Mr. Storrs, that Mr. Beecher had "asked her to be his wife with all the name implies."

If it is urged she wrote these statements under the coercion of her husband, can it be claimed she wrote by his dictation from Marietta, Ohio, nearly a thousand miles distant, virtually acknowledging the offense? Was it by Mr. Tilton's dictation that she wrote from Schoharie, N. Y., in a letter to him, saying she hoped he would never fall under the influence of a bad woman, as she had, under a bad man? Was it by her husband's coercion that she confessed to Susan B. Anthony having committed adultery with Mr. Beecher? Did Mr. Tilton compel her to make the same statement to Mrs. Bradshaw? Did he force her to make the same admission to her daughter Florence, and her brother, Mr. Richards, to say nothing of Mr. and Mrs. Moulton, who both swear she did? It is not very likely an innocent woman would make such admissions, written or oral, when they are totally unfounded in truth.

We cannot see that Mr. Beecher being the party attacked, has very much to do with his innocence or guilt. Thieves, burglars and murderers are always the attacked party when they are arraigned for their crimes before the bar of justice. Some one must accuse them before they can be brought to trial. They would readily agree to attack no one, if no one would attack them. They only ask to be "let alone."

We cannot dispose of Mr. Beecher's letters as easily as our legal friend does. Admitting Mr. Beecher is a very impulsive man, full of ardor and "gush," it fails to account for his extraordinary letters save upon the theory he had committed a crime! Could he say, "I ask, through you, Theodore Tilton's forgiveness. I humble myself before him as I do before my God. He would be a better man in my place than I have been," and more of the same sort, unless he had committed a grievous offense against Mr. Tilton? His becoming aware that Mrs. Tilton's affections had, unconsciously to him, been attracted to himself; his advising Mrs. Tilton to leave her husband if she could not get along with him, and his saying to Mr. Bowen that, in consequence of Mr. Tilton's waywardness and departures from virtue, he was no longer a suitable editor for The Independent, furnish no justification for such language as he used. He claims his convictions were honest, and if so, he had no occasion to condemn himself in such extreme language. A man of Mr. Beecher's intelligence could hardly write or dictate such a letter unless there was more to call it out than he now states there was.

Can our legal friend conceive that a man of Mr. Beecher's good sense, in writing to Moulton upon the offense he had committed against Tilton, would express himself in the following way if his crime had been only to give bad advice?

"To say that I have a church on my hands is simple enough, but to have the hundreds and thousands of men pressing me, each with his keen suspicion, or anxiety, or zeal; to see tendencies, which if not stopped, would break out into ruinous defense of me; to stop them without seeming to do it; to prevent any one questioning me; to meet and allay prejudices against T. which had their beginning years before this; to keep serene as if I was not alarmed or disturbed; to be cheerful at home and among friends, when I was suffering the torments of the damned; to pass sleepless nights often, and yet to come up fresh and full for Sunday—all this may be talked about, but the real thing cannot be understood from the outside, nor its wearing and grinding on the nervous system. . . . But chronic evils require chronic remedies. If my destruction would place him (Tilton) all right, that shall not stand in the way. I am willing to step down and out. No one can offer more than that. That I do offer. Sacrifice me without hesitation if you can clearly see your way to his safety thereby. I do not think anything would be gained by it. I should be destroyed, but he would not be saved. Elizabeth and the children would have their future clouded. Nothing can be so bad as the horror of great darkness in which I spend much of my time. I look upon death as sweeter-faced than any friend I have in the world. Life would be pleasant if I could see rebuilt that which is shattered. But to live on the sharp and ragged edge of anxiety, remorse, fear, despair, and yet to put on all the appearance of serenity and happiness, cannot be endured much longer. I am well nigh discouraged. If you, too, cease to trust me—to love me—I am alone; I have not another person in the world to whom I could go."

Can it be supposed for a moment a man of sense would write that way, when he had done nothing but given a few words of advice, which he had deemed honest and called for, and advice, even, which was not acted upon or followed? Is it not most apparent he had a secret which troubled him greatly, and which he was most anxious to keep from the world? If it was only this honest advice he had given Mrs. Tilton and Mr. Bowen, if that was the only offense he had committed, could he not easily have told it to any member of his church and to the whole world, and thus have ended his agony? Nay, nay, there was something worse in the dark which he wished to conceal, and which kept him on the ragged edge.

Mr. Beecher's theory of innocence—or rather his lawyers'—will not avail. All his actions, his frequent secret meetings, his many singular letters during these memorable three or four years; his great efforts to keep everything secret from the members of his church, his continued exertion to keep the facts concealed, to suppress all investigation, to hush all enquiry, and to stifle all questions, speak GUILT in unmistakable terms. If he was innocent of the charges preferred against him, why did he not boldly say so at first, at last, and all the time? Is it any indication of innocence for an accused man to do all he can to shut everybody's mouth and to hush-sh at every one who asks a question?

His explanation, under cross-examination, of his conduct, his letters, Mrs. Tilton's and Mrs. Morse's letters, was very lame and unsatisfactory. His evasions, tergiversations and indirect answers were very noticeable. His great want of memory when anything was asked calculated to bear against his case, and his remarkably good memory when points in his favor were brought out; his dramatic efforts, his gesticulations, his mimicry and his vehement theatrical style, shedding tears at one moment, and exciting laughter by his buffoonery at another—all these things taken as a whole, did not strike the clear, candid common sense of the nation as indications of truth and honesty. Numerous thousands of the people of America believe the Reverend gentleman positively and pointedly perjured himself day after day while upon the witness-stand. While his ardent admirers still affect to think him innocent, the great bulk of the dispassionate thinking multitude are forced to the conviction that he is a guilty man.

Some of his friends excuse him for committing perjury, inasmuch as he does it to shield a deserving lady from exposure, but we fail to see the justification in such an appalling step, when he does it by attempting to blacken the reputation of three others, either of whom is as good, morally or mentally, as himself, and one of them a highly respectable lady—at least, in all respects, the equal of Mrs. Tilton. The crime is base enough to prejudice himself, to screen himself and his paramour, but when he attempts this by dragging into the filth the reputation of three innocent persons, it becomes a most aggravated offense, and inconceivably greater than the original sin of adultery.

It is now said Mrs. Tilton will take the witness-stand, and that while she admits that she acknowledged to Miss Anthony, Mrs. Bradshaw, her mother, her brother and her daughter that she had committed adultery with Mr. Beecher, that she will explain the reason why she made such admissions, and that the admissions were untrue. It is to be hoped the lady will, for her own credit, attempt to make no such explanation. What possible combination of circumstances could induce a lady to make any such admissions when unfounded in truth. The very fact of her having made them, is positive proof of the sin having been committed, and it will be impossible for her to explain it away.

The whole matter may be summed up in this way: Henry Ward Beecher is a brilliant man, but has large amativeness—marked by phrenologists seven plus—which, with his warm, impulsive nature, makes his admiration of the opposite sex very ardent.

In principle and self-control he is rather deficient; hence his liability to yield to temptation is great.

His home connubial relations have not been most happy, and his heart yearnings were not satisfied there.

His outside opportunities among his numerous female acquaintances for extra kindnesses, such as "friendly kisses," "inspirational kisses," "holy kisses," "paroxysmal kisses," etc., etc., have been unsurpassed.

We have undoubted proof that clergymen are particularly susceptible to the influences of the softer sex, and that when they are charged with very natural derelictions of this kind they most invariably deny it in the strongest terms.

As Mr. Beecher is no better, and has no more principle than the average clergymen, we cannot see, when there is such strong proof against him, why we should try to believe him innocent in opposition to most damaging and convincing testimony, simply on the score of "gush" and fine sentiment.

The American nation accords to Mr. Beecher talent and great ability; it could have forgiven him the sin of adultery; it regrets he was weak enough to be false, but can never forgive him if he is guilty of bare-faced perjury.

A New Departure.

Mrs. Woodhull—or rather her husband, Col. Blood, who, it is well known, writes her articles and speeches, and thus bravely fights or shields himself under the banner of a petticoat—has, in the last two or three numbers of The Weekly, made a decided change of base. The paper has for years been known as ultra-Radical on all questions, including the subject of the inspiration of the Bible, the Christian religion, etc. From this position it has just veered over to be a supporter of the Bible, its complete infallibility and reliability and the sacred mission of Jesus.

Probably the Christian world ought to largely appreciate this accession to their ranks, even if the patrons of the paper—a large portion of whom are the most progressed Radicals—do not approve the change.

That this revolution thus commenced may be completed, we would suggest that Victoria enter a nunnery and that the Colonel take holy orders as soon as practicable.

Elder Shelton Once More.

Our pious, Hard-shell Alabama Elder has again favored us with the following brilliant effusions. While we cannot for a moment doubt his implicit faith in the big stories of the Bible and the dogmas of orthodox Christianity, nor his subservient fealty to the superstitions of the past, we regret he has not studied more closely the manners of a gentleman. Why need he call attention to our long ears? By the way, does he really know we have long ears? Will he risk a pint of peanuts that, by actual measurement, our ears are longer than his? We make room for what the pious man of God has to say.

BROOKSVILLE, BLOUNT CO., ALA., April 5th, 1876.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Sir:—I would not write to you at present, but seeing some of your Philosophical nonsense, together with some of your low, vulgar, satirical slang, used by you in the place of argument against my Article written in defense of a Scriptural Flood, I now proceed to write, not that I expect to convince such a wise man as you are, who has in his own estimation got all the Oracles of Wisdom treasured up in his own cranium. But I write in order to try to reach some of your readers, whom I trust have not gone so far away from the revealed word of God. I feel sorry for all men that are in total darkness and are lost. Now, Sir, you tried to answer my Article written on fourth page TRUTH SEEKER, printed March 15th, 1875, by first speaking of my harshness and uncourtiousness in my argument. I will make some apologies for that, by nearly stating that Christians sometimes have to deal very roughly with Long Eared Brutes. Now, Sir, if a man will but once admit that there is a Creator, who has created all things, he must admit that this same Creator can do anything that he wants to do, even if it is to bring on a big flood, such as was in Noah's time. Now we believe that the flood was altogether a miracle wrought out by God in order to show wicked, unbelieving men, in the early existence of the world, that he was God. Now Mr. Editor if God had not performed such huge Miracles, all along in the early age of the world, men never would have been convinced that there was a God. They all would have been poor, ignorant, benighted creatures, such as Infidel writers and Deists are in the present day.

Secondly, you tried to meet our arguments by stating that there has been some tremendous upheavals in the Earth, which has caused Timber, Animals, etc., to be found in places deep under the Earth. Now, Sir, I deny that there has ever been any upheavals of the Earth since the flood. The Bible does tell us that the fountain of the great deep was broken up, and this is the only upheavals that ever was. Sir, I defy you to prove by living witnesses that any such upheavals have ever taken place in North America. I am not going to allow you to bring up the blind ideas of philosophy. I want you to understand that a Learned fool, and a philosophical fool, is the biggest fool of all fools. Don't talk to me of volcanic upheavals in the old world, which only turn up Dirt and Rock enough to make an opening for the melted Lava to issue forth, that argument will be too thin for a man of your paper.

Again, you ask where did such an amount of water come from to make this mighty flood, and where did it go to when the flood was over, &c. That is a mighty foolish question to ask a faithful Christian. The Christian knows and has faith enough to believe that God can prepare water enough to drown a thousand such worlds as this, if he saw proper by that act, to convince all intelligent beings that he is a Sovereign God. See how many intelligent men and women that have come into the world since the flood, that have been noble-hearted Christians in consequence of the every-day proof of that flood being found all over the Earth.

Again you ask, how is it possible for the number of animals that was taken into the Ark to live when there was but one door and window in the Ark. Sir, we answer you by saying that they were sustained by the same power that preserved Jonah in the whale's belly. We can only account for it on the ground that it is a miracle wrought out by God, in order to save a remnant to repeople the earth again with better people. It seems, Mr. Editor, that the people before the flood had become to a vast extent just such unbelievers and Deists as you and THE TRUTH SEEKER are, which justly enkindled the wrath of God against them, and he determined to sweep them off and save eight Christians, to wit, Noah and his family, in order to re-people the earth with better folks. And Sir, I will say to you to-day, that if the people of the world as a general thing were to become believers in your doctrine, God would get awfully mad at us again, and would sweep us off again by a flood of fire or water in less than twenty-four hours. But we are thankful that there is still a few Josephs, Elijahs, Rebeccas and Marys in the world. Though Christianity has its Beechers, the world of mankind knows that they are only Infidels at heart, while they hypocritically take upon them the cloak of Christianity. And Mr. Editor you say a great deal in your columns about Beecher, in order as you think to, to throw a slur on Christians. Sir, I say to you that all men would more or less become Beechers if they believed as you do. Beecher is just such a man as you are, at heart, an unbeliever, only he tries to put on a Christian cloak to deceive the world. Sir, if your doctrine of Infidelity was believed by every body, it would make miserable Prostitutes of the female sex and miserable Beechers of the men, because the fear of God and a burning hell would not be before their Eyes. Sir, your system of belief makes miserable cut-throats, and robbers, out of men and miserable base creatures out of women. This is the reason why, in Alabama, such men as you are not allowed to give testimony in open court against any one; from the fact that the public does not believe that such a man would swear the truth, especially if he was interested in the case. And justly too, from the very fact, that there is no foundation in such men for the truth, from the fact that there is no fear of God and his judgments in their minds, consequently we had as well swear one of those creatures that Baalam rode, and expect to get the truth out of it, as to swear an Infidel. Now, Sir you profess not to believe one word that is written in the Bible. Now, we know what you don't believe, now please tell us what you do believe. And we defy you to undertake with truth to prove what you think you do believe. Now if you and your readers won't have the Bible, please give us something that is better, as you go along, or the world won't have it.

Now Sir, if you undertake to reply to this Article, be serious about it, and don't try to poke fun at us and the Bible instead of argument. If there is any solid argument about you, let us have it, and don't give us suppositions for truths.

ELDER J. C. SHELTON.

REPLY.—There!—if that is not a regular Simon-pure Christian letter, what is it? It abounds in faith and ignorance, and those are certainly Christian characteristics. True, there are forty or fifty errors of orthography, capitalization, and bad grammar, and a dozen or two misrepresentations and prevarications, or, "not to put too fine a point upon it"—lies. But those are not un-Christian; they are just what the system is made up of.

The Elder has spread himself considerably, and evidently wants us to reply to him. He is specially anxious that we be serious about it, and use solid arguments. We hope we shall treat his letter in a proper spirit, and at least be as courteous in language as he has been to us. We do not wish to be outdone by him in politeness, truthfulness, or gentlemanliness.

We will notice some of his inaccuracies:

First. He intimates we used low, vulgar slang in our former reply to him. It is wrong for the domine to so misrepresent us. It is neither just nor true. We used no slang nor improper language towards him.

Second. He says in our "own estimation, we have all the oracles of wisdom treasured up in our own cranium." He could not have made a greater mistake. We are painfully sensible that there is very much that we do not know, and we here acknowledge the fact with becoming humility.

Third. He says "there have been no upheavals since the flood." Wrong again! Earthquakes have many times taken place. The surface of the earth has frequently been elevated in some places and depressed in others. Islands have risen in the ocean that were once unknown.

Fourth. He says "a learned fool and a philosophical fool is the biggest of all fools." False and absurd! The most of a fool is he who knows nothing. If he has learning and is philosophical, he certainly is less a fool than he who possesses them not. The Elder must take care that his readers do not class him as one who has neither learning nor philosophy.

Fifth. He says "the Christian knows that God can prepare water enough to drown one thousand such worlds as this." The Elder rather stretches the truth here. The Christian knows nothing of the kind! Let him contract a little and make it five hundred. This is a good deal more than covers the Christian's knowledge.

Sixth. He attempts to prove the flood by the story of Jonah and the whale. Ah! Elder, that will not do! You might as well undertake to prove "Old Mother Hubbard" by "Jack the Giant-Killer."

Seventh. He says there were just such unbelievers before the flood as we and THE TRUTH SEEKER are. Another mistake. The Elder is simply drawing upon his imagination. He has not the papers for that. Our sort had not come into fashion at that early day.

Eighth. He says God got mad at his creatures. We assert that this is false, and very unjust to God. True the Bible makes such a statement, but it is wrong. God does not get mad nor fly into a passion. All such statements, wherever found, are grossly incorrect. God never gets mad, nor runs crazy. He would be unfit to govern the Universe if that was his character.

Ninth. He says we are such a man as Beecher is. Has it come to that? Is it our fate to be thus accused? Are our grey hairs thus to be brought down in sorrow to the grave? We call on the Elder for proof. Let him show when we have ever been in the kissing business, or the paroxysmal business. What families have we ever broken up? What Elizabeths have we ever been after? When did we ever perjure ourselves? We have received many stabs and thrusts, but this is the unkindest cut of all.

Tenth. He says Infidelity makes miserable prostitutes of the female sex. A greater falsehood never was uttered! The women who have embraced Infidelity have been pure and virtuous, and ornaments to society. We have only to point to Harriet Martineau, Margaret Fuller, Frances Wright, and thousands now living, to prove the Elder a clerical slanderer and falsifier. What a cheek the man must have to claim all the virtue for Christian women, and deny it to Infidels, when want of chastity exists in almost every church in the land. A paper can hardly be taken up now, but what we find an account of some sister in some church being on too intimate sexual relations with the shepherd of the fold, some godly clergyman. And this Elder has the assurance to tell us that Infidelity will make all the women do that way. He ought to be ashamed of himself.

Eleventh. He says our system of belief makes miserable cut-throats and robbers of men. False as hell! Not a word of truth in it, and none but a liar can make such an assertion. Those who have had the intelligence to doubt the errors of superstition, and the honesty to avow their sentiments, have been the noblest men the world has known. We claim as ours all who have not believed in Christianity, and we are proud to acknowledge them the noblest moral heroes and benefactors of our race. We begin back with Socrates, Plato, Pythagoras, Zeno, Aristotle, Marcus Antoninus, Cicero, Seneca, and come down to Hobbes, Bolingbroke, Condorcet, Spinoza, Descartes, Gibbon, Diderot, Voltaire, Volney, Shelley, Helvetius, Goethe,

(Continued on Eighth Page.)

A Study of Harmonialism.

BY A. O. GENUNG.

Few systems, either of religion or philosophy, have obtained in the minds of men, which have not occasioned an intense degree of controversy; and fewer still have existed whose disciples were willing to admit the possibility of their advocating imperfect doctrines, or whose adversaries were willing to acknowledge that the system they opposed possessed any redeeming qualities. A similar deduction would seem to apply to the system which we propose to review, to wit, the Harmonial or spiritual philosophy.

In arriving at a just estimate of the character of any movement, we should endeavor to free ourselves of all prepossession and bias of opinion; and, after submitting it to a fair and impartial examination, aim to apply those reasonable canons of criticism to which all systems are alike entitled. And, moreover, we should esteem it a privilege to be able to analyze, and classify and register the diverse laws of the Universe, wherever found, simply for the benefits that must inevitably accrue through such a course to mankind.

Unlike systems which have obtained among men, through the prestige attached to the names of their founders, modern Spiritualism dawned upon mankind unaided and without an omen to predict its coming. Lord Byron, it is said, awoke one morning and found himself famous. In like manner the world found itself possessed of a factor in philosophy, whose ultimate mission was to exert a marked influence on society, either for good or ill.

In the early years of Spiritualism, credence in the supermundane character of the phenomena peculiar to that system, was limited to the unlettered class, and it was commonly believed that the movement would, like other fungous growths, rapidly fall into decline, and be eventually lost sight of and forgotten. But subsequent events have proved such an estimate to be incorrect. As time wore on, Spiritualism assumed a character of seeming stability and permanence, and in its distinctive phenomena, at once incomprehensible to the vulgar, and a "despair of science" to the learned, it possessed an ally far surpassing anything contained in the older established sects.

That numerous class of mankind who have ever possessed unswerving faith in the existence of another world, and that other class, also numerous, who have cherished a wish, or a longing for immortality, could here find a haven wherein to rest their belief. If persistent aspiration for the accomplishment of any event could furnish evidence of its final realization, the world would already have been possessed of testimony sufficient to establish the tangible existence of a future state. A majority, perhaps, of the race entertain a pleasing hope that they may one day rejoin their friends who have preceded them in taking leave of conscious terrestrial existence. Bearing this in mind, it is not strange that a system whose advocates were able to ignore, as worthless, all belief founded on faith and tradition, and present in its stead apparently unanswerable testimony of the accuracy of its fundamental doctrine, should be able to make a powerful appeal to the credulous and the skeptical. And such has been the result: Spiritualism has rapidly augmented in importance until it possesses a following equaling or exceeding that of any Protestant Christian denomination.

But there have been influences alien to anything embraced in its typical phenomena, that have cogently aided in placing Spiritualism in its present somewhat prominent position. The early accession to its ranks of a number of advanced thinkers, was well calculated to give to the movement, in its attitude toward theology, a marked rational character. Such individuals were R. D. Owen, Warren Chase, H. C. Wright, and others, through whose influence ideas pertaining to the natural versus the supernatural, far removed from antiquated grooves of thought, were incorporated in the philosophy.

And an important feature of the movement is the opportunities for improvement extended to the young, by way of Sabbath-day instruction. The pathfinders of Spiritualism early saw the necessity of instituting a system more in accordance with the progressive character of the age than the one hitherto practiced, and the result is that the old and worthless system of Sunday-school discipline so long practiced by Catholic and Protestant, and even the conception of which was originally filched from poor Robert Raikes, the English reformer, furnishes a sad contrast to the beautiful system witnessed in the Lyceum.

But ours is eminently an age of critical and relentless thought. As the student of science arrives at facts through lens, crucible and calculus, so must the student of philosophy reach his by a diligent method of observation, reasoning and analogy. It is not sufficient to know that Spiritualism is progressive in its general tendency, it is also desirable to arrive at a just estimate of its value as a philosophy; and to accomplish this, we must necessarily ascertain the character of the foundation on which is built the superstructure.

Many intelligent Spiritualists are impatient at the fact that the so-called mediumistic phenomena themselves are not sufficient to proselyte mankind, forgetting the great array of outside circumstances which, to insure this result, must be made to harmonize with such phenomena. If some traveler in foreign lands, after returning from his wanderings, should state that in a certain locality he had met a race of beings, differing in every essential particular from types hitherto known, we should discredit him at once, no matter what might be his character for veracity, remembering that, in the present state of geographical knowledge, such a circumstance could not occur.

And so it is with the system in review. A belief even in the existence of a spiritual part in man, separate and distinct from his physical organization, is contradictory of important facts ascertained through a long and diligent course of scientific inquiry. It certainly must be apparent to every observer of psychological and physiological phenomena, that the nervous system, the great viscera, the language of the emotions, etc., are so inter-related with mind as to be absolutely inseparable from it; and moreover, that these adjuncts are not only indispensable for the manifestation of thought, but are actually component factors in all mental processes. The first writers on the subject in America, in England, and on the Continent hold this view, and unite in assuring us that the thinking principle, or vital part, is absolutely identical with the animal organization.

And an ascertained fact is that there exists between man and animals, between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and even between organic and inorganic matter, an exceedingly close relation. It is impossible to point out the difference between intelligence manifested in man and that manifested in the higher vertebrate animals. True, man's intellectual faculties far transcend those met with for instance in the horse, but the difference is in degree, and not in kind. That "instinct," which formerly appeared so insuperable an obstacle in establishing the identity of mental processes in man and in animals, is now known to be little less than an inferior kind of reason. It is equally difficult to discern the point of demarcation between the animal and vegetable worlds; for illustration, those singular animals known to naturalists as protozoans, furnish significant examples of the connection existing between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, in that they possess the characteristics of both animals and plants. And with equal certainty we are able to trace the life-principle to the inorganic world itself, for who can determine the precise point where inorganic matter leaves off, and organic matter begins? The analogy, with its concurrent inference, will be readily detected and understood. If man is possessed of an immortal factor in his composition, so also is the brute creation; and by the same method of reasoning, the vegetable kingdom, together with the entire inorganic world, are likewise entitled to the "higher life."

The disciple of Harmonialism will here encounter a somewhat difficult problem for the exercise of his ingenuity, that of effecting a reconciliation between his favorite religio-philosophic theories, and that which must inevitably form their legitimate logical sequence. If it be conceded that the analogy we have attempted to outline be a correct one, then on entering another world, we shall witness anomalies strange indeed. Races of men, hailing from every clime, and representing every age of their possession of the globe, will be seen plying their diverse avocations. Not only the enlightened nations of antiquity, but every naked tribe that ever breathed terrestrial air, will be found still in possession of their worthless lives. Every type of animal and vegetable life, embracing not only those that will furnish pleasure to man, but also those which are loathsome and noxious in their character, will survive and accompany us into a spiritual world. We shall be regaled not only with the artistic notes of the nightingale and thrush, but also with the death-threatening rattle of the serpent, and with the hoarse monotone of the patriarchal frog. Not only shall our senses grow intoxicated with the bright colors and fragrant odors of flowers, but they are likewise fated to be shocked with the presence of rank weeds and venomous vines.

Should it be suggested, however, that our position with respect to inorganic matter is fallacious, in that to insure the subject a spiritual existence, it must first experience the change we term death, we will say this: A very well-understood fact is, that physical death is simply a chemical change, and geology teaches us that chemical changes constantly occur in the planet which we inhabit, from the silent but cogent force that forms a strata, to that which builds an island or a continent. And what is still more noticeable, it follows that the same mode of reasoning that would tend to insure spiritual immortality to our inorganic world, would likewise serve to similarly perpetuate the Universe itself.

But should it be claimed, despite the facts which we have presented, that man alone is entitled to immortality, the case stands little better, for certainly the most elastic imagination could scarce be content with the conception of the human race scattered about promiscuously in space. It is proper to mention, however, in this connection, that it is sometimes urged that the spiritual regions consist of a subtle, etherealized, spiritualized substance, entirely isolated from ordinary matter. But this solution engenders the striking anomaly of such a region being peopled with organisms imported from utter foreign conditions, for the purpose of securing its occupancy, a circumstance altogether inadmissible.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

"Every Tree shall be Known by its Fruit."

This, my text, you will find somewhere in the Bible, (it does not matter where). If there is any one that doubts it, let him search the book with diligence, and he shall surely find it. "What, is Brother Willcott going to preach us a sermon from this text?" Not by any means, my friends; for, as Robert Burns says, "I am not so gifted," but as the old Scotch deacon once said, "I think I can draw an inference." "Do you remember the story? it is something like this:

A convocation of Scottish ministers were dining at the house of an old deacon, and in the desultory after-dinner exchanges of Scottish wit and pleasantry, the old deacon was asked, "considering the very long time he had held the office of deacon, (it being about two-score of years,) did he think that, should an occasion require it, he could preach a sermon himself?"

The worthy deacon quite naively replied: "That he did not know quite exactly about preaching the sermon, but he did think he could draw an inference." "Do you think you can? Well, then, what inference would you draw from this text, 'And he filled his ass' belly with the East wind.'"

"I think I could draw one or two," replied the wary Scotchman. "The first is, that food must be mighty scarce before any one would try to feed his ass on that kind of fodder. The second is, the poor ass would feed on the east wind a very long time before his belly would be filled. And the third and last inference is, that none but an ass would be fool enough to make the attempt."

So, from my text I am simply going just to draw an inference. Congratulate me, I am completely in agreement with "Brother Talmage." Did I not say in the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, very recently, that our good Brother did have an inquiring, an investigating mind? Did I not say that I should yet live to hear him preach in his great Tabernacle the words of "truth and soberness?" I feel it so very pleasant to be able to say: "This is just as I think. I have such an unfortunate organization that I do so often have to say, in the words which fall so often and try so sorely the patient ear of Judge Neilson, 'I object.'" So that now, finding myself so completely in agreement with my good brother, it comes almost like a new sensation; why the feeling is perfectly delicious. You know how very severe some of my Spiritual friends, and many also of my Liberal acquaintances have thought me, when I have said that this our beautiful city of Brooklyn was enveloped with a pestilential miasm; that here in our city was a "destroying angel" whose victims were far more than our "first-born."

Now Bro. Talmage, on Friday night, says all this and a thousand times more. He says: "that if asked, when traveling on the cars, where he resides," he thus answers: "Sir, I was born in New Jersey!" He thus is afraid that should he give a truthful answer to the question, his questioner would shrink from him as if he had the plague. He says that our beautiful city reeks with scandal until one is tempted to go over to the Five Points to get a breath of fresh air.

"Eternal God! when will this surging mass of groaning, stupendous, overwhelming nastiness come to an end?" "This city needs a thorough fumigation; won't somebody burn a rag, or carry about a shovel and lighted charcoal?" "Are there not ten righteous men that can be found in all Brooklyn that can arise in the strength of God, and beat back those surges of iniquity?" Where is Anthony Comstock? (where indeed?) Where is God, that he comes not out of his hiding-place for the salvation and defense of this great metropolis? ("Echo answers, where?") But as your God refuses to show his face, and does not come in answer to your prayers to cleanse this our city from its pollution, let me utter the words of the unchanging eternal law, "As ye sow, so shall ye also reap," for as my text so truly says, the tree shall be known by its fruit.

But now though I agree with Mr. Talmage right up to this point, that "the pestilence that walketh at noon-day" is devastating our city, yet I think we shall differ somewhat in regard to the remedy to be applied. He wants a burnt rag and a shovel of burning charcoal. "Can't thou draw out leviathan with a hook?" Nay! nay! It is the bold and skilful surgeon that is needed, who will strike deep and cut the deadly cancer from the very heart. Is there anything in our whole range of knowledge more true than this: that there can be no effect without a producing cause? Then from what hydra-head of vice and immorality did this loathsome monster spring, whose teachings engendered, and from whose loins did this more than "Mokanna's" hideousness derive its birth?

Rev. gentlemen, these are legitimate questions, and you are bound to give them a definite answer. This is the city of Brooklyn that Mr. Talmage declares is such a Sodom, is the famed "City of Churches;" here is to be found a representative of every creed and denomination known in Christendom. Stately and costly edifices, with their gilded spires, pointing toward the supposed residence of their founder, greet us on every street. Surely here, if anywhere in the wide world, should be found the place where might be sung the glorious anthem that they say heralded church birth into this world of ours, "Peace on earth, goodwill to man."

This should be the "city that is set on a hill," her light should shine and irradiate the whole land. Your admission is that all your teachings are of no value, that they are not able to exalt the intellect, ennoble the understanding and purify the heart and conscience. Let me then draw the inference, and speed the arrow to its mark, and say with all the emphasis that I can command, that this is the legitimate result of the mental pabulum that those who do the thinking for the people, have chosen to administer as their food. It is you, "Rev. Sirs," that are responsible for this defilement of our city; it is your preaching of this emasculated, worn-out Christianity, that is altogether out of place in this Nineteenth Century of civilization. The God which you this day preach to the people, is no longer "a name to conjure with." Throw aside, then, your vain speculations about God and "the golden streets of the new Jerusalem," and let us join our hands and work together to make this world somewhat better for having lived in it. This moral degradation of our city is not our work, it is all your own doings, it is the fruit of the tree that you have planted. We have had neither part nor lot in this matter, yet we are willing to aid you in clearing this "Augean stable," and work with you to make this our city the abode of purity, honesty, the home of social affections and of cultured and exalted minds.

We are willing to forgive all your uncharitableness, all your unkindness which you have always so liberally given us, and aid you in this glorious work. Give, then, to this cruel Hebrew God and this degrading theology a decent burial. "Man's maturer nature disdains those playthings of his childhood." Let us put out of sight this loathsome, putrid carcass, that in our nostrils smells so horribly, haul down the gory ensign, the blood-stained flag of Calvary, and hoist the glorious banner of Free Thought, Intellectual Progress and Scientific Investigation!

WM. WILLICOTT.

Brooklyn, N. Y., March 29th, 1875.

God and the Devil.

BY A WORKINGMAN.

God made this world himself alone.

With no one to assist him;
And then, too, on the other hand,
There was no one to resist him.
He made the world for our own use.
We could not do without it;
And so he made it very quick—
Was just six days about it.

He made the rocks, and hills, and plains.
And all the towering mountains,
And all the little rippling rills.
And all the flowing fountains.
He made the sun, and moon, and stars,
And placed them all in order;
Then spread a curtain over all.
With a star-spangled border.

'Tis said he made these things at first.
From nothing but ethereal;
But could he form such solid things,
And make them all material?
He made an Indian and a squaw,
And placed them in the bushes,
And taught them how to get their meat.
By catching fowls and fishes.

And then God made another pair,
And called them Eve and Adam;
And when they'd been here a few short years,
He wished the Devil had 'em.
There was an angel up above,
Who always had been civil;
But now he got so awful proud,
He turned into a Devil.

And then they had a war in heaven—
His temper got so heated,
That Michael and the Dragon fought—
The Dragon got defeated,
And then God sent old Satan down,
With mother Eve to grapple.
And Satan turned into a snake,
And offered her an apple.

She took the apple, ate it all,
But just the core and paring,
And those she gave to her old man,
And that set him to swearing;
So now we all must go to hell,
With devils there to grapple,
Because six thousand years ago,
Our parents ate that apple.

We've many men in all the world,
In every land and nation,
Who make jackasses of themselves,
And call it inspiration.
God made ten thousand little things,
Black, yellow, green, and red bugs;
And then he made two species more,
We call them fleas and bed-bugs.

He made a million things with wings,
Gnats, black flies, and mosquitoes,
But O! the devil, how they bite!
Those wicked little creatures.
I wish they never had been made—
Those naughty little midgets;
They bite our dear sweet babies so,
Their mothers get the fidgets.

But God saw fit to make such things,
He made them all to suit him;
And we can have no right at all
To grumble or dispute him.
Ten thousand times ten thousand things,
And little living creatures—
One man could never count them all.
Nor know them by their features.

There are bugs, and worms, and ants, and toads,
And caterpillars crawling;
And snails, and birds, and crows, and hawks,
And cats are always squalling.
God took his servant by the hand,
And gave him good instruction;
If he received it, very good,
If not he'd see destruction.

They went upon the mountain top.
To make the ten commandments;
To be a guide to all the race
Of Abraham's descendants:
God wrote them on two flattened stones,
That one small man could handle;
It took just forty days and nights,
And Moses held the candle.

God worked right on, five weeks and more—
Paid no regard to Sundays,
But strove as hard through all those days,
As though they all were Mondays.
He never stopped to rest at all,
No, not a single minute;
And now to say that he was tired,
I say there's nothing in it.

God never tires nor stops to rest,
But works in every nation;
He rolls the wheels of time along,
And stops at no one station.
The book of nature is quite plain,
If you will read the volume;
The truth you'll find on every leaf,
In every single column.

The book we call the Bible here,
If you will read its contents
One half you'll find is decent, good,
The other half is nonsense.
There is no Devil in the world,
In no dark place he lurches.
He has no refuge anywhere,
Except 'tis in the churches.

The priests may keep the devil there—
They think it very funny;
As long as they make them believe,
They grab the people's money.
Now let folks hear, and pay them too,
Yes, any one that pleases;
I'm sure of this, they can't get mine,
'Till melted brimstone freezes.

S. P. K. Aiskey, LL.D., Visits Cardinal McCloskey.

"God save yer Honors Reverence," sez I, bowin' to him in a polite way. "Shure its meself that's glad to see yer Holiness!" (and it was thrue for me, the divil a Cardinal ever I saw in me life before.)

"God save ye kindly, me son!" sez he, wud a smile, "who have I the honor ov spakin' to?" sez he. "Och yer Eminence," sez I, "shure its little honor there's in it. I'm S. P. K. Aiskey, LL.D., that spint some of me youth in Maynooth College!"

"Ha! me man, I'm sorry to hear you say so! for few leaves that holy place without receivin' Holy Ord'ers," sez ye, frownin' like.

"Oh and throth!" God knows I received Holy Ord'ers enough while I was in it, and unholy orders more than enough since I left it, your Excellency!" sez I.

"Well, what is your business wud me, my good man?" sez he, in a kind of stand-off manner.

"Indeed, to tell ye the truth yer Highness, I come just to see you; I never saw the likes ov ye at home; and Washington, himself, never saw the likes ov ye in this country, and I keep always axin meself what sort of a man is it they make Cardinals out ov? and now as I've seen your sacred highness 'pon me sowl, but I'm puzzled to know if ye're a man or a woman? But all the McCloskeys I knew at home, throth ye could aisey tell the Biddies from the Jacks and Mikes!"

He laffed harty at this, an' sez he, "ye're right me man, sure there's no promotion to be got at home under the British government, barin ye're a sodger and kill the people, or a peeler and do worse. But did ye never hear of Cardinal Cullen?" sez he.

"Oh, naboclish!" sez I "an I didn't. Shure he's a double header, an' agent of the Castle as well as for the Po—"

"Stop" Mr. Aisey! sez he, "I want ye to change this subject; the Cullens and the McCloskey are related!"

"Oh, thin, the divil a word more I'll say about it," sez I; "but tell me av ye plaze where is the rest ov ye'r uniform that the Herald is so full ov? I'd like to see your Reverence's Lordship in full dress!"

"Ah! misther Aisey," sez he, "I suppose you'd like to see all ye lost be lavin' Maynooth; well av it makes ye sorry for ye'r past life I'll show ye!" so with that he steps into another room, and left me to look at all the purty things about me, and from the books to the silver bell that this poor penance-worn hermit called his sarvints wud, there was crosses on all! Och, murther, sez I to meself, av the disappointments are equil to the crosses, I pity the poor man! Just as I was thinking this, the door opened, and be me conscience I jumped up clane ov me sate, for I thought that "ould Mother Hubbard" had come out of the "cubboard" whin I looked at him. Och, murther, but would'n't he dhraw a big house full at Booth's or the Grand Duke's Opera House av Talmage would only keep his mouth shut!

"Well, how do ye like me now, Misther Aisey?" sez he, smilin' grandly.

"Oh, wirra! wirra!" sez I, "who'd think that a McCloskey was the Kernal of such a quare nut as that!"

When I said this he burst out laffin' and sot down right afore me, so's I could have a good square look at him.

"Well, yer Holiness," sez I, I suppose a man would wear anything for promotion. Och, but that's a quare hat; its the very pictiure of a Mexican Sombrero, only its so red. Throth, ave ever I see that hat in the pawn-shop I'll know whose canbeen it was anyhow. And thim stockins! be me faith I never knew what the manin of a red shank was until now! But I want to ax ye one question, which of all their purty silks that yer honors reverence wears, is the "baretta" that Misther Binnett talked so much about in the N. Y. Herald?"

"Oh! ye are jokin' Misther Aisey!" sez he, "a man that was in the Maynooth College must know what a baretta is!"

"Musha, the divil a know, yer Holiness, axin' yer pardon for mintionin' the name of the opposin' council, but I remember, when a gossoon, I used to hear the nurse axin' 'where was the child's barra,' and I thought maybe it is now frenchified into baretta, but av its the same thing I don't expect to see how yer Lordship wares it, and I pity you for bein' bothered with it!"

"Oh, Misther Aisey, sez he, ye're intirely mistaken," and then he wint over all the purty silk and satan duds he had on, givin' methe names ov them piece be piece, as well as an armfull that he hadn't time, or mebbe room to put on. "Och murther," sez I, "won't the women be jealous of ye; I'll bet a pinny they'll go in for Cardinal's rights as far as dressin' goes!"

"Well it does certainly trouble them a good deal, but we tell them to renounce all the pomps and vanities of this wicked world!"

"Well, yer Infalibility," sez I, "will there be more Cardinals here bine by? Is it thrue that they're goin' to make "red ridin' hoods" for some of the mimbers of the press in New York? Och, but I know a few of thim knows all about bein' divil; I mane printers devil yer Excellency!"

He laffed and shook his head. And will we have a school for Cardinals? and a propergander and other gandhers of the foreign church herein spite of "Home Rule?" and will the school-masters of the nation tache all the little blaggards how to be Cardinals, and have palaces to live in, and beautiful carriages with lots of horses to draw them, the same as Saint Pether or Jesus Christ or the Bishops of Canterbury.

"Ah be aisey, now, Misther Aisey!" sez he, wud a sly wink, "ye're axin' too many questions, and as ye are a counthry man ov me own I can't let ye go out ov me house without a thrate, especially as I'm in luck," an' he touched the top of the silver cross on a little dome of Saint Peters, and in walks a fellow with a tody-tray full of bottles and glasses. I think the fellow must have listened at the kay hole, or knew by the bell, I dunno which."

"Now then, Mr. Aisey!" sez he, "here's some French Brandy, and some rale Junishowen, that the nose of a British Guager never smelt; take which ye like best!"

"Throth your Eminence, as I was always partial to both, I won't feel bigoted agin aither ov 'em now! I'll thry a little ov aich."

"Well, I'll take the French," sez he, "for it helps me to a foreign accent!" and he filled out a horn big enough for a New York Alderman, let alone a Cardinal.

"Throth, iv yer Apostolic Holiness would only take a little of both, as I do, you'd be astonished to know how much it would improve yer accent. Now, after I have surrounded France, and then send Junishowen down to congratulate it, you'd be puzzled to know "iv it was English, French, or Irish, I was spakin'." We touched our glasses once more; he gave me his benediction and I left, moved by the spirit of his inspiration. As I went meditatin' slowly down stairs I thought of Shakespeare, where he sez:

"Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer cloud
Without our special wonder?"

(Continued from Fifth Page.)

Schiller, Humboldt, Byron, Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Ethan Allen, Parker, J. Stuart Mill, Lincoln, Sumner, Buckle, Lecky, Tylor, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Helmholtz, Schmidt, Draper, Fiske, and a host of others that might be named. They are among the grandest men that ever lived. They were not Christians, and did not require the fear of a devil nor hell to keep them from being cut-throats and robbers, as the Elder tacitly admits Christians do.

Who are they who people our prisons and penitentiaries?—Christians. Infidels are seldom found there. Who are the murderers?—Christians, or they become so after the deed is done. Very few Infidels are numbered among the murderers. Who have been the cut-throats of the world? Who have shed the most blood?—Christians, two to one. They have taken scores of millions of lives, and caused human blood to flow in rivers, for centuries together. When have Infidels done anything like this? Talk, indeed, about the great virtue of Christianity, and the bloodthirstiness of Infidels! The thing is preposterous. There are no more honest, honorable class of men than Infidels, who discard alike the fear of hell, a devil, and a maddened Deity, who flies into a rage at trifles, and kills and destroys innocent people and children by thousands and hundreds of thousands. No class of men excel Christians in villainy, dishonesty, and rascality. No nations are more dishonest and unjust than Christian nations. About the worst we have personally ever been "taken in" was by a Christian clergyman, and a Southerner at that. We trusted him, but alas, in vain!—he played us false.

We were a few days ago conversing with a gentleman connected with the Navy, and stationed many years in Japan. He had been one hundred and sixty miles in the interior. We asked him about the religion and habits of the country. He informed us a large share are Buddhists, who are absolute Infidels and disbelievers in revelation or a personal God. Christianity, though it has sent many missionaries there, has obtained very slight foothold. He assured us the people are very intelligent, virtuous and happy. Stealing, robbery and murder seldom occur. Locks or fastenings are not generally used on dwellings or stores. The goods and chattels of one are rarely disturbed by another. Though some of the lower class go naked, adultery and sexual promiscuity are almost unknown. In heathen China, also, travelers tell us the people are very industrious and honest. Stores are often left open open and unattended. The goods are marked, and if a person wants anything he leaves money to the amount of the price and takes the goods. How would such a system answer in any Christian country in the world? How long would the goods remain? How much money would be left in place of them? The Elder must try and keep nearer the truth. Christian virtue and Christian honesty will not do to tie to.

Twelfth. He says Infidels have no foundation for truth, and argues that consequently they must swear to a lie. This is false and base. Infidels have as great respect for the truth as any class of men that live. They love truth, honor and virtue for their own sakes, not because of an angry God whose judgments may be hurled upon them. Give us one real lover of truth who follows it from the reverence and respect he bears it, rather than six cringing slaves who only tell the truth from fear of some God or some Devil.

Thirteenth. Elder Shelton says we profess not to believe a word that is in the Bible. That is an "awful whopper." We do not profess any such thing. We believe many words and many sentences the Bible contains, just as much as the Elder himself does. It is not difficult for us to believe such passages as these: "Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar among wheat with a pestle, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." "Wisdom excelleth folly as far as light excelleth darkness." "The churning of milk bringeth forth butter, and the wringing of the nose bringeth forth blood." These passages are not perhaps as elegant as many quotations that might be made from Shakespeare, Byron, Tennyson, and scores of writers, but nevertheless we believe them, and many other similar extracts, not because they are in the Bible, but because they contain the evidence of truth. We do not therefore take the Bible as a guide in the study of astronomy, geology, chemistry, physiology, botany, or natural history. We do not look into it to learn the multiplication table, or how to extract the square root. We find it of no use in agricultural pursuits, in the art of printing, or the science of telegraphy. It gives no instruction relative to railroads, or the power of steam. We find nothing in it touching photography, galvanism, the telescope, the spectroscope, or the microscope, but a great deal about wars, carnage, and bloodshed, and much of obscenity and vulgarity. We judge it was written in a barbarous age of the world by men of limited knowledge, and if it ever was adapted to the wants of men in any age of the world, it was long ago, and that if it was of any great value then it has long ceased to be so. We cannot for a moment believe God ever wrote it, or employed any other persons to write it. It is doing great discredit to him to charge it upon him. To do him justice in this matter is one reason we occupy the position we do.

Elder Shelton's letter contains several other misstatements, but we will let them pass. He asks us so earnestly to tell what we believe, we will try and comply with his request. We wish to be obliging so far as possible. We have no views we want to conceal. If we can say anything to enlighten him or any others who are in the dark, we will say it most cheerfully.

First. We think he asks too much, that we admit there is a Creator that made the Universe in six days from nothing. We can admit nothing of the kind. We do not believe there is one atom of matter in existence that is either destructible or creatable. That it may change forms and conditions thousands of times we readily concede, but not by the combined skill of all the scientists in the world can an atom of it be forced out of existence, nor can a similar atom by any known power be brought into existence. If Elder Shelton and the other sixty thousand clergymen in the United States, and the five hundred thousand priests in the different varieties of religions on earth, together with the one hundred millions of priests which are estimated to have lived and preyed upon men for the last five thousand years; if all these were gods and worked in concert, we do not believe they could make a Universe of nothing. By the by, this Universe is a big thing to make. The sun, the earth, and all the other planets, asteroids, and satellites, are but an infinitesimal portion of the Universe, whose millions of suns and systems reach so far into the abyss of space that it would require light, traveling at the rate of 200,000 miles per second millions of years to travel from them to our solar system. As distant as these farther suns are, space and the Universe still extend trillions of times farther, and so on forever without limit, without end. What absurdity to talk about all this being made by a being and from nothing!

The Elder says if we admit there is a Creator who has done all this, then we must admit he could create the water to drown this world. Ah! but there's the trouble. That if is in the way. We can admit nothing of the kind.

We can comprehend his Deity is a very watery one, and that his belief in his God's ability to make water is unlimited, but a body of water five miles in depth—for it is that distance to the top of the highest mountain—over the entire earth—25,000 miles in circumference—is an immense quantity, and we cannot comprehend how one God could make it all in forty days and nights. Our friend, however, gets along with the difficulty easily enough, and stands ready to believe God could make a thousand times as much more if he only felt like it. If the old legend had stated that, to produce this water, God had planted a cucumber vine and that from one of its fruits he had squeezed water enough to cover the entire earth to the tops of the highest mountains, and then to get rid of it he had from a bed-bug made a frog, which drank the water all up and then jumped off out of the way, Elder Shelton doubtless could have believed it perfectly easy. There is nothing like implicit faith. We, however, are differently constituted. We cannot believe impossibilities. If we admit there is a God we hold he must be subject to laws, and that all things cannot be possible with him. For instance, he cannot make twice two to be five; he cannot make a straight rod just three feet long without two ends; he cannot make a three years old colt in five minutes; he cannot act against himself; he cannot make something of nothing.

It is idle, perhaps, to conjecture what God is, or what he is not. It is a subject beyond our reach, but for ourselves we are satisfied he is not such a being as Elder Shelton and others who draw their ideas from the Bible, suppose him to be. And before we can admit miracle No. 2 was performed because miracle No. 1 was, we must be convinced that No. 1 was a reality. We view it as a very weak argument that the truth of all absurdities and monstrosities must be admitted because "all things are possible with God."

In nearly all the religions of the world miracles have been assumed and claimed to prove the religions true. The greater the ignorance of the people, the more the miracles have been urged. The Jewish Scriptures were far from being first in this business. Not one of all these miracles was ever true. Not one was ever possible. The hydropathic one that Elder Shelton believes in so strongly turned out to be particularly futile—labor completely thrown away. Mankind afterwards continued right on as wicked as before, and the wholesale drowning of men, women, and children, animals, birds, insects, and all vegetation was worse than useless. The Elder's claim that it made mankind know God is as silly as the rest of the story. The world has never known God, and even to these days it remains in total ignorance of Him. God-makers and worshipers have told all manner of tales about Him, but unfortunately they knew not a particle more about Him than the masses. All have been in the dark together.

We would suggest that if God wanted to send a flood upon the earth, a flood of knowledge would have been better than a flood of water. It would have been immensely more profitable to the inhabitants of the earth, and inconceivably less cruel to children, babes, horses, cattle, sheep, kittens, doves, larks, linnets, nightingales, and millions of other kinds of beasts, birds, and insects which had done nothing to cause a reasonable god to send death and extermination upon them. A flood of knowledge even at this day would do a vast amount of good. We believe the people down in Alabama would be benefited by it. Elder Shelton himself would perhaps not be injured by such a flood. If they were in that State well suffused with such a flood, they would, doubtless, be willing honest Infidels should testify in courts of law.

One of the greatest mistakes Elder Shelton and his Christian friends make, is in imputing demoniacal characteristics and conduct to the God of the Universe. They make him cruel, malicious, revengeful, and bloodthirsty enough for a first-class devil. The trouble is they have mistaken God altogether—they have adopted the Jewish deity, Jehovah, and try to pass him off for the God of the Universe. A greater error could not be made. They are totally unlike, and it is the greatest injustice to the God of the Universe to displace him with the Jewish god Jehovah, the older Hindu god, Brahma, the Egyptian god, Osiris, the Grecian god, Jupiter, the Scandinavian god Odin, or any of the thousands of other gods invented by mankind. What the world needs to do, is to discard all these ancient gods of superstition and ignorance, and revere the only God that exists, the God of the Universe and whose highest expression is in humanity, exalted and ennobled by knowledge, truth, and good lives.

Second. We deem it unreasonable that Elder Shelton requires us to prove by living witnesses that upheavals have ever taken place on this continent, when he ought to know that the man who was here when that little commotion took place has been dead several years. The Elder does not believe that the Andes, the Rocky Mountains, the Alleghenies, the Catskills, the White Mountains, and all the other mountains on the continent were once thrown up by internal convulsions produced by the formation of various gasses, but that it did once occur there is the strongest proof in the world. The strata of limestone, sandstone, granite, conglomerate, etc., the natural position of which is comparatively level, are found where these upheavals have occurred, in all conceivable angles and sometimes even perpendicular, and often carried hundreds of feet above the same strata in adjacent localities, showing the force producing the rupture must have been tremendous. Our good Elder, however, finding nothing of this in the Bible, cannot believe a word of it. But as long as this very rational theory is sustained by such learned scholars and close students of nature as Lyell, Hitchcock, Humboldt, Miller, Denton, and other learned geologists, who have spent their lives in investigating the subject, we shall be compelled to be guided by them, though even Elder Shelton should exclaim, "what fools they all are to disagree with me," and "a learned fool is much more of a fool than an unlearned one like myself."

It is indeed an ignorant person that will insist that there have been no topographical changes upon the earth. They have taken place on a large scale not only on this hemisphere, but on the Eastern also. Some have been sudden and explosive, as when mountain ranges have been thrown up, others have been gradual and almost imperceptible. Professor Draper, one of the ripest scholars of our time, in his "Intellectual Development of Europe," in touching upon this subject gives a clear statement of the changes that have taken place upon the Eastern Continent. He says: For countless ages Asia has experienced a slow upward movement, not only affecting her own topography but likewise that of her European dependency. There was a time when the great sandy desert of Gobi was the bed of the sea which communicated through the Caspian with the Baltic, as may be proved not only by existing geographical facts, but also from geological considerations. It is only necessary for this purpose to inspect the imperfect maps that have been published of the Silurian or even the tertiary period. The vertical displacement of Europe during and since the last period, has indisputably been more than 2,000 feet in many places. There is not a shore in Europe which does not give evidence of changes: the mouths of the Rhine, as they were in Roman times are obliterated; the eastern coast of England has been cut away for miles. In the Mediterranean the shore-line is altogether changed; towns once on the coast are far away inland; others have sunk beneath the sea. Islands, like Rhodes, have risen from the bottom. The North Adriatic, once a deep gulf, has now become shallow; there are leaning towers and inclining temples that have sunk with the settling of the earth. On the opposite extremity of Europe the Scandinavian peninsula furnishes an instance of slow secular motion, the northern part rising gradually above the sea at the rate of about four feet in a century. This elevation is observed through a space of many hundred miles, increasing towards the north. The southern extremity on the contrary, experiences a slow depression.

"These slow movements are nothing more than what have been going on for numberless ages. Since the tertiary period two-thirds of Europe have been lifted above the sea. The Norway coast has been elevated 600 feet, the Alps have been upheaved 2,000 to 3,000, the Apennines 1,000 to 2,000. The country between Mont Blanc and Vienna has been thus elevated since the adjacent seas were peopled with existing animals."

The same causes which have produced these results upon the Eastern Continent have produced similar results on the Western. Where we now find high grounds and even hills we have indubitable proofs that they were once a part of the ocean. Even in the short time our history extends into the past, changes in the mouths and deltas of our rivers, and shiftings in the sea-coasts have unmistakably occurred. The main upheavals, causing the mountain ranges of the Continent to rise, may have occurred millions of years ago, but that they did once take place we shall continue to believe, Elder Shelton to the contrary notwithstanding. We shall accord to the geologists and scientists we have mentioned far more credibility than we possibly can to the pious Elder, who is evidently guided more by blind faith in that which he knows nothing of, than by education and knowledge.

Third. We think it rather unkind in the Elder to "go back" in the way he does upon Brother Beecher. How would he like it, if he was sitting upon the ragged edge of despair and remorse, to have his brothers of the cloth turn their backs upon him? Many eminent clergymen have been just as bad as Henry Ward, but were not all so unlucky as to be caught just as he was. How do we know but Elder Shelton himself may not sometime have been just a little bit imprudent and loved the sisters of the fold a little too well? He ought to be more charitable toward an erring brother, and not cast stones unless he is sure he is without fault himself; and even then it would perhaps be unkind. He seems to doubt the genuineness of Brother Henry's orthodoxy. True, the Plymouth pastor has said some funny things and uttered some singular sentiments, but certainly he is all right on Jesus and the Holy Ghost. He goes very strong upon those, and in the sportsman's language, they are the "best cards in the pack." In fact, Henry Ward and the Holy Ghost have some points of resemblance, if all reports are true; both have been attracted by females, and both have engaged in the "over-shadowing business." We hope the Elder will excuse us for the opinion that, in point of knowledge and talent, Henry Ward Beecher knows more in a minute than J. C. Shelton does in a week. He certainly ought to stick to him like a brother. The Plymouth pastor needs the sympathizing aid of every friend, lay and clerical; let not Elder Shelton desert him.

Fourth. Our friend asks us to point out what books we believe better than the Bible. That is rather of a heavy contract, and we will not undertake it. There are so many, our columns would not be sufficient to contain the titles. We will, however, indicate a few. We think the Spelling-book, the Reader, the Grammar and Arithmetic are better than many parts of the Bible. Works on Astronomy, Chemistry, Geology, Physiology, Botany, History and all the Sciences are better. Among the special authors we would prefer to the Bible, are Shakespeare, Pope, Byron, Moore, Burns, Combe, Macauley, Buckle, Lecky, Froude, Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Mill, Tyndall, Fiske, Draper, Emerson and many, many others. These teach a man something he ought to know, and the knowledge improves him and leads him on to higher and grander elevations of usefulness. Whereas with the Bible there is no advance in knowledge or progress. It presupposes man was made faultless and upright at first, but that in a few hours he fell into great disgrace and degradation, and with all the help that Gods and angels have been able to extend to him, he has not yet near recovered the position from which he fell.

Science and knowledge are what the world needs to help us on in our upward journey, and they are ever calling us up higher and higher. But the Bible remains on the low plane whence it emanated, maintaining its same crudities and imperfections, its same silly and obscene stories, illy calculated as they are to enlarge the mental calibre of the world, or to impart knowledge, usefulness or value. The Bible is a reflex of the ignorance and superstition of past ages with no provision for progress or advance in knowledge, and is far behind the more reliable, needful, practical and truthful information which Science is to-day giving the world.

Fifth. We think, inasmuch as they are Christians who believe in Christ, and that there could have been no Christians before Christ, it is a singular process by which the Elder makes Christians of Noah and his wife, his three sons and their wives. Let us enquire if Noah was a Christian, was it a proof of it when he got drunk and lay naked in his tent in a drunken sleep, and when afterward he cursed his son Ham for laughing at him when in that condition, thus dooming the innocent descendants of Ham to abject servitude and degradation for thousands of years?

Sixth. We are decidedly of the opinion that Elder Shelton, like thousands of other Christians, is greatly behind the spirit of the age in still hugging to his bosom the antiquated and absurd fables and vagaries of past barbarous ages under the vain delusion that, in those old legends and unreliable stories, he finds true wisdom and knowledge. It is getting along too far in the Nineteenth Century to give preference to the idle, exaggerated tales of three thousand years ago, written, as they were, by persons who scarcely had the first glimpses of scientific truth, in place of the advanced thought and scientific research of far abler minds of the present day.

Priests, as a rule, are slow to accept the teachings of science. For centuries they have zealously fought it with acrimony and hate, knowing well it is calculated to lessen their rule over the minds of men. But in spite of their opposition, in spite of the fetters they have sought to place upon the growing limbs of young science, she has already far outgrown their reach, and bids fair soon to liberate the world from this rule of bondage which for so many centuries priestcraft has fastened upon it. We hail the auspicious promise of the near future of the world, and would gladly see all Priests and Elders throw away the effete errors and mythological absurdities of olden times, and embrace the better teachings of truth and reason which are illuminating the mental and moral horizon.

We are pleased in some directions to see indications of progress and intelligence on the part of the clergy. The Rev. T. W. Fowle, M.A., Vicar of St. Luke's, Natford Place, London, in a work of over four hundred pages, recently published under the title of The Reconciliation of Religion and Science, and which was dedicated to the Dean of Stanley, a dignitary of the Church of England, next perhaps in authority to the Archbishop of Canterbury, gives utterance to most advanced and liberal sentiments when we consider the contracted and sectarian views the clergy usually take upon this subject. The distinguished author, assuming that science and religion stand face to face in deadly conflict, proposes the following as preliminary to peace: "The mode of reconciliation suggested in this book consists in the absolute and unconditional surrender of the province of religion to the methods of scientific investigation." He then draws a striking illustration from history. The advent of Modern Science he compares to the invasion of England by the conquering Normans, who, after their decisive victory at the battle of Hastings, were themselves absorbed into the common life of the subjugated race. He then continues in the following eloquent passage:

"The application of our parable is easy. The hour is coming when upon this field of intellectual controversy, the army of science will storm the last stronghold of religion regarded from the intellectual side. Reason will conquer herself the kingdom, which, even in the act of admitting the inevitable result it seems so hard to believe, can really belong to her. But 'Magna sunt facta et prevalebunt.' The methods, the dogmas, the assumptions, the opinions, the creeds of Christendom will pass under the yoke of scientific enquiry, and will continue to exist only so far as science permits and approves. And with the death of the old theology will begin the new religion, just as when the Norman soldiers sat down on English soil to eat their meal on the night of victory, then began, then and there, that process which was to make them more English than the English themselves." The book is filled with similar sensible utterances.

The sentiments of this clergyman strike us as far in advance of Elder Shelton's, and we would, in the kindest manner, urge the latter to open his eyes and look about himself; to brush away the mists that obstruct his vision, and endeavor to obtain a clearer view of the sun of science and truth. In another half century but few clergymen will be found who will insist that the stories in Genesis are to be taken literally, but that they are simply a legend or fable, and of no practical value save to exhibit the literary taste and ability of olden times.

Speaking of the conflict between science and superstition, we like the way in which Dr. Draper thus states it: "As to the issue of the coming conflict, can any one doubt? Whatever is resting on fiction and fraud will be overthrown. Institutions that organize impostures and spread delusions must show what right they have to exist. Faith must render an account of herself to reason. Mysteries must give place to facts. Religion must relinquish that imperious, that domineering position which she has so long maintained against science. There must be absolute freedom for thought. The ecclesiastic must learn to keep himself within the domain he has chosen, and cease to tyrannize over the philosopher, who, conscious of his own strength and the purity of his motives, will bear such interference no longer."

We would willingly give Elder Shelton more of our views, but our remarks have already far transcended the limits we prescribed. We know not whether he will consider our arguments "solid," but if he will come again, we will be only too happy to enlighten him to the extent of our ability.

The Dead Wife.

"She is dead!" they said to him, "Come away.
Kiss her and leave her—thy love is clay."

They smoothed her tresses of dark brown hair—
On her forehead of stone they laid it fair.

Over her eyes, which gazed too much,
They drew the lids with a tender touch.

With a gentle touch they closed up well
The sweet, thin lips, that had secrets to tell.

About her brown and beautiful face
They tied her veil and her marriage lace;

And drew on her white feet the white silk shoes—
Which were the whitest no eyes could choose.

And over her bosom they crossed her hands.
"Come away," they said; "God understands."

And there was silence, and nothing there
But silence, and scents of eglantere,

And jasmine, and roses, and rosemary;
And they said: "As a lady should lie, lies she."

And they held their breath as they left the room
With a shudder, to glance at its stillness and gloom.

* * * * *

But he who loved her too well to dread
The sweet, the stately and beautiful dead,

He lit his lamp, and took his key
And turned it. Alone again—he and she.

He and she—but she would not speak,
Though he kissed in the old way the quiet cheek.

He and she—yet she did not smile,
Though he called her the name she loved crewhile.

He and she—yet she did not move
To any passionate whisper of love.

Then he said: "Cold lips, and breast without breath,
Is there no voice, no language of Death—

"Dumb to the ear and still to the sense,
But to heart and soul distinct, intense?

"See now: I will listen with soul, not ear:
What was the secret of dying, dear?

"Was it the infinite wonder of all
That you ever could let life's flower fall?

"Or was the marvel greater to feel
The perfect calm o'er the agony steal?

"Was the miracle greater to find how deep
Beyond all dreams sank downward that sleep?

"Did life roll backward its record, dear,
And show, as they say it does, past things clear?

"And what is the innermost heart of the bliss
To find out so, what a wisdom love is?

"O, perfect dead! O, dead most dear!
I hold the breath of my soul to hear!

"I listen as deep as to horrible hell,
As high as to heaven—and you do not tell.

"There must be pleasure in dying, sweet,
To make you so placid from head to feet.

"I would tell you, darling, if I were dead,
And 'twas your hot tears on my brow shed:

"I would say, though the Angel of Death had laid
His sword on my lips to keep it unsaid.

"You should not ask vainly, with streaming eyes,
Which of all Deaths was the chiefest surprise—

"The very strangest and suddenest thing
Of all the surprises dying must bring."

* * * * *

Ah, foolish world! O, most kind dead!
Though he told me, who will believe it was said?

Who will believe what he heard her say
With the sweet, soft voice, in the dear old way?

"The utmost wonder is this: I hear,
And see you, and love you, and kiss you, dear:

"And am your angel, who was your bride;
And know that, though dead, I have never died,"

ROUSSEAU once wrote: "If it were only necessary for you to hold out your thumb in order to cause the death of an immensely wealthy mandarin in China, whose heir you would be, are you sure that you would not extend your thumb?" This passage one day attracted the attention of Henri de Lacrois, a young Frenchman of excellent family, but whose brain had been a little affected by the loss of his fortune. He thought, "If I could stretch out my thumb, and that would be enough to kill my uncle and cousin, I should become very rich." In a sort of hallucination, he extended his arm toward the photographs of his relations and said, "Let them die, so that I may inherit." Fifteen days later his uncle and cousin were carried off by typhoid fever. Within the last six months remorse preyed upon Lacrois' enfeebled intellect, and he imagined that his spell caused the death of his relatives. He heard voices from all sides of his room calling, "Thou hast killed us! Thou hast killed us!" He delivered himself up to the police and asked to be executed. He died a few days ago in an insane asylum.

Reply to Rev. N. Smith.

EDITOR OF THE EXPRESS: As Mr. Smith has tendered his respects (?) to Mr. Underwood and ourselves in your last issue, we beg to reply through the same medium. How is it that our opponents so persistently and invariably strive to write down ourselves instead of our doctrines? They always discuss persons instead of propositions. Is not this a sign of conscious weakness? Instead of striving so hard to disparage Mr. Underwood, why does not Mr. Smith address himself to the refutation of his doctrines? Mr. Smith informs us that Mr. Underwood is a "shallow-minded person." He is "incompetent," "uncandid," a "pretender," etc. This "new philosopher" is a "non-descript," an "unblushing blasphemer," and so on. Now, in return, we will call no names! We will try and write as becometh gentlemen! Those who had the pleasure (or misfortune, whichever it may have been) of hearing Messrs. Underwood and Smith measure swords at the Music Hall, Napanee, in September last, will be able to duly appraise the epithets and imputations which Mr. Smith applies to Mr. Underwood. To those who witnessed that rencontre, and had the opportunity of comparing and contrasting the calibre of the two champions, Mr. Smith's estimate of Mr. Underwood, as given in the last week's Express, will not be a little ludicrous and amusing. The truth doubtless is, that the former, writhing under that withering castigation, as well as the challenge contained in our letter to the Napanee Council, knows of no better way of easing himself than the one adopted. Well, as Shakespeare says, "Let the galled jade wince; our withers are unwrung."

Mr. Underwood held a debate recently, of several days' duration, with Prof. Burgess, President of the Indianapolis Theological University. And let us hear what is said in the St. Louis Daily Times of a late date in reference thereto: "Underwood had the affirmative all through the debate. The propositions required him to prove that the Bible abounds in errors in history, and serves and teaches a morality not adapted to the Nineteenth Century. The attendance was immense from the beginning to the end of the debate. Burgess is smart, tonguey and eloquent. . . . Underwood, on the contrary, is learned, logical, and scientific."

He is probably the best debater in the ranks of the American Freethinkers. He is a representative of 'modern thought,' and is one of the most logical speakers and skilful debaters in America." The Cleveland Leader says: "He is unquestionably a very able thinker, and an attractive speaker." The Christian Messenger, edited by Prof. Campbell, of Monmouth College, says: "We found Mr. Underwood a gentleman of talents and attainments, worthy of the reputation he has won as a lecturer—affable, courteous, and fair in debate." Hugo Andriessen says, "Mr. Underwood is to American readers what Dr. Buechner is, or was, to the German enquirers; a very clever, clear, forcible writer, who possesses a certain facility to popularize the results of modern scientific investigation and Materialistic speculation." Now this sounds so little like "shallow-mindedness" or "incompetency," that it is just possible Mr. Smith is not a good judge of brains, especially in an opponent.

In regard to the capacity of Noah's ark, Mr. Smith thinks it was quite large enough, and refers to Bishop Wilkins in corroboration. The Bishop, he says, was "one of the first mathematicians," and after making a "careful computation," found the ark entirely too large. Now, it is sometimes difficult for a "first" theologian to be a "first" and at the same time a reliable biblical mathematician. The theology is almost sure to spoil the figures. But never mind the Bishop. Let us go directly to the Bible and figure a little for ourselves. If Mr. Smith will do this he will find that the largest size he can figure the ark to, would be about 550 feet long, less than 100 broad, and about 55 high. Now what was this to contain? About 44,000 birds, 5,000 beasts, 9,000 snails, 900 reptiles, and about a million and a half of insects, besides food for all these, etc., etc. If he will make a "careful computation" he will find that of the birds alone there would be about three for every square yard of standing room. All required is common sense and some arithmetic, with very little of "mathematics," to show that such a vessel would not be large enough to hold all this. And this diluvian Great Eastern was ventilated by just one window. But, aside from all these trifling difficulties, where was the water to come from to cover the tops of the highest mountains? A noted geologist says, "There is not water enough on the earth, in the earth, nor above the earth to cover it to the tops of the highest mountains." The fact is, the whole story of the flood, as well as many other Bible stories, partake so largely of the character of other mythical legends of antiquity that they fail to command the credence of this skeptical and enlightened age. Think of that "fish story" of Jonah and his submarine journeyings, of the sun and moon "standing still" to give Mr. Joshua a better chance to slay his enemies, or of the three days and nights before there was any sun. Or think of quails three feet deep on the ground, covering an area a hundred miles in circumference. And the least that any Israelite gathered of these quails was about forty bushels. Lucky fellows! They were dissatisfied with their rations, and these quails were all brought in to them "by a wind from the sea." Mr. Smith talks about "gullibility," but does it not require a considerable amount of it to believe these tales? Does he believe them? If so, why not believe the story of "Jack the Giant-Killer" and "Sinbad the Sailor?" If not, why find fault with us? We accept all that is reasonable and good in the Bible. We only repudiate that which, to us, is absurd and bad.

In regard to Voltaire "retracting his infidelity" before he died, it is not true. The same has been said of Paine, Gibbon, Hume, and almost every other deceased skeptic, but it is simply the "invention of the enemy." If Mr. Smith will turn to Sir Charles Morgan's "Philosophy of Morals," he will find this false story of Voltaire's recantation fully refuted; also to Lord Brougham's Memoir of Voltaire. If Voltaire died a Christian why was he denied the rights of Christian burial? Mr. S. refers to Richelieu as authority for Voltaire's recantation. Dr. Burard, one of the physicians of Voltaire, in his last sickness, and who asserts that he "never left him for an instant during his last moments," proves that Voltaire kept his faith to the last, and he says that "the proposition, therefore, which has been put in the mouth of Richelieu is as unfounded as the rest."

There is but one other position in Mr. Smith's letter claiming our attention, and that is the doctrine of free-will in religious belief. He says faith or belief is voluntary and optional, and his argument is that as "investigation is optional, consequently faith is indirectly optional." That is the sum and substance of his argument that a man can believe as he chooses. Now, if all persons were constituted alike, and hence would arrive at the same conclusions by the same course of investigation, there would then be some weight in this argument; but as it is it is simply absurd. Supposing investigation is optional! Does not every sane man know that the same process of investigation will lead different minds to different conclusions and beliefs? For example, one man will honestly investigate the Bible to the best of his ability, and become convinced, like Mr. S., that Methodism is the religion it teaches; another, after doing the same, will find Baptism there; another, Presbyterianism; another, Episcopalism; another, Unitarianism, and another, Universalism. Another man, equally as honest and intelligent, will come to the conclusion, after investigation, that the Bible is not the word of God at all; but purely the work of man; another, after due investigation, will come to the conclusion and belief that all so-called divine revelations are mere human productions—that the only revelations we have are those contained in the works of Nature; another, after laborious and honest investigation, comes to the conclusion that there is no special Divine Revelations in Books, in Nature, or anywhere, but believes, with Tyndall, Spencer, Huxley, Buechner, Underwood, and numerous other learned and honest investigators, that the Universe is the One Eternal, Uncreated, and Self-existent Existence, capable of producing all that we see. Like Tyndall, they "see in matter and force the promise and potency of every form and quality of life." Thus it will be seen that investigation leads different minds to different conclusions and beliefs. But the fact is, the Christian is generally but a partial investigator, inasmuch as his investigation is, in general, confined to the Bible. He has been taught from infancy that that book is divine, and he begins to read and investigate (?) it with his mind already made up that it is all true and infallible, steadily refusing to read the writers on the opposite side of the question, and, of course, comes to the desired conclusion and congenial belief, that it is all right. And this is what he calls investigation! The disinterested scientist is the only thorough investigator, and hence is more apt to arrive at the truth. He has no prejudices nor preconceived notions to nurse. He has, or should have, no creeds which he predetermines to square with the facts of science. His first concern is to discover and know the exact truth, whether it be agreeable or not, and any creed, dogma, prejudice, bias, or notion, (no matter how dear or time-honored) which will not harmonize therewith he fearlessly casts aside. How can a Christian know he is right until he has fairly and candidly examined, and duly weighed the arguments and facts against his creed? He may believe "with all his heart" that it is true, but belief is not knowledge. Thus it is that belief or disbelief is not a matter of choice or volition at all, any more than the shape of the head or the length of the body. It would be as just and reasonable to say "he that is six feet high shall be saved, but he that is not six feet high shall be damned," as to say "he that believeth a certain doctrine shall be saved, but he that believeth it not shall be damned." One is about as logical as the other. On this question Lord Brougham says: "The great truth has finally gone forth to all the ends of the earth, that man shall no longer render account to man for belief, over which he has no control. Henceforward nothing shall prevail upon us to blame any one for that which he can no more change than he can the hue of his skin or the height of his stature."

ALLEN PRINGLE,
F. VAN DE BOGART,

Napanee, Feb. 10th, 1875.

Jonah and the Whale.

Religiously born, and religiously educated, we have a high appreciation of sacred history. Jonah, as appears, was a prophet of the Lord—unwillingly so. The whale was elected, or appointed, to teach the prophet the way of submission.

But really, what have we to do with Jonah, or with his whale? With the people of Nineveh, we have something to do. They rise up in judgment.

Where, in the world's history, find we a nation, a people, a city, against whom the Ninevites rise not up in judgment?

Religious organizations, in special manner, stand condemned before high heaven, by the example of Nineveh.

The nearer right a religious organization has been, when it departs from the principles of its organization, the more inveterate the power behind the throne, that runs the government machine, against the prophet of the Lord, against the voice of reason.

The Lord God of Heaven is about to deal with the dwellers of his little planet; first, with Organization, Political and Religious—such as are found wanting in the virtues of their founders—such as hold not fast the good of the past, and lay hold of the good of the increasing degree of Light and Life, will be found, if found at all, among the things that were, but are not.

Let those, who occupy high official station, beware of the power behind the throne. Let them heed the voice of the Living God, by messengers sent unto them. Let them remember the people of Nineveh. Let them purge themselves and their people, of the accursed thing; for, behold I come quickly—have come—to give unto every man and every woman, especially officials, according as their works shall be.

PRENTISS.

New-York Liberal Club.

APRIL 9TH, 1875.

[TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-EIGHTH MEETING.]

The Pathology of the Skin.

By CARL HEITZMANN, M.D., late of the University of Vienna.

The very limited time allotted to fulfil the task before me, will enable me to touch only upon the most important points of the study of the extensive doctrine of the diseases affecting the skin. I will delineate those points only that seem to me to be worthy of being known to every well-educated member of society. In my opinion, no investigator of the pathology of the human skin deserves more praise and greater credit for the clear and precise arrangement, the simplicity in the classification and the successful treatment of the skin than Hebra of Vienna.

The skin, as an integral part of the human body, is liable to the same morbid process to which the other organs are subject; but the anatomical conditions, as well as the superficial position of the skin, moreover the extent of its surface, do modify, in some degree, its diseases.

The causes which give rise to diseases of the skin are partly such as are internal and rooted in the organism itself, partly such as are external, and by which the skin is alone, or at least primarily or chiefly affected. Skin diseases, therefore, have long been divided in reference to their main causes, into the symptomatic or universal, and into the idiopathic or local disaffections.

Diseases of particular systems and organs are wont sympathetically to involve the skin; for instance, affections of the intestinal tract, the sexual organs, the liver, the kidneys. Unfortunately we are very seldom in a position to demonstrate the real connection between the internal affection, which causes, and the skin disease which is caused. We see only that they occur together, and are intimately related, or that they mutually react upon each other. But we are not at the present day enabled to show accurately why a disease of an internal organ should give rise to an affection of the skin.

Hereditary transmission, again, from parents to their offspring undoubtedly takes place in certain forms of cutaneous disease. Lastly, diseases of the nervous system must not be overlooked as the causes of certain disturbances of the functions of the skin, although with reference to this point all accurate investigation is as yet wanting. We can, at most, draw negative conclusions, and regard skin affections which are associated with morbid sensations, such as itching, pain, want of sensibility or anæsthesia, as the effect of perverted innervation.

Man is often his own worst enemy, for he practices a number of occupations which subject him to various cutaneous affections, and he neglects many of the precautions which would protect his skin from disease. Thus one of the chief factors in the causation of skin diseases is the permanent action of pressure, or the frequent repetition of blows upon the surface of the body, or the constant friction of some solid body which comes in direct contact with the skin. And under this head may be reckoned, besides many other injurious influences, the scratching of patients who suffer from the itching of cutaneous diseases, neglect of the skin, and that sin of omission, want of cleanliness are well known to be fruitful causes, from which not a few cutaneous affections derive their origin. But the same effect may in the end be produced also by the opposite proceeding; that is to say, by too frequently repeated or too energetic washing and bathing.

In enumerating the causes which produce cutaneous disease, those also must unfortunately be mentioned, which, no doubt, with good intentions, are employed in the practice of the healing art. As is well known, irritating remedies are very often, and we have to say, but too often applied to the skin. These are generally used with the object of effecting—by means of the powerful irritation of the skin, which they produce—a derivation from some internal organ, which is the seat of the disease. How far this end is obtained, is uncertain, and opinions about it are divided. According to Hebra, the supposed, but not proven, good effects of the use of such irritating substances, are far outweighed by the demonstrably evil results of their application to the skin. Daily experience furnishes the proof of the correctness of this opinion.

The parasites, vegetable, as well as animal organisms, of which some are met with in the protective horny tissue, some in the tissue of the cutis itself, are frequent causes of cutaneous disease. The parasitic plants, which invariably belong to the class of fungi, reside either in the epidermis alone, or in the hair as well; or lastly, in the nails also. The animal parasites, which choose the skin as their scene of action, are divided into the Dermatozoa, which either always, or at any rate during part of their existence, dwell within the tissues of the skin, as for instance the itch insect, the pimple-mite, the sand-flea, the guinea-worm, etc., and the Epizoa, which merely seek their food upon the skin's surface, residing either in the appendages of the skin, namely, on the hairs, or in the clothing, or other surroundings of persons infested by these parasites. To the second class belong the louse, the flea, the bed-bug and the gnat.

Under the term efflorescentide or eruptions, it is usual to group together many of the symptoms of cutaneous disease, which differ altogether from other pathological appearances, in their determinate form, their position and their course, as well as in the regularity of their development and retrogression. It is the practice to give certain special names to the various forms of efflorescence, which are distinguished by characters of their own.

Some of the appearances observed in cutaneous diseases are caused directly by the deposition of morbid products in the skin. These bear the name of primary eruptions. But these often afterwards undergo further development, and are subject to changes of a vital, chemical, or mechanical kind, and to the appearances thus produced, is applied the name of secondary symptoms. Under the first head, Hebra includes: the spot, the papule, the nodule, the tumor, the wheal, the vesicle, the bleb and the pustule. Among the secondary appearances are enumerated the excoriation, the ulcer, the fissure, the scale, the crust, the lamellated crust and the scar of cicatrix.

White spots, produced by deficiency of pigment, and varying in size from that of a lentil to that of the palm of the hand, or even occupying the whole surface, are called vitiligo if acquired, and albinismus if congenital. Darker patches, caused by increased deposit of pigment, may be observed at the circumference of these white patches. The openings of the hair-follicles are also seen on them unaltered; and the growth of the hairs, which are themselves mostly white, remains unaffected. These characters enable these affections to be readily distinguished from flat cicatrices.

Brown or black spots, produced by excessive deposits of pigment, have various names. I mention the mother, or liver-spots, the name of which led to, or arose from, the erroneous opinion that they were caused by liver diseases. For this idea, there is no foundation whatever. Disease of the liver may cause deposits of bile-pigment in the skin, but this produces a yellow or brown discoloration of the whole surface of the body. The true mother-spots cover spaces as large as a five-cent piece, or as the palm of the hand, or are even larger still. They are not met with on the face, particularly on the forehead, and also on the trunk, and on the extremities, and they do not desquamate.

[The lecturer here entered into a full definition and description of the following diseased conditions of the skin: Discolorations, Pimples, Nodules, Comedones, Wheals, Tumors, Vesicles, Blebs, Pustules, Excoriations, Ulcers, Fissures, Scales, Lamellated Crusts, Scars, Cicatrices, and which, though interesting, we have not room for here.]

After this enumeration of the causes and appearances of skin diseases in general, let us advance to the consideration of the principles of the treatment of those diseases, always according to the views and experiences of Hebra, with whom I entirely agree.

Although in the course of the last year, great attention has, on all sides, been devoted to this department of medicine, we have, unhappily, as yet made but little progress towards the wished-for end, namely, the cure of all cutaneous diseases. The cause of this lies, no doubt, partly in the fact that it has been only quite recently studied, and for too short a time for making exact investigations. For before one can speak of the action of a remedy in the treatment of any skin affection, two things must be ascertained: the course taken by the disease when left to itself, and the effects which are produced by the remedy when applied to the healthy skin. On account of the want of a rational basis for our therapeutical procedures in the treatment of affections of the skin, no expedient remains but pure empiricism. For the success which we have hitherto obtained, we are indebted entirely to the strictly practical course pursued by different specialists in this respect. Hebra, for instance, has tried methods of the most varied description, those as well that were recommended by medical men as also by unprofessional persons, and he has found some remedies belonging to the former category less effectual than they were represented to be, while popular remedies, on the other hand, have often rendered good service in his hands.

Hebra alludes to a few deeply-rooted prejudices, which interfere even in our days, to some extent, and interfered still more formerly, with the employment in practice of certain methods of treatment. The first of these prejudices which we must combat, is the dread with which local applications were regarded. It is a mistake to suppose that the action of remedies applied to the diseased or healthy skin is necessarily merely topical, and not general. We have to call to mind the contagia of small-pox, syphilis, hydrophobia, the poisons of serpents, and of the dissecting-room, which are generally introduced through the skin, to prove that it is an organ which absorbs very readily many forms of virus. And that it is equally adapted to absorb medicinal agents also, and to admit them into the circulation, even while the epidermis is intact, can be easily shown, as I already mentioned in a former lecture, during the external use of tar, of iodine, or of the mercurial preparations. Now, what can be demonstrated in the case of certain remedies by chemical reactions, ought surely not to be decried in regard to others; and, therefore, Hebra maintains the exact contrary of the principle we have alluded to, and asserts that, with the exception of caustics, all remedies which are brought into prolonged contact with the skin, are absorbed by it, and taken up into the fluids of the body.

Hence we have no fear, in applying topical remedies, of driving in cutaneous diseases, or of producing any other ill effects, for which the practitioners of the old school had various expressions. Our apprehension is rather of a too violent action upon the organism in general, especially in the case of those drugs which are liable to produce derangements of the vegetative processes. Nor have we any dread of curing skin affections too quickly. On the contrary, it is the object of our utmost endeavors to find means of terminating these diseases as speedily as possible. Were we only in the possession of remedies which produced cures thus rapidly, we should have no anxiety with regard to the appearance from this cause of metastases, the so-called transport of a disease from an external part into an internal organ, or of any other consecutive diseases.

There is another point, also, in which Hebra is opposed to his predecessors, and to many of his contemporaries, and that is with reference to the necessity for using in the cure of chronic skin affections, remedies which are supposed to be purifiers of the blood. We have never seen the effects which are ascribed to them by some authors, produced either by the long-continued administration of laxatives and drastics, nor by decoctions of woods, nor by vegetable juices. Arsenic has proved a useful internal remedy, the same is the case with preparations of mercury, of iodine, of iron, etc., of course in rational doses, corresponding to the age and the constitution of the patient, administered in accordance with the advice of an intelligent physician.

Externally we have to treat every disease, which is a mere skin disease, without change in the constitution. We make up of simple baths, warm or cold as required, and of shower and vapor baths; or we add to these baths different powerful remedies. Again we often employ emollient frictions with success, rubbing the whole skin or certain parts of it with oily or fatty substances, and in other cases we add to these fatty matters various active substances.

Moreover an important part of our therapeutical resources consists in the empyumatic oils, which result from the dry distillation of certain kinds of wood, giving the different kinds of tar. For the removal from the skin of exudations, new growths, tumors and the like, caustics are employed.

Lastly, besides these active remedies, which are used externally or internally in different skin affections, others, which are indifferent and inert are also frequently prescribed; in those diseases, whose course we cannot modify, and in which, therefore, the expectant method is attended with the best results. Thus, whether this or that remedy be used, is a matter of indifference, in contagious as well as in all inflammatory affections of the skin, which run an acute course, that mode of treatment which disturbs the patient least is, in these diseases, always the best. Sometimes we are compelled to prescribe such indifferent remedies, even if we are convinced of their inefficacy, when patients of a lesser degree of culture wish to have some remedy to be taken internally at any price. Intelligent patients are accessible to the warning of an honest and intelligent physician—but we cannot overcome certain prejudices, and we have to adapt ourselves to circumstances.

I have thus completed my series of Lectures on the Human Skin, and I have to express my thanks for your attention and kindness. I hope I will speak on some other occasion before you on other organs of the human body, to the study of which I paid no less attention than to the study of the Skin.

DR. ATKINSON followed with remarks upon the importance of more general information among the masses in relation to the subject of the lecture. He also gave his theory of the evolution of matter or protoplasm from atoms to molecules, from molecules to cells, from cells to tissue, from tissue to organs, and from organs to the entire body, made up of thirteen original elements. He described the difference between secretion, excretion, and assimilation, as well as discussed cognate subjects.

MR. NASH followed with his views upon skin diseases, and the best general treatment for them.

DR. T. S. LAMBERT next took the platform and in rather humorous remarks, criticised alike the lecturer and the two gentlemen who had followed him; especially Dr. Atkinson's theory of building up the system. He threw considerable ridicule upon the empiricism of the medical profession, and described humorously the old style of practitioners, when called to see a patient, of feeling pulse, looking at the tongue, prescribing senna and salts, blisters, etc. He referred as well to those pretenders, who claim to have spent many years with the sons of the forest, who absolutely know little or nothing about diseases or medicines, and thereby urge their superior fitness to set themselves up as healers of their fellow-men.

The doctor claimed, however, there was but one per cent. in the difference of rates of longevity between communities treated by scientific physicians and those who were not; but that people in comfortable circumstances lived longer by some years than those in embarrassed conditions, arguing that anxiety, care, and fear of want, tended to shorten life. He stated that those who had marble-slab tombstones and monuments placed over their graves were generally longer lived than those so poor as not to have those representatives of competence. He remarked the best means of securing health and long life was to keep the skin clean, also the clothing and bedding, to drink pure water, to breathe pure air, and take but little medicine.

DR. E. W. HOEBER regretted that such an excellent scientific lecture, as we had listened to, should be followed with exceptional criticisms. He called attention to the advance that had been made in the science of medicine within a few years, and to the more rational treatment for diseases that had been adopted.

DR. HEITZMANN closed the discussion of the evening by a few remarks in explanation of points that had been raised.

[TWO HUNDRED AND EIGHTY-NINTH MEETING—APRIL 16th, 1875.]

No paper was read on this occasion, but an annual election of officers of the Club held; a fair number of members of the Club were present.

JAMES PARTON Esq., President, presiding.

D. T. GARDNER read a report, stating that an accession of thirty members had been made to the Club, within the year past, making the entire membership some three hundred. He reported an increased attendance and interest in the meetings of the Club.

E. W. HOEBER, Corresponding Secretary, read a brief but humorous report of his duties for the year, which embraced the writing of a few letters to various distinguished lecturers and writers in Europe and America.

COURTLAND PALMER, Treasurer, read a very brief report, stating that the receipts of the Club during the year had been $875.25, and its expenses $875.25. The Club was entirely out of debt—not owing a dollar. Those who understood the fact that Mr. Palmer had very generously, out of his own pocket, made up the deficiency of the Club, duly appreciated his report as well as his well-known liberality.

T. B. WAKEMAN, Librarian, read his report of the names of individuals, who had contributed books to the library of the Club, and the number of volumes presented, as well as the number of volumes purchased. The total number of volumes in the library at present is eight hundred and seventy-five—and more on the way from England, not yet arrived.

The election of officers for the coming year was as follows:

JAMES PARTON, for President, by a unanimous vote.

D. T. GARDNER, Recording Secretary, unanimously.

DR. E. W. HOEBER, Corresponding Secretary.

COURTLAND PALMER, Treasurer, with great unanimity.

W. J. ORMSBEE, Professor P. H. VAN DER WEYDE, and MR. WILCOX, Vice-Presidents.

T. B. WAKEMAN, CHAS. BRAGDON, and DR. JOHN ELDERKIN, Trustees.

HENRY EVANS, Librarian.

JAMES PARTON, the President, upon his re-election, made a very neat speech, returning thanks for the honor thus conferred. He sometimes thought, when he remembered the dignity which properly attaches to the office, and when he recollected the distinguished bearing with which Luther Bradish, thirty years ago, presided over meetings and maudlin pomposity of some other individuals, he conceived that he was not just fitted for the position. He congratulated the club upon its prosperity and promise of future usefulness.

In subsequent remarks he proposed steps be taken by the Club to rent a hall for Sunday afternoon meetings, where scientific, philosophical, and literary subjects could be lectured upon and discussed, dramatic entertainments given—any thing except theology. He called attention to a similar enterprise in Chicago, where he had recently delivered a course of lectures, and where he had witnessed the successful working of such a Liberal institution.

These suggestions were received with much favor by the Club, and it was decided to act at an early day upon the suggestion made by the President.

DR. T. S. LAMBERT suggested that the LIBERAL CLUB, of New York, take measures to buy a lot and erect a hall of their own; he said he would contribute $1000 towards the enterprise—and when the hall was erected if a room was dedicated to free speech and free discussion he would give $4000 more; he thinks he knows of others who would also make donations for the same purpose.

He said he was proud of the LIBERAL CLUB, and he frankly acknowledged he had learned more at its meetings than in the same length of time any where else; he entertained great hopes for its future usefulness.

The suggestion for the erection of a hall was freely discussed, a large majority favoring the project, and one or two being opposed to it on the grounds of fear that with the accumulation of wealth rings and improper influence might work in.

Other motions were offered and discussed, one of which was in reference to the Club as a body, opposing the efforts of the Catholics of this city, aiming to make their schools, where sectarianism is daily taught, public schools, and the teachers to draw pay from the public funds for such services; also opposing the use of the Bible as a school book in public schools. After the question was freely discussed a committee was appointed to attend to the matter.

A committee was also selected to make arrangements for suitable preparations for the observance of the anniversary of the Club, to be held in September.

MRS. HALLOCK wished more ladies could unite with the Club, and called upon gentlemen present to induce their wives and lady friends to join and regularly attend the meetings of the Club. She said an infusion of more of the female element into the Club would be beneficial to both.

After other questions were presented and discussed the Club adjourned at a somewhat late hour.

A Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Thanking you for the complimentary manner in which you notice my lecture delivered before the Liberal Club on the 2d inst., I beg leave to say that your reporter misapprehended me in several particulars. I did not say that twenty thousand Africans were annually introduced into the island, but that a few years ago, during a twelvemonth—according to a report made to the British Government by the Consul-General at Havana—such a number had been introduced. The fact is, in some years few or none are imported into Cuba, this matter depending pretty much upon whether the Captain-General is well disposed or not. Nor did I say that in some years as much as fifty-seven millions of taxes had been levied. I said that forty-seven millions had been levied in 1866-7, (that is, from July to July,) which is one year, but I might have added that this sum was not collected, because it would have brought about general bankruptcy. The Captain-General modified the decree. As Spanish rule in Cuba is bad enough when correctly set forth, I ask you to be so good as to publish this card, and believe me to be, as I am, very truly yours, WM. S. FLIPPEN.

New York, April 10th, 1875.

Notice.

We, the undersigned, believe in the law of Eternal Mateship. We believe, also, that in that Mateship love is unchangeable and everlasting, and that this, the natural law of the soul, is the only sanction necessary in marriage for those who truly love. We take upon ourselves, therefore, from this time forth, the solemn and sacred obligations of a union for life, promising, before angels and mortals, to live truly, love nobly, and labor earnestly for the elevation of our own natures and of all mankind.

LESSIE GOODELL GUSTAFSON,
ALEXIS GUSTAFSON.

New York, March 22d, 1875.

B. F. Underwood

